15. — prayed for them, that they might receive the Holy Ghost:] It hence appears that Philip, who was only a deacon, and a preacher of the Gospel, had not the power of conferring the gifts of the Holy Spirit, and that this was a privilege which belonged at that time peculiarly to Apostles. Beausobre.

17. Then laid they their hands on them, &c.] That which is done by the Apostles on this occasion, is justly considered a fit pattern for bishops to follow in the apostolical rites of confirmation and ordination, by laying on of hands; by which rites they, as successors of the Apostles, confer the ordinary gifts of the Holy Ghost, as the Apostles did the extraordinary gifts of the same Spirit. Dr. Whitby.

We may infer from this passage the expediency and the usefulness of confirmation after baptism. For we see that, after the Samaritans were converted and baptized by Philip, the Apostles sent two of their number to confirm the new converts, to pray for them, and to lay their hands, that they might receive the Holy Ghost. Hence we see the reason why the office of confirmation is performed by the bishop, and by none of the other inferiour ministers of the Gospel. For, though Philip converted and baptized the Samaritans, yet, being only a deacon, he did not take upon him to confirm them, but the Apostles sent two of their number for that purpose. Hence we also collect the benefits of confirmation. In the primitive times, it was attended with extraordinary gifts and manifestations of the Spirit, suited to the then infant state of the Church; but now that the Christian religion is fully established, we must expect only the secret and ordinary communications of the Holy Spirit, without which it is impossible for us to perform the covenant which we have undertaken. Bp. Newton.

It clearly appears, that this ministry of confirmation appertained to the Apostles only, since St. Philip, though a worker of miracles, a preacher, one of the first deacons, and, if we may believe St. Cyprian, one of the seventy-two disciples, would not presume to assume it, but left it to the Apostles, as their peculiar province. Stackhouse.

Anno DOMINI 34.

18 And when Simon saw that through laying on of the apostles' hands the Holy Ghost was given, he offered them money,

19 Saying, Give me also this power, that on whomsoever I lay hands, he may receive the Holy Ghost.

20 But Peter said unto him, Thy money perish with thee, because thou hast thought that the gift of God may be purchased with money.

21 Thou hast neither part nor lot in this matter: for thy heart is not right in the sight of God.

22 Repent therefore of this thy wickedness, and pray God, if perhaps the thought of thine heart may be forgiven thee.

23 For I perceive that thou art in the gall of bitterness, and in the bond of iniquity.

24 Then answered Simon, and said, Pray ye to the Lord for me, that none of these things which ye have spoken come upon me. Anno DOMINI 34.

25 And they, when they had testified and preached the word of the Lord, returned to Jerusalem, and preached the gospel in many villages of the Samaritans.

26 And the angel of the Lord spake unto Philip, saying, Arise, and go toward the south unto the way that goeth down from Jerusalem unto Gaza, which is desert.

27 And he arose and went: and, behold, a man of Ethiopia, an eunuch of great authority under Candace queen of the Ethiopians, who had the charge of all her treasure, and had come to Jerusalem for to worship, —— on them,] Not on all that had been baptized, but on some of them, chosen out and distinguished from the rest; for Simon was among those that were baptized. Bp. Pearce.

18. — he offered them money,] From this act of Simon's, of wishing to purchase spiritual gifts with money, all purchase of spiritual offices or places by such sordid means has been called simony. Dr. Whitby.

19. — Give me also this power,] How infinitely mistaken is this wretch, if he thinks that the gifts of the Holy Ghost could be bought and procured by silver or gold; and how much more mistaken is he still, if he thinks that the power of enabling others to confer these gifts could be thus attained, a power which the Apostles themselves did not possess. Dr. Lightfoot.

20. — Thy money perish with thee,] This expression has always been considered rather a prophetical prediction, than an imprecation. Simon by this sinful act struck at the very foundation of the Christian faith, in supposing that the Apostles and other Christians performed their miracles in confirmation of it, by some higher art of magick than that which he had learned, and that they could by the same art teach others to perform similar works for any other end. Dr. Whitby.

The accustomed zeal of St. Peter kindled at the offer of the magician, and in strong language he reproves the offender, "Thy money perish with thee!" But as the Gospel of Christ opens the door to the most inveterate offender, he insinuates that even Simon might be forgiven: "Repent therefore of this thy wickedness, and pray God, if perhaps the thought of thine heart may be forgiven thee." At this admission the sinner may rejoice: he may also take up the words of Simon, whether pronounced from affected humility, or from real contrition, "Pray ye to the Lord for me, that none of the things which ye have spoken come upon me." Brewster.

23. — thou art in the gall of bitterness,] By this expression is meant the strongest of bitters, as gall is reckoned to be; and this phrase is used here to express a great degree of sin. So Deut. xxix. 18, idolatry is expressed by the Israelites having among them "a root that beareth gall and wormwood." See also Heb. xii. 15. Bp. Pearce.

—— the bond of iniquity.] Meaning the hardest of all bondage and slavery, even that of sinful lusts. Bp. Mann.

25. — and preached the gospel in many villages of the Samaritans.] Thus were the Apostles ever mindful of the commission they had received, and of the necessity of putting it in execution. And in this instance the storm raised by the adversary against the Church turned out to the furtherance of the Gospel, being made the means of wafting the seeds of evangelical truth to distant lands, in order to a more plentiful and glorious harvest. Bp. Horne.

26. — unto Gaza, which is desert.] Gaza was at the southwest point of Judea. See note at Judg. xvi. 1. It was destroyed by Alexander the Great, and so made desolate; whence Strabo describes it as having been, and still continuing, "desert." Dr. Wells.

The words, "which is desert," seem to be added to distinguish the Gaza here meant from another Gaza in the tribe of Ephraim, (1 Chron. vii. 28,) not far from the place where Philip now was. Dr. Lightfoot.

27. — a man of Ethiopia, an eunuch] An eunuch or chamberlain. Bp. Pearce. By Ethiopia is not here to be understood the Asiatick Ethiopia, or part of Arabia, so styled in the Old Testament, but the African Ethiopia, lying below Egypt, in the south part of Africa. Candace had long been the name of the queens of this country, as we learn from Pliny, Strabo, and Dio. Dr. Wells.

—— had come to Jerusalem for to worship,] It is probable that he had embraced the Jewish faith, having been converted by the Jews who from Alexandria may have spread themselves into Ethiopia. Dr. Whitby.

What gave this distinguished Ethiopian favour in the sight of God was his extraordinary piety, which led him to the temple at Jerusalem. The fame of this temple, diffused abroad among the surrounding nations, brought many to inquire continually "concerning the name of the Lord" who resided in it, and to worship Him in the court assigned them for that purpose, which was therefore called the court of the Gentiles. Among these came this lord of Ethiopia, who, engaged as he must of course be by his office in a multiplicity of worldly affairs, and advanced to the height of worldly honour, could find time and inclination, it seems, to take a long journey on account of religion; thinking himself never so well employed, as when attending the city and court of the great King, never so highly honoured as when suffered to prostrate himself before Jehovah, the God of Israel. Bp. Horne.

Though an Ethiopian, and many thousand miles distant from Jerusalem; though a great officer of state, and necessarily swallowed up in a crowd of business, yet he came "to Jerusalem for to worship." No way so long, so rugged and difficult, no charge or interest so dear and great, as to hinder a good man from minding the concernments of religion. No slender and trifling pretences, no little and ordinary occasions, should excuse our attendance upon places of publick worship: behold here a man that thought it not much to take a journey of above four thousand miles, that he might appear before God in the solemn place of divine adoration, the place which God had chosen above all other parts of the world to place His name there.

Anno DOMINI 34.

28 Was returning, and sitting in his chariot read Esaias the prophet.

29 Then the Spirit said unto Philip, Go near, and join thyself to this chariot.

30 And Philip ran thither to him, and heard him read the prophet Esaias, and said, Understandest thou what thou readest?

31 And he said, How can I, except some man should guide me? And he desired Philip that he would come up and sit with him.

32 The place of the scripture which he [a] Isai. 53. 7. read was this, [a] He was led as a sheep to the slaughter; and like a lamb dumb before his shearer, so opened he not his mouth:

33 In his humiliation his judgment was taken away: and who shall declare his generation? for his life is taken from the earth.

34 And the eunuch answered Philip, and said, I pray thee, of whom speaketh the prophet this? of himself, or of some other man?

35 Then Philip opened his mouth, and began at the same scripture, and preached unto him Jesus.

Anno DOMINI 34.

36 And as they went on their way, they came unto a certain water: and the eunuch said, See, here is water; what doth hinder me to be baptized?

37 And Philip said, If thou believest with all thine heart, thou mayest. And he answered and said, I believe that Jesus Christ is the Son of God.

38 And he commanded the chariot to stand still: and they went down both into the water, both Philip and the eunuch; and he baptized him.

39 And when they were come up out of the water, the Spirit of the Lord caught away Philip, that the eunuch saw him no more: and he went on his way rejoicing.

40 But Philip was found at Azotus: and passing through he preached in all the cities, till he came to Cesarea.

CHAP. IX.

1 Saul, going towards Damascus, 4 is stricken down to the earth, 10 is called to the apostleship, 18 and is

28. —sitting in his chariot read Esaias the prophet.] Perhaps the fame which he had heard in Jerusalem of the sufferings and resurrection of Christ may have induced him to read this Prophet. Dr. Whitby.

How will this illustrious Ethiopian rise up in judgment against those Christians, who, in the hours of domestick ease and tranquillity, never open a Bible, when he did not even travel in his chariot without one! A nobleman thus employed was an object that engaged the attention of Heaven; and an Evangelist was sent to sow the seed of eternal life in a ground so well prepared. Bp. Horne.

30. —Understandest thou what thou readest?] This is a question which every reader of the sacred books must frequently put to himself, if he would not read in vain. And happy they who like this nobleman are not offended when it is put to them, but shew the same meek and teachable disposition of mind which he did. Bp. Horne.

33. In his humiliation &c.] The translation of this passage given in our Bibles at Isai. liii. 8, is in some degree different from this. In this passage in the Acts, the Greek or Septuagint translation is followed; whereas in our translation of Isaiah the Hebrew text is directly followed. Bp. Pearce. See notes at Isai. liii.

35. —preached unto him Jesus.] Proved to him, not only from that passage of Isaiah, but from other passages also of the Old Testament, that Jesus was the Son of God, ver. 37. Bp. Pearce.

37. —I believe that Jesus Christ is the Son of God.] Though this belief was the great article propounded, and first preached to every convert; yet, the end of baptism being the remission of sins, which it was declared could be obtained only through faith in His blood, it is certain that believing in the Lord Jesus must include faith in His meritorious death and passion, or, as the Scripture saith, faith in His blood. Dr. Whitby.

We should observe, that he does not merely profess his belief in Jesus, as a Teacher sent from God, or as the Christ expected by the Jews; but he declares his belief that Jesus Christ, the circumstances of whose life and resurrection Philip had related, is "the Son of God," the Messiah, of whom the Prophets wrote, and whom Isaiah in particular had described in terms appropriate to God only. And, when we consider further, that this eunuch was a Jewish proselyte, going to worship at Jerusalem, we cannot but conclude that this confession of faith contained an acknowledgment of the divinity of Christ, since it is known that the Jews actually condemned our Lord to death for assuming the title of "Son of God," (Luke xxii. 70, 71,) which they imagined to be blasphemy. Bp. Tomline.

39. —the Spirit of the Lord caught away Philip,] This miraculous disappearance of St. Philip was perhaps intended to afford the eunuch an additional attestation of the truth of the new religion he had now gladly embraced. Dr. Hales.

——he went on his way rejoicing.] Thus he who came from Ethiopia, treasurer to queen Candace, made his entrance into it again, in a far different character, that of an apostle of Jesus Christ, full of joy in the Holy Ghost: for, as such, the ecclesiastical historians inform us that he was commissioned to preach the Gospel to his countrymen, the truth of which it is related that he finally sealed with his blood. In heaven, he again beholds the face of his own pastor, and father in Christ, numbered with the saints of the Most High, in glory everlasting; with what pleasure do they now look back on the time they spent together over the fifty-third chapter of Isaiah; that small portion of time, productive of so much never-ending joy and comfort to them both! Bp. Horne.

40. —at Azotus:] A town, called Ashdod in the Old Testament, on the coast of the Mediterranean, to the north of Gaza. Bp. Pearce. If what is here related occurred at or near Gaza, the distance from that place to Azotus is between thirty and forty miles. Dr. Lightfoot.

——to Cesarea.] Cesarea was situated on the Mediterranean sea, between Dora and Joppa. It was formerly called "the tower of Strato." Herod the Great improved and beautified the town very much, especially by constructing a very commodious harbour there at a vast expense, and gave it the name of Cesarea, in compliment to Augustus Cesar. This place is very distinguished in the early history of Christianity. Here it was that St. Peter converted Cornelius and his kinsmen, the firstfruits of the Gentiles, chap. x. Here lived St. Philip the Evangelist, chap. xxi. 8. Here St. Paul defended himself against the Jews, and their orator Tertullus, chap. xxiv. Here, in the amphitheatre, Herod Antipas was smitten by an angel of God, chap. xii. 23. And here, in later times, was born Eusebius, the learned historian and chronologer, who was bishop of this city at the beginning of the fourth Christian century. Dr. Wells.

A. D. 35. AND Saul, yet breathing out threatenings and slaughter against the disciples of the Lord, went unto the high priest,

2 And desired of him letters to Damascus to the synagogues, that if he found any of this way, whether they were men or women, he might bring them bound unto Jerusalem.

3 And as he journeyed, he came near Damascus: and suddenly there shined round about him a light from heaven:

4 And he fell to the earth, and heard a voice saying unto him, Saul, Saul, why persecutest thou me?

5 And he said, Who art thou, Lord? And the Lord said, I am Jesus whom thou persecutest: it is hard for thee to kick against the pricks. Anno DOMINI 35.

6 And he trembling and astonished said, Lord, what wilt thou have me to do? And the Lord said unto him, Arise, and go into the city, and it shall be told thee what thou must do.

7 And the men which journeyed with him stood speechless, hearing a voice, but seeing no man.

8 And Saul arose from the earth; and when his eyes were opened, he saw no man: but they led him by the hand, and brought him into Damascus.

9 And he was three days without sight, and neither did eat nor drink.

Chap. IX. ver. 1. And Saul, yet breathing out threatenings &c.] Saul, (afterwards the distinguished apostle St. Paul,) considered as a persecutor of the Church of God, cannot be acquitted of prejudice, partiality, and precipitate judgment, in a cause which demanded cool deliberation, and the most scrupulous care, caution, and sedateness. He was too eager and hasty to consider well the case. Prepossession had blinded him, and he suffered his passion to run before his reason. He too easily took for granted that truth was on his side, without so much as allowing to the other side a fair hearing. This was a very great fault in a person of his good sense: it was the greater because it was a cause of blood, and the lives of many thousands might be concerned in it. To mistake in any such case is exceeding sinful and dangerous; for, if the supposed offence of the persons persecuted be not clearly proved, it is committing murder, instead of doing justice. Dr. Waterland.

The case of St. Paul before his conversion affords a lamentable instance of the effects of a misguided zeal, and should induce us to prevent the danger of an ignorant and erroneous conscience. Most fatal to a man's own self, most pernicious to others, are those blind prepossessions which, not having sound knowledge to temper their heat, rashly go into unwarrantable measures, for which no goodness of intention can make atonement. Dean Stanhope.

—— went unto the high priest, &c.] The Jewish Sanhedrim had not only the power of seizing and scourging offenders against their law, within the bounds of their own country, but, by the connivance and favour of the Romans, might send into other countries, where there were any synagogues that acknowledged a dependence in religious matters upon the council at Jerusalem, to apprehend them. Dr. Cave.

2. — to Damascus] The chief city of Syria, where many Jews lived, as appears from this passage, and from ver. 22. Bp. Pearce. The number of Jews in this city, according to Josephus, amounted to ten thousand. Michaelis.

—— any of this way,] Any of this way or profession, any who were Christians. Bp. Mann.

3. — he came near Damascus:] This happened, according to tradition, where the Syrian town Caucabe was afterwards built, in commemoration of the event, being so named from Cochab, 'a star,' or luminous glory, which then appeared to St. Paul. Dr. Hales.

4. — why persecutest thou me?] The persecutions of Christ's members are represented as the persecutions of Christ Himself, by reason of that sympathy which He has with them under all their sufferings, which makes Him to suffer with them, Heb. iv. 15. Dr. Whitby.

These words carry rather the form of a gentle expostulation, than of anger and reproach, from One who had so just grounds of resentment given Him by the injurious treatment of this mistaken zealot. They express the infinite tenderness of Him, who, even in His glorified state, is a sufferer in His afflicted members, and esteems the wrongs done to any of them, as done to Himself. Dean Stanhope.

5. — I am Jesus whom thou persecutest:] That very despised person, whom Saul till then had thought a deceiver, now appeared to him with all the confessed evidences of the true God. By this appearance of His was proved the certainty of His resurrection, of His living in heaven, of His setting on the right hand of the Majesty on high, of His power and dominion, as Lord over all; the truth of His doctrine and miracles; the reasonableness of that faith so barbarously persecuted; and especially, the dangers of persisting in attempts against Him, sure to be vain in themselves, and fatal to the undertakers. Dean Stanhope.

—— it is hard for thee to kick &c.] This was a proverbial method of expressing impotent rage, (like the ox kicking against the goad,) which hurts only itself, not those against whom it is levelled. Dr. Hales.

It is hard for thee to contend with Me, thy Maker and Governour, who can crush thee at pleasure. All thy attempts against Me are like kicking against the spikes; they will not hurt Me, but, if persisted in, they will prove fatal to thee. Dr. Waterland.

6. — Lord, what wilt thou have me to do?] The temper and deportment, shewn by Saul on this occasion, are such as abundantly declare the probity of his mind. At the same time, we must admire the mercy of God in pouring His inward grace upon his mind. It was under this that every step of the good work of his conversion was made; by this, his every good inclination was excited; by this, he was convinced, enlightened, established, and perfected. Dean Stanhope.

7. — hearing a voice,] They heard a voice, but understood not the distinct words that were spoken. Compare chap. xxii. 9. Dr. Whitby.

8. — when his eyes were opened, he saw no man:] He had closed his eyes, at first, from the excess of light which burst upon him. Abp. Newcome.

9. — and neither did eat nor drink.] So great was his agony of mind, and so sharp his compunction; when, probably, he alone, of all his company, considered his blindness as a just judgment on him for that mental blindness under which he had so long laboured, and for his deafness to the discourse and declarations of the martyred St. Stephen, and for his utter insensibility to all the signs and wonders wrought in support of the Christian faith. That these were the result of his meditations, we may reasonably collect from that which followed, his praying, ver. 11; praying, as is probable, for pardon, with heartfelt sorrow and penitence, to that Lord, whom he had ignorantly persecuted in persecuting His disciples. Dr. Hales.

Anno DOMINI 35.

10 ¶ And there was a certain disciple at Damascus, named Ananias; and to him said the Lord in a vision, Ananias. And he said, Behold, I am here, Lord.

11 And the Lord said unto him, Arise, and go into the street which is called Straight, and enquire in the house of Judas for one called Saul, of Tarsus: for, behold, he prayeth, 12 And hath seen in a vision a man named Ananias coming in, and putting his hand on him, that he might receive his sight.

13 Then Ananias answered, Lord, I have heard by many of this man, how much evil he hath done to thy saints at Jerusalem:

14 And here he hath authority from the chief priests to bind all that call on thy name.

Anno DOMINI 35.

15 But the Lord said unto him, Go thy way: for he is a chosen vessel unto me, to bear my name before the Gentiles, and kings, and the children of Israel:

16 For I will shew him how great things he must suffer for my name's sake.

17 And Ananias went his way, and entered into the house; and putting his hands on him said, Brother Saul, the Lord, even Jesus, that appeared unto thee in the way as thou camest, hast sent me, that thou mightest receive thy sight, and be filled with the Holy Ghost.

18 And immediately there fell from his eyes as it had been scales: and he received sight forthwith, and arose, and was baptized.

11. — of Tarsus:] Tarsus, the native place of St. Paul, situated at the northeast corner of the Mediterranean sea, was a town of such note in the times of the Roman empire, that it was not only made the capital of Cilicia, but was peculiarly honoured with the great privileges of a Roman colony, on which account we read, chap. xxii. 25, that St. Paul pleaded the privilege of being a freeborn Roman. Here were many Jews resident, among whom were the parents of St. Paul. This city possessed an academy, furnished with many eminent men, and hence it was that St. Paul became instructed in liberal knowledge, and so well acquainted with heathen authors. Dr. Wells.

13. — to thy saints] "Saints" was a name by which Christians were commonly distinguished. Bp. Mann.

15. — he is a chosen vessel unto me, &c.] An instrument or minister chosen by Me for the purpose of bearing My name, &c. Abp. Newcome.

17. — Brother Saul,] Ananias now acknowledges him for a brother. Bp. Mann.

18. — and was baptized.] The administration of baptism to such a convert as Saul, under these circumstances, is a sufficient intimation to us, how guilty and fatal is the neglect of those persons, who treat the sacrament of baptism, and other such ordinances, with scorn and contempt, and vainly presume on the privileges of the Gospel, before the seals of the covenant have secured their claim to them. Dean Stanhope.

In the history of St. Paul's conversion we should observe the exceeding great goodness of our blessed Lord, both towards St. Paul and towards the Church. How kind and gracious were the words which our Lord spoke, "Saul, Saul, why persecutest thou Me?" intimating the love and tenderness He had for all His true followers, insomuch that He looked upon any injuries committed against them, as so many injuries committed against Himself. He next gave him a seasonable and very affecting caution. "I am Jesus whom thou persecutest." I am Jesus the Saviour of the world; it is hard for thee to contend with One so much mightier than thou art: stop thy career, and retreat in time. These were moving arguments, and pierced to the very soul. But, to make the impression still stronger, He was pleased to surround him with a dazzling light, and to strike him blind for a season. He had thus the better opportunity of retiring inwards, for the purpose of recollecting and considering. These outward means, together with inward grace, had their full effect, and made Saul become a very obedient and humble convert to the faith of Christ. Thus he was marvellously rescued from the jaws of death and hell, in order to become a great and glorious saint in heaven. But still more considerable was the great goodness herein shewn to the Church; for this conversion not only took off a very furious and dangerous enemy, but it made him one of the kindest and best friends to it. Dr. Waterland.

The conversion of St. Paul is an event which affords the strongest testimony to the truth of Christianity, for it bears the clearest marks of special Divine interposition. It is quite impossible that St. Paul should wilfully have imposed on others, or should have been himself imposed upon by his own enthusiastical feelings, in what he asserted respecting his conversion. He could have no possible motive for imposing on others, and for embracing Christianity, without being convinced of its truth. For interest, power, and reputation, all lay on the side he forsook; and the sect he embraced was under the greatest and most universal contempt. Thus, not only was it impossible that the desire of wealth, fame, or power, could induce him to become a convert to Christ; but, on the other hand, he must have been checked by that desire, as well as by the apprehension of many inevitable and insupportable evils, from taking a part so contradictory to his past life, to all the principles he had imbibed, all the habits he had contracted. Neither could St. Paul have been imposed upon by his own enthusiastical feelings. For the power of imagination, sometimes very strong no doubt, always acts in conformity to the opinions imprinted on the mind at the time of its working, and can no more act against them, than a river can carry a vessel against the current of its own stream. Now his mind, it is well known, (chap. ix. 2,) was strongly possessed with opinions against Christ and His followers. If then, in such a temper, he had imagined that he beheld a vision from heaven denouncing Divine anger against the Christians, it might be accounted for by the natural power of enthusiasm. But that, in the very instant of his being engaged in the fiercest persecution against them, he should on a sudden imagine himself called by a heavenly vision to be the Apostle of Christ, whom, but a moment before, he had deemed an impostor and blasphemer, is in itself wholly incredible, and is so far from being a probable effect of enthusiasm, that just a contrary effect must have been produced from such a cause. But still further to shew that this vision could not be a phantom of St. Paul's own creating, let us observe that he was not alone when he saw it; there were many others in company, whose minds were no better disposed than his to the Christian faith. Could it be possible that the minds of all these men should be so strangely affected at the same time, as to make them believe they saw a great light, and heard a voice from heaven, when in reality they neither saw nor heard any such thing? Could they be so infatuated with the conceit of their own fancies, as to fall down together with Saul, and be speechless through fear, when nothing extraordinary had happened to him or to them? The supposition is quite impossible; and we can only conclude that the conversion of St. Paul was really effected in that miraculous manner which is described. Lord Lyttleton.

When we commemorate, as our Church calls upon us to do, the conversion of St. Paul, we should adore that miraculous grace

Anno DOMINI 35.

19 And when he had received meat, he was strengthened. Then was Saul certain days with the disciples which were at Damascus.

20 And straightway he preached Christ in the synagogues, that he is the Son of God.

21 But all that heard him were amazed, and said; Is not this he that destroyed them which called on this name in Jerusalem, and came hither for that intent, that he might bring them bound unto the chief priests?

22 But Saul increased the more in strength, and confounded the Jews which dwelt at Damascus, proving that this is very Christ.

A. D. 37.

23 ¶ And after that many days were fulfilled, the Jews took counsel to kill him:

[a] 2 Cor. 11. 32.

24 [a] But their laying await was known of Saul. And they watched the gates day and night to kill him.

25 Then the disciples took him by night, and let him down by the wall in a basket.

Anno DOMINI 37.

26 And when Saul was come to Jerusalem, he assayed to join himself to the disciples: but they were all afraid of him, and believed not that he was a disciple.

27 But Barnabas took him, and brought him to the apostles, and declared unto them how he had seen the Lord in the way, and that he had spoken to him, and how he had preached boldly at Damascus in the name of Jesus.

28 And he was with them coming in and going out at Jerusalem.

29 And he spake boldly in the name of the Lord Jesus, and disputed against the Grecians: but they went about to slay him.

which called him to be an Apostle, and bless God for the advantages we have derived from his indefatigable labours. And, though we have been great sinners, we should encourage ourselves from his example with hopes of acceptance, provided we sincerely repent; remembering] that the best way to shew the sincerity of our conversion is, by actions opposite to our former sins, that those virtues may be most conspicuous in our turning to God, which have been most neglected in our state of folly. Nelson.

20. And straightway he preached Christ] It may perhaps be meant, that he did this after he returned from Arabia, to which country, it appears from Gal. i. 17, that he went after his conversion. (But see note at ver. 26.) Some have thought that it was ordered by Providence that there should be an interval of retirement and quiet to St. Paul between his violent persecution of Christians, and his zealous propagation of the Gospel. Bp. Tomline.

22. — increased the more in strength,] Was more confirmed in the knowledge of the Scriptures, and of the truths of Christianity. Pyle.

23. And after that many days &c.] That which here follows took place near three years after his conversion, and after he had come a second time to Damascus, from Arabia, where he had gone, Gal. i. 17, 18. Bp. Pearce.

St. Luke, in this history of the Acts, seems purposely to have omitted this early part of St. Paul's history, as he did afterwards his voyage to Crete, as being both of inferiour importance, compared with his more publick ministry in the populous cities and countries of Asia and Europe, which form the principal part of the Acts, and to which he hastens, after a cursory view of the earlier transactions. Dr. Hales.

25. Then the disciples took him by night, &c.] Self-preservation is a first law of nature. We are not rashly to endanger that life, which is given us for excellent purposes. St. Paul submitted to an expedient which God permitted to be successful. The ways of Providence are easy and satisfactory; and, whatever may appear to the dim sight of mortals, are always beneficial. Even in the propagation of Christianity itself, a miracle is never resorted to, when the same effect could be produced by other means. Brewster.

26. — when Saul was come to Jerusalem,] For the first time after his conversion. His chief motive, he states at Gal. i. 18, was to become acquainted with St. Peter. Dr. Hales.

—— but they were all afraid of him,] They knew that he had been a most furious bigot and persecutor, and were at this time unacquainted with his miraculous conversion; there being then but little intercourse with Damascus, during Herod's war with Aretas. Dr. Hales.

This arrival, although related here, was not till three years after his conversion. So we learn from St. Paul himself, in his first chapter to the Galatians; where, speaking of the events succeeding his conversion, he says, "Immediately, &c." Dr. Stack. The following appears to be the series of the history. 1. St. Paul after his conversion instantly preaches in the synagogues of Damascus that Jesus was the Son of God, ver. 20. 2. Going thence into Arabia, betwixt two and three years after, he returns to Damascus, Gal. i. 17; and of this journey St. Luke, being not with him, gives no account. 3. At his return, being increased in wisdom and strength, he continues many days in Damascus, proving that "Jesus was the Christ." 4. After three years, escaping from Damascus, he comes to Jerusalem, and is by St. Barnabas brought to the Apostles, St. Peter and St. James, and continues there fifteen days, Gal. i. 18, 19. 5. There Christ appears to him in a vision, commanding him "to depart out of Jerusalem;" and he accordingly goes thence to Cesarea, and to Tarsus in Cilicia, chap. ix. 30; xxii. 18; Gal. i. 21. Dr. Whitby.

27. — to the apostles,] To St. Peter and St. John, for at that time he saw no others of them, Gal. i. 18, 19. Bp. Pearce.

28. — coming in and going out] That is, familiarly and intimately conversing with them, and executing his ministry and apostleship together with the other Apostles at Jerusalem. Dr. Wells.

29. — against the Grecians:] Meaning, the Hellenistical Jews, or Jews born and residing in countries where the Greek language was used, and who therefore used the Greek version of the Scriptures. Bp. Pearce.

30. — and sent him forth to Tarsus.] Sent him forth from Cesarea to Tarsus, his native city in Cilicia. Before St. Paul went to Tarsus, he had a revelation made to him, while he was praying in the temple, as is related at chap. xxii. 17, &c. From this period, the history is silent about him till chap. xi. 30, leaving an interval of about five years. Bp. Pearce.

31. Then had the churches rest] The rest here mentioned corresponds exactly in time with the attempt made by Caligula, the Roman emperour, to place his statue in the temple at Jerusalem; the threat of which outrage produced amongst the Jews a consternation which, for a season, diverted their attention from every other object. Archdeacon Paley.

——were edified;] The proper sense of the word edification is the act of making an edifice or building; the raising a superstructure, and fitly framing it together upon some foundation. The Apostles apply the expression sometimes to individuals, but generally to the church of Christians. When it is applied to individuals, edification signifies sometimes advancement in knowledge of our duty, but generally an improvement in the practice of it; it is raising the superstructure of a Christian life upon the pure foundation of a right faith. The word edification, however, is generally in Scripture applied to the duty of promoting peace, order, and unity in the Church of Christ: to that comprehensive and essential duty of establishing and strengthening, by the practice of all charity, that "household of God, built upon the foundation of the Apostles and Prophets, Jesus Christ Himself being the chief corner stone; in whom all the building, fitly framed together, groweth unto an holy temple in the Lord," Eph. ii. 19—21. T. Sykes.

32. —at Lydda.] Lydda lay not far from Joppa, but somewhat more inland, to the north. Josephus tells us it was a village, not yielding to a city in greatness. Dr. Wells.

34. —Jesus Christ maketh thee whole:] We should well observe what an important difference there is between the manner in which this miracle is wrought by St. Peter, and that in which Christ performed His works of Divine power and goodness. The different characters of the servant and Son, the creature and the God, are every where apparent. Dr. Doddridge.

35. —Saron] A town adjoining to Lydda, which gave name to the spacious and fruitful valley between Cesarea and Joppa. Dr. Wells.

36. —Joppa] The nearest seaport to Jerusalem, about forty miles from it. Bp. Pearce.

——Tabitha, which by interpretation &c.] The reason why the sacred author gives this interpretation of her Syriack name seems to be, that she, being a Grecising Jewess, was called by the first name by the Jews, and by the second among the Greeks. Dr. Whitby.

It was common, not only among the Arabs, but also among the Greeks, to give to females the names of such animals as were objects of delight. These two names signify, in Greek and Syriack, an antelope, an animal remarkable for beautiful eyes. Parkhurst.

38. —Lydda was nigh to Joppa,] About ten miles distant. Dr. Hales.

Chap. X. The event here to be related, the conversion of Cornelius, forms a memorable epoch in the history of the Church, as the firstfruits of the conversion of the Gentiles to Christ. Dr. Hales.

Ver. 1. —a centurion] See note at Matt. viii. 5.

——of the band called the Italian band,] A Roman band or cohort consisted of about one thousand men, and in every such band there were several centurions. Bp. Pearce. This Italian band, or cohort, was probably the life-guard of the Roman governour, residing at Cesarea. Dr. Hales.

Cornelius, though by race and education a Gentile, yet as to religion was not an idolater, but a worshipper of the true God, the God of Israel, the Creator of heaven and earth; for the Scripture tells us that he was "a devout man, one that feared God with all his house," who kept only religious servants, who gave much alms to the people, and prayed to God always, which implies that he was a proselyte; yet, not being circumcised, and not having taken upon him to observe the whole law of Moses, he was not accounted a member of the Jewish Church. Dr. Jortin.

2. A devout man, &c.] "Devout" is the term which, throughout this book of Acts, is used for all uncircumcised Gentile con-

God with all his house, which gave much alms to the people, and prayed to God alway.

3 He saw in a vision evidently about the ninth hour of the day an angel of God coming in to him, and saying unto him, Cornelius.

4 And when he looked on him, he was afraid, and said, What is it, Lord? And he said unto him, Thy prayers and thine alms are come up for a memorial before God.

5 And now send men to Joppa, and call for one Simon, whose surname is Peter:

6 He lodgeth with one Simon a tanner, whose house is by the sea side: he shall tell thee what thou oughtest to do.

7 And when the angel which spake unto Cornelius was departed, he called two of his houshold servants, and a devout soldier of them that waited on him continually;

8 And when he had declared all these things unto them, he sent them to Joppa.

Anno DOMINI 41.

9 ¶ On the morrow, as they went on their journey, and drew nigh unto the city, Peter went up upon the housetop to pray about the sixth hour:

10 And he became very hungry, and would have eaten: but while they made ready, he fell into a trance,

11 And saw heaven opened, and a certain vessel descending unto him, as it had been a great sheet knit at the four corners, and let down to the earth:

12 Wherein were all manner of four-footed beasts of the earth, and wild beasts, and creeping things, and fowls of the air.

13 And there came a voice to him, Rise, Peter; kill, and eat.

14 But Peter said, Not so, Lord; for I have never eaten any thing that is common or unclean.

15 And the voice spake unto him again the second time, What God hath cleansed, that call not thou common.

verts, who had renounced idolatry, and worshipped the true God without submitting to the whole ceremonial law. Bp. Mann.

The example of Cornelius shews us that God has His faithful servants in all places, and in all conditions, even in those in which one would least expect to find them. The profession of a soldier is generally thought very unfavourable to religion; but, undoubtedly, true religion never appears to greater advantage than it does in that character; and it pleased God in this instance to accept a person of the military profession, as the firstfruits of the Gentile world. Bp. Horne.

——one that feared God with all his house,] Piety, like the sun, communicates itself to all around it. The manners of a family are often in great measure guided by those of the master. His principles and practices frequently diffuse themselves through the house, and the piety or profaneness, the sobriety or intemperance, the sloth or diligence of servants, discover to the world the nature of that fountain from which they flow. Bp. Horne.

——prayed to God alway.] That is, daily, and at the stated hours of prayer. Dr. Whitby.

3. —about the ninth hour of the day] The ninth hour, or three o'clock in the afternoon, was one of the hours of prayer among the Jews; and the observation of it by Cornelius shews that he must have been instructed in their religion. Bp. Horne.

4. — Thy prayers and thine alms &c.] Thy piety and thy charity are so acceptable to God, that, in recompense for them, He now intends thee a free and full discovery of the true religion and the perfect way of salvation. Pyle.

Cornelius pleased God through his faith in the promise of Christ to come, as all just men under the law did: which faith God did so long accept after Christ was come, till His coming and the mystery of redemption wrought by Him were fully and clearly made known and preached. This had not happened to Cornelius till this time: for though he had heard of Christ's preaching in Galilee and Judea, and of His having been crucified by the Jews, yet he had not heard of His resurrection from the dead, and ascension into glory, or was not assured of it, till it was now confirmed to him by one sent from God Himself. And it is probable, that, having heard indistinctly of the Apostles' preaching, and of the Jews opposing their testimony, and so not knowing what to believe, he had earnestly besought God in his devotions to lead him in the way of truth, and make known to him what he ought to do. Jos. Mede.

The conversion of Cornelius was sudden and miraculous, and a favour was bestowed upon him which was granted to very few. But it should be observed, how well qualified he was for the reception of the Gospel. He had overcome the prejudices of education, and preserved himself free from the reigning vices of his age and country. His military life exposed him no doubt to various temptations, and he had in the Roman army examples of all iniquity. His character in the Scriptures is, that he was pious and charitable: he loved God with all his heart, and his neighbour as himself. It is no wonder that he, who was so near to the kingdom of heaven, entered into it so quickly and so easily. Dr. Jortin.

It is plain from this passage, that, notwithstanding the extraordinary piety and devotion of Cornelius, who was certainly a very moral man, he had something still to do, of which as yet he knew nothing, without which he could not attain to heaven; he must send to Simon Peter to be instructed in the faith of Christ; which doubtless is as clear a demonstration as possibly can be desired, that all the devotion and good works imaginable can never bring us to heaven without Christ, chap. iv. 12. And, therefore, although it is indispensably necessary to do good works, yet we must not trust on them, but on Christ only, for happiness and salvation. Bp. Beveridge.

5. —call for one Simon, whose surname is Peter:] Christ having said to Simon, "Thou art Peter, and upon this rock I will build My Church," we find accordingly that the foundation of a church among the Jews was laid by St. Peter at chap. ii. 47, and here among the Gentiles. Dr. Whitby.

The angel did not himself convert and baptize Cornelius; for the dispensation of the Gospel was committed not to angels, but to men, and all things must be done in order, as God has thought proper to appoint in the Church. Bp. Horne.

Extraordinary means of information are never to be expected, when ordinary instruction can be found. A truth, which destroys enthusiasm in every shape, and places the faith of the Gospel above imposture or deceit. Brewster.

9. —upon the housetop &c.] Probably for privacy; see note at 1 Sam. ix. 25; or for the purpose of praying towards Jerusalem, as did Daniel, Dan. vi. 10.

——about the sixth hour:] About noon, being one of the hours of daily prayer. Dr. Whitby.

14. —common or unclean.] By common food, the Jews meant such as was eaten by the Gentiles, but by the law of Moses forbidden to the Jews, to whom therefore it was unclean. Bp. Mann.

15. —What God hath cleansed, &c.] What God hath by this action declared to be clean, do not thou pronounce to be unclean. Bp. Pearce.

Anno DOMINI 41.

16 This was done thrice: and the vessel was received up again into heaven.

17 Now while Peter doubted in himself what this vision which he had seen should mean, behold, the men which were sent from Cornelius had made enquiry for Simon's house, and stood before the gate,

18 And called, and asked whether Simon, which was surnamed Peter, were lodged there.

19 ¶ While Peter thought on the vision, the Spirit said unto him, Behold, three men seek thee.

20 Arise therefore, and get thee down, and go with them, doubting nothing: for I have sent them.

21 Then Peter went down to the men which were sent unto him from Cornelius; and said, Behold, I am he whom ye seek: what is the cause wherefore ye are come?

22 And they said, Cornelius the centurion, a just man, and one that feareth God, and of good report among all the nation of the Jews, was warned from God by an holy angel to send for thee into his house, and to hear words of thee.

23 Then called he them in, and lodged them. And on the morrow Peter went away with them, and certain brethren from Joppa accompanied him.

24 And the morrow after they entered into Cesarea. And Cornelius waited for them, and had called together his kinsmen and near friends.

25 And as Peter was coming in, Cornelius met him, and fell down at his feet, and worshipped him.

Anno DOMINI 41.

26 But Peter took him up, saying, Stand up; I myself also am a man.

27 And as he talked with him, he went in, and found many that were come together.

28 And he said unto them, Ye know how that it is an unlawful thing for a man that is a Jew to keep company, or come unto one of another nation; but God hath shewed me that I should not call any man common or unclean.

29 Therefore came I unto you without gainsaying, as soon as I was sent for: I ask therefore for what intent ye have sent for me?

30 And Cornelius said, Four days ago I was fasting until this hour; and at the ninth hour I prayed in my house, and, behold, a man stood before me in bright clothing,

31 And said, Cornelius, thy prayer is heard, and thine alms are had in remembrance in the sight of God.

32 Send therefore to Joppa, and call hither Simon, whose surname is Peter; he is lodged in the house of one Simon a tanner by the sea side: who, when he cometh, shall speak unto thee.

33 Immediately therefore I sent to thee; and thou hast well done that thou art come. Now therefore are we all here present before God, to hear all things that are commanded thee of God.

34 ¶ Then Peter opened his mouth, and

This vision is evidently formed upon the legal distinction of clean and unclean creatures, which are here made to represent, by their different properties and qualities, the corresponding different tempers and dispositions of good and bad men, believers and unbelievers, Jews and Gentiles: so that, by the union of clean and unclean in the mystical sheet, which contained all manner of creatures, was denoted the purification of the Gentiles by faith, who were once unclean, and their junction with the believing Jews in the Christian or universal Church. Bp. Horne.

It was necessary and expedient that this liberty of eating meats indifferently should be thus fully declared to the Jews, because, since the laws restricting them in these matters were given by God for the very purpose of separating them from other nations, they did not dare to transgress these laws without a Divine revelation. Dr. Whitby.

16. This was done thrice:] As Pharaoh's dream was doubled, to convey a certain assurance of the thing, Gen. xli. 32. Dr. Whitby.

22. — a just man,] Rather, "a righteous man," one who was a strict observer of what was esteemed the practical duty of a Jew. Bp. Pearce.

23. — certain brethren from Joppa] Brethren or fellow Christians. Bp. Mann. They were six in number; see chap. xi. 12. St. Peter seems to have taken these brethren with him as witnesses of all that might occur, and to prevent misrepresentations. Bp. Pearce.

26. But Peter took him up, &c.] Observe here that St. Peter refused to be worshipped; nor can he be supposed in his glorified state to desire, or to accept, that worship, which, he intimates in this passage, ought to be paid to God only, and not to man or any creature. Bp. Mann.

— I myself also am a man.] I am one encompassed with the infirmities of mortality, like yourself; a fellow-creature, whose duty it is to join with you in the worship of Him to whom alone worship is due. This is one part of St. Peter's conduct, amongst many, which his pretended successors in the see of Rome have been very far from solicitous to imitate. Bp. Horne.

28. — Ye know how that it is an unlawful &c.] It was not unlawful so to do by the law of Moses; but the comment of the scribes upon the law, or the custom of the country, had made it unlawful. Bp. Pearce.

30. — Four days ago I was fasting until this hour;] His meaning is, that, four days since, he was fasting till the same hour of the day, as that in which he was now speaking to St. Peter. Dr. Whitby.

34. Then Peter opened his mouth,] In this speech, St. Peter appeals to the general knowledge even of the Gentiles, in the regions through which the Gospel was preached, of the active benevolence and miracles of mercy performed by Jesus Christ, in the course of His ministry, as the surest test that God was with Him. He vouches the reality of His miracles, of His crucifixion, and of His resurrection, by the testimony of the Apostles, His chosen witnesses, who, from their number, knowledge, and integrity, were sufficient to satisfy the most scrupulous inquirers.

42 And he commanded us to preach

And he supports the testimony of the Apostles to these facts, by the whole series of ancient prophecy, addressed to the Jews indeed, but foretelling the universal redemption of mankind through faith in Christ. Dr. Hales.

—— I perceive that God is no respecter &c.] That is, God does not shew favour to the Jews because they were the children of Abraham, if, by rejecting the Gospel, they cease to behave and act like Abraham; which, if the Gentiles, by receiving the Gospel, do, they will be accounted children of Abraham and heirs of the promises. Bp. Horne.

35. But in every nation &c.] That is, the partition wall is broken down, and the people of every nation, as well as the Jewish, are accepted, upon the same terms of faith and obedience, whenever, by God's grace, they come into them, as Cornelius did, and as the whole heathen world afterwards did, upon the publication of the Gospel. Bp. Horne.

We hence collect, that, so long as we are careful to remember and acknowledge that Christ is the only Redeemer, by whom we have access to the Divine mercy and favour, and that there is no other name under heaven given unto men by which they may be saved, we may fairly allow to these words an extensive signification; and we may be permitted to say, that God, the universal Father of all, hath put it in the power of every one who comes into the world to perform his duty; that He requires no more than He has given him; that He will extend His mercy to all those who act a sober and rational part to the best of their understanding and ability, and that, to such, Christ is a Saviour, though they never had the opportunity and the happiness of knowing Him. Dr. Jortin.

This declaration must be considered as applying to those only who were never made acquainted with the Gospel; and still their acceptance will be for the sake of Jesus Christ, who died as a propitiation for the sins of the whole world. The merits of His death are not limited to those who call upon His name, for "How shall they call on Him in whom they have not believed? and how shall they believe in Him of whom they have not heard? and how shall they hear without a preacher?" Rom. x. 14. St. Paul, by thus shewing that it has been absolutely impossible for a great part of mankind to believe in the Gospel, intimates that their unbelief will not be imputed to them for a fault. He also says, that "the Gentiles are a law unto themselves," Rom. ii. 14; therefore Gentiles, Jews, and Christians, have all had their respective rules of conduct equally derived from God, by which they will be judged at the last day: and the salvation of the Jew and the Gentile will be no less owing to the merits of Christ, than that of the Christian; "for there is none other name under heaven given among men, whereby we must be saved." Bp. Tomline.

Some persons have grafted a dangerous errour on St. Peter's declaration of the terms of acceptance with God, that of undervaluing and excluding Christianity, as if to fear God and work righteousness, under any forms of religious belief, were the only duties essentially necessary to salvation. Such an opinion, however, is fully refuted by the case of Cornelius himself, who, though he possessed these requisites, was further, by a special revelation, required to embrace Christianity; also by the general commission of the Apostles, to publish the Gospel throughout the whole world, or glad tidings of salvation on the further terms of faith and baptism in the name of the Trinity. Upon both these accounts St. Peter required Cornelius to be baptized, or admitted into the Christian Church, and entitled thereby to its higher benefits and privileges. Dr. Hales.

36. —preaching peace by Jesus Christ:] Peace; that is, pardon of sins, and reconciliation with God for those who believe in Jesus Christ. Bp. Pearce.

—— (he is Lord of all:)] God having exalted Him to be a Prince and a Saviour, to give repentance and remission of sins, chap. v. 31. Dr. Whitby.

38. —and with power:] The power of confirming His mission by stupendous miracles. Dr. Whitby.

—— who went about doing good,] The great work and business of our Lord, during His ministry on earth, was to do good; the most pleasant and delightful, the most happy and glorious, work in the world. He did good to the souls of men by endeavouring to promote their spiritual and eternal happiness; He did good also to the bodies of men, by procuring their temporal good, and contributing as much as possible to their happiness in the present life: and, in both of these particulars, we ought to make His example the object of our imitation. Abp. Tillotson.

41. Not to all the people, but unto witnesses chosen] We have a strong and well known example of the fairness of the sacred writers, in their unanimously stating, that Christ after His resurrection appeared to His disciples alone. The most common understanding must have perceived, that the history of the resurrection would have come with more advantage, if they had related that Jesus appeared, after He was risen, to His foes as well as His friends, to the Scribes and Pharisees, the Jewish council, and the Roman governour: or even if they had asserted the publick appearance of Christ in general unqualified terms, without noticing, as they have done, the presence of His disciples on each occasion, and noticing it in such a manner, as to lead their readers to suppose that none but disciples were present. They could have represented it one way as well as the other. And if their point had been to have the religion believed, whether true or false; if they had fabricated the story from the beginning; or if they had been disposed either to have delivered their testimony as witnesses, or to have worked up their materials and information as historians in such a manner, as to render their narrative as specious and unobjectionable as they could; in a word, if they had thought of any thing but of the truth of the case, as they understood and believed it; they would, in their account of Christ's several appearances after His resurrection, at least have omitted this restriction. At this distance of time, the account, as we have it, is perhaps more credible than it would have been the other way; because this manifestation of the historians' candour is of more advantage to their testimony, than the difference in the circumstances of the account would have been to the nature of the evidence. But this is an effect which the Evangelists could not foresee, and I think it was by no means the case at the time the books were composed. Archdeacon Paley. See the note from Bishop Horsley at Mark xvi.

42. —the Judge of quick and dead.] Our Saviour tells us, that "the Father judgeth no man, but hath committed all judgment unto the Son," John v. 22. And again: "The Father hath given Him authority to execute judgment also, because He is the Son of man," John v. 27. How happy it is for us to have a Judge so favourable to us, that He was content to be Himself the sacrifice to redeem us from the punishment due to our sins! When we consider ourselves, how wretched and weak we are, how perpetually doing wrong, either wilfully or ignorantly, and contemplate the infinite majesty, holiness, and justice of God, what account can we hope to give of ourselves to Him, whose eyes are purer than to behold iniquity? But God hath withdrawn His terrours, and has given a Man to be the Judge of men: so that we may say of our Judge, what the Apostle to the Hebrews says of our High Priest; "We have not a Judge which cannot be touched with the feeling of our infirmities; but was in all points tempted like as we are, yet without sin." Bp. Sherlock.

44. —the Holy Ghost fell on all them &c.] Enabling them to speak with divers tongues, ver. 46. This giving of the Holy Ghost before baptism, contrary to the usual manner, seems to have been intended for a proof to the Jews here present, that God would have the Gentiles called into Christianity, and that what St. Peter had done (as is said at ver. 23, &c.) was by Divine appointment. Bp. Pearce.

This was a second confirmation of the admission of the Gentiles to the Gospel; a miracle added by God to the doctrine preached by St. Peter, that nothing was now to be accounted common or unclean; for, when He had poured the Holy Ghost upon the uncircumcised as well as upon the circumcised, there was proof sufficient that God now intended no difference between them. Dr. Lightfoot.

47. Can any man forbid water, &c.] These words contain a plain and convincing demonstration of the errour of the doctrine maintained by the Quakers, that water-baptism is unnecessary to those who have received the inward baptism of the Spirit; since the Apostle here not only declares that water-baptism ought to be administered to these persons because they had already been baptized with the Holy Ghost, but also commands them to be baptized on this very account. Dr. Whitby.

These effusions of the Holy Spirit, liberal, glorious, and manifestly Divine as they were, did not supersede the necessity of those sacraments, which Christ had left, as ordinary marks and means of conferring and expressing Church membership amongst His followers. Dean Stanhope.

48. —in the name of the Lord.] Into the belief of Jesus Christ. Dean Stanhope. According to the form appointed at Matt. xxviii. 19. See note there from Abp. Secker.

Thus did St. Peter first exert the power of the keys granted to him by his gracious Master, (Matt. xvi. 19,) by being the foremost of the Apostles to open the door of faith to the firstfruits of the Jews, on the memorable day of Pentecost, and of the Gentiles, on this equally memorable day of their conversion. Dr. Hales.

Chap. XI. ver. 2. —they that were of the circumcision] Those converted Jews who still retained a religious regard to the legal rites, to those especially which tended to distinguish the Jewish from the Gentile people. Pyle.

—— contended with him,] We here observe, that the Christians who had been converted from Judaism took upon them to call St. Peter to account. But surely they would not have dared to do this, or to contend with him, if he had been then acknowledged for supreme head of the Church, and infallible judge of controversies. That doctrine was certainly unknown in those days. Nor does St. Peter's conduct on this occasion at all countenance such an opinion; for, instead of silencing them by his authority, he patiently pleads his cause before them, and convinces their understanding by his reasoning. Bp. Mann.

4. —expounded it by order] Regularly expounded the several particulars. Bp. Mann.

9 But the voice answered me again from heaven, What God hath cleansed, that call not thou common.

10 And this was done three times: and all were drawn up again into heaven.

11 And, behold, immediately there were three men already come unto the house where I was, sent from Cesarea unto me.

12 And the spirit bade me go with them, nothing doubting. Moreover these six brethren accompanied me, and we entered into the man's house:

13 And he shewed us how he had seen an angel in his house, which stood and said unto him, Send men to Joppa, and call for Simon, whose surname is Peter;

14 Who shall tell thee words, whereby thou and all thy house shall be saved.

15 And as I began to speak, the Holy [a] Chap. 2. 4. Ghost fell on them, [a] as on us at the beginning.

16 Then remembered I the word of the [b] John 1. 26. Lord, how that he said, [b] John indeed baptized with water; but ye shall be baptized with the Holy Ghost.

17 Forasmuch then as God gave them the like gift as he did unto us, who believed on the Lord Jesus Christ; what was I, that I could withstand God?

Anno DOMINI 41.

18 When they heard these things, they held their peace, and glorified God, saying, Then hath God also to the Gentiles granted repentance unto life.

19 ¶ [c] Now they which were scattered abroad upon the persecution that arose about Stephen travelled as far as Phenice, and Cyprus, and Antioch, preaching the word to none but unto the Jews only. [c] Chap. 8. 1.

20 And some of them were men of Cyprus and Cyrene, which, when they were come to Antioch, spake unto the Grecians, preaching the Lord Jesus.

21 And the hand of the Lord was with them: and a great number believed, and turned unto the Lord.

22 ¶ Then tidings of these things came unto the ears of the church which was in Jerusalem: and they sent forth Barnabas, that he should go as far as Antioch. A.D. 42.

23 Who, when he came, and had seen the grace of God, was glad, and exhorted them all, that with purpose of heart they would cleave unto the Lord.

24 For he was a good man, and full of the Holy Ghost and of faith: and much people was added unto the Lord.

14. — shall be saved.] Will be placed in a state of salvation. Abp. Newcome.

17. — the like gift] The Holy Ghost enabling them to speak with tongues, chap. x. 46, as He had done the Apostles at the day of Pentecost. Bp. Pearce.

18. — they held their peace,] They ceased from expostulation, they acquiesced or were quieted. Abp. Newcome.

—— Then hath God also to the Gentiles &c.] The Jews entertained the most exalted ideas of themselves, and the lowest of all other nations, as if the Divine blessing were designed for themselves exclusively. They imagined that the Messiah was to make them a glorious people, and destroy or enslave all other nations; thus they had no idea that others could be saved, except by being made proselytes to their law. Hence it was that they were so much astonished that the Holy Ghost should fall on the Gentiles, chap. x. 45, and that God should grant unto them repentance unto life. Hence also the unbelieving Jews forbade the Apostles "to speak to the Gentiles that they might be saved," 1 Thess. ii. 16, and cried out against St. Paul, as one not fit to live, because he said that Christ would send him to the Gentiles, chap. xxii. 21, 22. Dr. Whitby.

—— granted repentance unto life.] Granted that they also, on their repenting and believing, should be partakers of eternal life. Bp. Pearce.

19. — Phenice,] Or Phenicia, the country on the seacoast north of Judea, including Tyre and Sidon.

—— Antioch,] Antioch was situated in the north of Syria, on the river Orontes, about twelve miles from the shore of the Mediterranean sea. It received its name from Seleucus Nicanor, the first king of Syria after Alexander the Great, in memory of his father Antiochus, and was afterwards the royal seat of the succeeding kings of Syria. It is famous in Christian history, among other things, for being the birthplace of St. Luke, and in the earlier times of Christianity its bishop was honoured with the title of Patriarch. It was admirably fortified by nature and art, and was adorned with many sumptuous palaces and temples, answerable to the reputation of so great a city. Dr. Wells.

—— to none but unto the Jews only.] Those preachers not having heard of the vision, which St. Peter had seen, and the consequences of it. Bp. Pearce.

20. — unto the Grecians,] Meaning probably the Grecizing Jews, or Jews who spoke the Greek language. See ver. 19. The natives of Cyprus and Cyrene, speaking the Greek language, preached to these Jews, while others who spoke only the Jewish language, preached to those who understood that language. Bp. Pearce.

21. — the hand of the Lord was with them:] His power enabled them to work miracles. Abp. Newcome.

23. — had seen the grace of God,] Had seen how gracious God had been to them. Bp. Mann. Had seen the happy effects of God's sanctifying Spirit among them, their exemplary manners, their eminent faith, with all its precious fruit. Brewster.

24. For he was a good man, &c.] The fruit of the ministry may most reasonably be expected to abound, where actions teach as well as words; and where the diligence of exhortation is seconded and set home upon the hearers by the influence of example. Great thanks are due to God for the benefit of such teachers, where they are found: great respect and honour, and praise, are due to the teachers themselves. Dean Stanhope.

—— and full of the Holy Ghost] It should be observed, that "the Holy Ghost," in scriptural language, sometimes signifies the person of the Holy Ghost, sometimes His miraculous gifts, and sometimes the moral effects and influences of the doctrine delivered to us by the Spirit of God. In either of the two former senses, a person is spoken of as "full of the Holy Ghost," when he is actually inspired by Him, or miraculously conducted and directed by Him either in words or actions, chap. vii. 55; Luke iv. 1. In the latter sense of the word, a person is said to be full of the Holy Ghost, when his mind, under the moral influences of the Spirit of God, and of "the doctrine which is according to 27 ¶ And in these days came prophets from Jerusalem unto Antioch.

28 And there stood up one of them named Agabus, and signified by the spirit that there should be great dearth throughout all the world: which came to pass in the days of Claudius Cesar.

29 Then the disciples, every man according to his ability, determined to send relief unto the brethren which dwelt in Judea:

godliness" is, in an eminent manner, zealous for promoting the truth, and for the practice of good works. In this sense, it is here spoken of St. Barnabas. Dr. S. Clarke.

26. — the disciples were called Christians first] The enemies of the Gospel had called them Nazarenes in contempt, and among themselves they had been styled "disciples," "believers," "brethren." It is of great importance that all who bear the name of Christians should be duly sensible of the weighty obligations which it lays upon them; for these cannot be less than a firm belief of the doctrines, a conscientious obedience to the precepts, and as exact a conformity as we are capable of to the example, of that Christ, after whom we are called. Dean Stanhope.

The followers of Christ's religion in subsequent times gloried so much in the name of Christians, that they would acknowledge no other before the face of their enemies, although hated, reviled, tormented, and martyred for it. And all who are called by this name should be careful to believe and practice what Christ taught, to imitate His example, who was made perfect through His sufferings, to cleave with purpose of heart to the Lord, and to avoid all manner of evil, which, when they took this name, they solemnly renounced. Nelson.

27. — came prophets] Or inspired teachers. Dr. Hales. St. Paul in different parts of his writings enumerates prophecy among the various gifts bestowed upon the several members of the Church. Dr. Stack.

28. — throughout all the world:] The word translated "world" signifies sometimes the Roman empire, and sometimes only the land of Judea. See note at Luke ii. 1. That in the present instance the land of Judea is meant, seems probable; for, if the dearth had extended to Syria, where Antioch was, or had been expected there, the Christians in that city would scarcely have been able to relieve those of Judea. Josephus too, speaking of this dearth in the reign of Claudius as having happened in Judea, not only says nothing of its extending to other parts, but tells us that large quantities of corn were sent up to Jerusalem from other countries. Bp. Pearce.

29. — determined to send relief] What could more conduce to the honour of the name so lately taken, than these fruits of charity, so agreeable to the import of the name, sent as a relief to their brethren against the approaching famine. Dean Stanhope.

30. — to the elders] These were persons appointed for the government of the churches. Bp. Pearce.

—— and Saul.] This was St. Paul's second journey to Jerusalem, about eight years after his conversion. Bp. Mann.

Chap. XII. ver. 1. — Herod the king] This was Herod Agrippa, son of Aristobulus, and grandson of Herod the Great. See note at Matt. ii. 1. He was made king of Iturea, Trachonitis, and other provinces by the emperour Caligula; and to these the emperour Claudius afterwards added Judea and Samaria. Bp. Pearce.

The accuracy of the sacred writer, in the expressions which he uses, is in this instance remarkable. There was no portion of time for thirty years before, or ever afterwards, in which there was a king at Jerusalem, a person exercising that authority in Judea, or to whom that title could be applied, except the three last years of this Herod's life, within which period the transaction here recorded took place. Archdeacon Paley.

2. And he killed James the brother of John] St. James the elder. St. James and St. John were the sons of Zebedee, Matt. x. 2. Thus fell St. James, the first of the Apostles that gained the crown of martyrdom, cheerfully taking that cup, of which he had long since told his Lord that he was most willing to drink, Matt. xx. 22. Dr. Cave.

4. — to four quaternions] A quaternion is a band of four; so that the prison guard consisted of sixteen soldiers. Bp. Mann.

—— intending after Easter &c.] "After the passover," that is, after the days of unleavened bread, mentioned at ver. 3.

In and from the times of the Apostles, there has been always observed an anniversary festival in memory of Christ's resurrection, called in our language the festival of Easter, which is supposed by some to be derived from the old Saxon word oster, signifying to rise. It is observed on the Sunday following the day of the Jewish passover. Wheatly. Hence the Greek phrase, "after the passover," is here rendered in our translation, "after Easter."

5. — prayer was made without ceasing] We are here instructed, on seeing the events which followed, how instrumental the intercessions of good people are toward procuring deliverance from God; and how efficacious their prayers, when unanimous and publick, especially when the subject of them is eminently serviceable to the glory of God, and the benefit of religion. Dean Stanhope.

8 And the angel said unto him, Gird thyself, and bind on thy sandals. And so he did. And he saith unto him, Cast thy garment about thee, and follow me.

9 And he went out, and followed him; and wist not that it was true which was done by the angel; but thought he saw a vision.

10 When they were past the first and the second ward, they came unto the iron gate that leadeth unto the city; which opened to them of his own accord: and they went out, and passed on through one street; and forthwith the angel departed from him.

11 And when Peter was come to himself, he said, Now I know of a surety, that the Lord hath sent his angel, and hath delivered me out of the hand of Herod, and from all the expectation of the people of the Jews.

12 And when he had considered the thing, he came to the house of Mary the mother of John, whose surname was Mark; where many were gathered together praying.

17 But he, beckoning unto them with the hand to hold their peace, declared unto them how the Lord had brought him out of the prison. And he said, Go shew these things unto James, and to the brethren. And he departed, and went into another place.

6. —bound with two chains:] It was the manner of the Romans to fasten the prisoner with a small and light chain to some soldier, who was appointed to guard him; one end of the chain being fastened to the right hand of the prisoner, and the other end to the left hand of the soldier. It seems to have been for the better securing of St. Peter from any escape that they bound him, as is here described, with two chains to two soldiers. Bp. Pearce.

8. —Cast thy garment about thee,] Meaning the cloak, or loose upper garment which they wore when they went out, but not when they remained within doors. Bp. Mann.

——where many were gathered together praying.] Hence it appears, that, in those times of peril and persecution, they held their sacred assemblies in the night; for St. Peter came to them, and found them thus praying before daylight, ver. 18. Dr. Whitby.

15. —It is his angel.] Meaning, it is an angel in his shape; for it was familiarly received amongst the Jews, that angels sometimes assumed the shape of this or that person. Dr. Lightfoot.

17. —shew these things unto James, and &c.] That they might bless God for this extraordinary granting of their prayers, and that they might be confirmed by it in the faith, and in their expectation of Divine assistance and protection, in their endeavours to promote the interests of the Gospel. Dr. Whitby. This James was St. James the Less, the son of Alpheus, mentioned at Matt. x. 3.

——and went into another place.] Out of Herod's dominions, to avoid the tyrant's fury; probably to Antioch, (Gal. ii. 11,) to visit that first Gentile Church, whose bounty he had so recently shared, chap. xi. 29. Dr. Hales.

19. —he went down — to Cesarea,] Josephus relates, that Herod went to Cesarea for the purpose of celebrating a solemnity in honour of Claudius Cesar. Dr. Whitby.

The expression "from Judea to Cesarea" implies that Cesarea was not in the country of Judea. Accordingly, both Strabo and Josephus place Cesarea in Phenicia. Biscoe.

20. —their country was nourished by the king's country.] That the Tyrians, &c. chiefly derived their supply of provisions from the Jews, appears from 1 Kings v. 9, 11; Ezra iii. 7; and especially from Ezek. xxvii. 17, where it is said of Tyre, "Judah, and the land of Israel, they were thy merchants: they traded in thy market wheat of Minnith, and Pannag, and honey, and oil, and balm." Bp. Pearce.

21. And upon a set day &c.] The fidelity and accuracy of St. Luke, as an historian, are confirmed by Josephus in every particular of this narration of the death of Herod, as to the place, (Cesarea,) the set day, the gorgeous dress, the acclamations of the assembly, the peculiar turn of the flattery, the manner in which it was received, and the sudden and critical attack of the disease. Archdeacon Paley.

22. And the people gave a shout, saying, &c.] How vain and impious was the applause of this servile multitude, when they were so ready to bestow on a mortal man the title of a divinity: and how wretched the infatuation of his mind, when he could receive that title without horrour, and even with complacency! Thus too often do pomp and power, wealth and grandeur, take away the understanding of their possessors; but never is a mortal nearer to destruction than when he forgets that he is mortal. Dr. Doddridge.

23. —and he was eaten of worms, &c.] Thus is the Almighty Sovereign of the universe known by the judgment which He executes on the haughty kings of the earth, Ps. ix. 16. Well might the Gospel flourish (ver. 24.) on the occasion of such an event. Dr. Doddridge.

Josephus, the Jewish historian, confirms the account here given of the death of Herod, by the following narrative: "In the third year of Herod's being king of all Judea, he exhibited shews to the people in honour of the emperour; and he appeared in the theatre (at Cesarea) dressed in a robe made all of silver tissue, of admirable workmanship. As the sun was then rising, the rays of it coming upon his robe made it shine so bright, that the people cried out, Forgive us if we have hitherto reverenced you only as a man; but from this time we shall acknowledge you to be something superiour to what is mortal. The king did not reprove them, nor reject this blasphemous flattery: and, before he went out of the theatre, he was seized with pains in his bowels, so as to cry out, I whom ye called a god am now going to die. From thence he was carried to his palace immediately; and in the space of five days he died of those pains, which he first felt in the theatre, in the fifty-fourth year of his age, after he had reigned four years over Iturea and Abilene, and three more over Judea." Bp. Pearce.

24. But the word of God grew] See notes at chap. xix. 20.

25. —when they had fulfilled their ministry,] When they had delivered into the hands of the proper persons the sums they had brought from Antioch for the relief of the Christian brethren, chap. xi. 29, 30. Bp. Pearce.

Chap. XIII. ver. 1. —certain prophets and teachers;] Either belonging to the church at Antioch, or occasionally exercising their ministry there, as Barnabas and Saul. They were probably some of those who were scattered by the persecution mentioned at chap. viii. 1, and came down to Antioch, chap. xi. 19; for Niger is by Epiphanius declared to have been one of the seventy disciples, and Lucius being, as the text states, of Cyrene, was probably one of those who came down to Antioch, chap. xi. 20. Dr. Whitby.

——had been brought up with Herod] Meaning Herod Antipas, son of Herod the Great, Luke iii. 1; Matt. xiv. 1. Rich persons, and especially princes, had not only preceptors and attendants, but particular companions in their education, assigned to them. Abp. Newcome.

2. As they ministered &c.] While they were engaged in a course of devotion and fasting. Bp. Mann.

——the Holy Ghost said,] Either by a vision to some of the Prophets, or by a voice addressed to them, or by internal suggestions. Abp. Newcome.

——for the work] The work of publishing the Gospel to the Gentiles. St. Paul, as appears from chap. ix. 15, had already received notice that he was to be sent to the Gentiles. Bp. Pearce.

3. —laid their hands on them, &c.] Thus it appears that the election of these two supernumerary Apostles was equally valid with the election of Matthias, chap. i. and was even distinguished above it by the more immediate appointment of the Holy Spirit Himself, signifying His pleasure by express declaration, and not by lot. Dr. Hales.

Hence we should observe, how necessary it is that they, who are admitted to the sacred ministry of the Gospel, should be externally as well as internally called and publickly ordained to it by the Church. Both Saul and Barnabas were Prophets divinely inspired; and yet it was necessary that they should be outwardly called and ordained, before they were sent forth to preach the Gospel. And this is a full and undeniable argument for the necessity of persons being solemnly and publickly ordained by the imposition of hands, before they undertake to minister in the Church, to whatever gifts or inward calling they may pretend. For none could ever pretend to any inward call to the ministry more than Saul and Barnabas might have done. And, no doubt, the great reason why this their publick ordination is so minutely described, is to prevent any future Christians from expecting that the Holy Ghost would ordain them Himself, when He would not even ordain such men as Saul and Barnabas, but left them to the Church. Bp. Beveridge.

It is very observable from this passage that the Holy Ghost Himself dictated and appointed the ordination of Barnabas and Saul; that though persons are called to the work of the ministry by the Spirit, and educated with proper gifts, yet laying on of hands is required; and, further, that those who are lawfully separated and ordained to the work of the ministry are sent forth by the Holy Ghost. These are natural deductions from this passage of Scripture; and from the whole it is rational to infer, that it is not sufficient for persons to have "the call of the Spirit," but they must likewise be called by men, to exercise the ministerial function. Stackhouse.

4. —unto Seleucia;] This city, built by Seleucus, lay north-west of Antioch, on the Mediterranean sea. Dr. Wells.

Anno DOMINI 45.

5 And when they were at Salamis, they preached the word of God in the synagogues of the Jews: and they had also John to their minister.

6 And when they had gone through the isle unto Paphos, they found a certain sorcerer, a false prophet, a Jew, whose name was Bar-jesus:

7 Which was with the deputy of the country, Sergius Paulus, a prudent man; who called for Barnabas and Saul, and desired to hear the word of God.

8 But Elymas the sorcerer (for so is his name by interpretation,) withstood them, seeking to turn away the deputy from the faith.

9 Then Saul, (who also is called Paul,) filled with the Holy Ghost, set his eyes on him,

Cyprus is reputed to be distant about one hundred miles from the coast of Syria. Dr. Wells.

——in the synagogues of the Jews:] Of whom there were great numbers in this island. It was probably for this reason, rather than because it was the native country of Barnabas, that they went thither; their Divine Master having enjoined His Apostles to go "first to the lost sheep of the house of Israel." Dr. Stack.

——had also John to their minister.] Had John (chap. xii. 12.) to assist them in their ministry. Bp. Mann.

6. —unto Paphos,] The chief city on the western side of Cyprus, and giving name to that tract of the island. Dr. Wells.

——a certain sorcerer,] God having raised Prophets in the Christian Church, and giving His Apostles and the other teachers of His word a power to confirm it with mighty signs and miracles, the Jews, who opposed Christianity, pretended also to be Prophets, and to work miracles by magical arts. Dr. Whitby.

7. —the deputy of the country,] The word, here translated deputy, signifies proconsul. The provinces of the Roman empire were of two kinds; those belonging to the emperour, in which the governour was called Proprætor, and those belonging to the senate, in which the governour was called Proconsul. Now it appears from Dio Cassius that the province of Cyprus, which in the original distribution was assigned to the emperour, had been transferred to the senate, in exchange for some others, so that at this time the title of proconsul was appropriate. Archdeacon Paley.

——a prudent man;] A man of good sense and understanding. Bp. Pearce.

8. —Elymas] Derived from an Arabian word, which signifies a magician. Dr. Hammond.

9. —Saul, (who also is called Paul,)] His Jewish name was Saul; but, being also a citizen of Rome, he had the Roman name of Paul. In the same manner, Silas is called Silvanus, for he also was a Roman citizen, as may be collected from chap. xvi. 37. St. Luke has hitherto called him by his Jewish name, as he has conversed chiefly among Jews; but, as he is now to act in the character of the declared Apostle of the Gentiles, he calls him by his Gentile name. Dr. Lightfoot.

10. —and all mischief,] The Greek word implies cunning and falsehood, as well as wickedness and audacity. Abp. Newcome.

11. —a mist and a darkness;] A mist or dimness first, and then a total loss of sight following it. Bp. Pearce.

12. —astonished at the doctrine of the Lord.] The doctrine confirmed by such Divine power. Pyle.

13. —to Perga in Pamphylia:] Pamphylia was a province of Asia Minor, on the Mediterranean sea, adjoining Cilicia on the east. Perga, a city in it, was famous among the heathens for a temple of Diana, and for yearly festivals held in honour of that goddess. Dr. Wells.

14. —Antioch in Pisidia,] Pisidia was another province, situated north of Pamphylia. The Antioch in this province was one of the cities built by Seleucus in honour of his father Antiochus. Dr. Wells.

——and sat down.] Probably in the seat of the doctors. Dr. Hales. If the rulers of the synagogue had no other knowledge of Barnabas and Saul, they might gather they were preachers from this, that, when they entered the synagogue, they sat down, which was customary with those who taught or preached. Dr. Lightfoot.

15. —after the reading of the law and the prophets] Lessons out of both were read in the morning service of the synagogues on the sabbath day; but, on the other days of the week, only out of the law in the morning. Bp. Pearce.

16. —ye that fear God,] He thus addresses, here and at ver. 26, the proselytes, those who embraced Judaism, but were not Jews by descent. Abp. Newcome.

17. —exalted the people] Raised them from slavery to the high rank of being His chosen people. Abp. Newcome.

18. —suffered he their manners] Patiently bore with them. Or, according to another reading of the original, the sense is, bore, or fed them, as a nurse bears or feeds her child. See the margin.

20. — four hundred and fifty years,] A chronological difficulty here arises, from the circumstance of this period of the Judges in Israel being usually computed considerably less than is here stated. See the dates given in the margin in the books of Judges and Samuel. However, the Jewish historian Josephus agrees with the statement here given. We may naturally, therefore, conclude, that the Apostle adopts the computation which was approved by his nation at the time when he spoke; that so his hearers might not make any objections to his words. Dr. Whitby.

21. — by the space of forty years.] This space includes the time of Samuel as well as that of Saul.

34, 35. And as concerning &c.] Thus, also, he proceeds, that promise of God to the Jewish nation, of the "sure mercies of David," Isai. lv. 3, could only be meant of that absolute promise of the Messiah to spring from his family, a glorious Prince and Saviour, of whom David was a type, and who was called also by his very name, David and the Son of David; and so is in effect the same promise with that of Ps. xvi. 10, "Thou shalt not suffer Thine Holy One (or Thy Christ) to see corruption." Pyle.

34. — now no more to return to corruption,] As Lazarus and the widow's son did. Thus Christ's "dying no more, and death having no more dominion over Him," (Rom. vi. 9,) is a distinguishing privilege of His resurrection above that of any other persons miraculously restored to life, who all returned again to the dark prison of the grave. And this is what made the mercies, here spoken of, constant and continual, as the promise was absolute. Pyle.

—— he said on this wise,] Isaiah said, Isai. lv. 3, "I will make an everlasting covenant with you, even the sure mercies of David;" that is, of Christ the Son of David; for David both in the language of Scripture and of the Jews is frequently used as a type of Christ. Dr. Whitby.

38. — that through this man is preached &c.] That this Jesus is the true Messiah, and that by the sacrifice of His death you have obtained the means of the full pardon of your sins, and of eternal salvation, upon the condition of truly repenting and of embracing His religion. Pyle.

39. And by him all that believe &c.] And this pardon by the blood of Jesus is much more extensive and effectual than what the purgations and sacrifices of the Mosaical law could ever procure for you: for this atonement of Jesus your Messiah reaches to the perfect and eternal forgiveness of every kind and degree of transgression, in them that sincerely believe and obey Him. Pyle.

45 But when the Jews saw the multitudes, they were filled with envy, and spake against those things which were spoken by Paul, contradicting and blaspheming.

46 Then Paul and Barnabas waxed bold, and said, It was necessary that the word of God should first have been spoken to you: but seeing ye put it from you, and judge yourselves unworthy of everlasting life, lo, we turn to the Gentiles.

CHAP. XIV.

1 Paul and Barnabas are persecuted from Iconium. 7 At Lystra Paul healeth a cripple, whereupon they are reputed as gods. 19 Paul is stoned. 21 They pass through divers churches, confirming the disciples in faith and patience. 26 Returning to Antioch, they report what God had done with them.

AND it came to pass in Iconium, that they went both together into the synagogue of the Jews, and so spake, that a great multitude both of the Jews and also of the Greeks believed.

40, 41. — lest that come upon you, &c.] Lest you come under the same character wherein the Prophet described your forefathers in Manasseh's time, (Hab. i. 5,) and for a still more wicked obstinacy and contempt against God, be at last cut off by a destruction more exemplary and amazing than that of the Babylonish captivity. The Apostle seems clearly to refer to their final destruction by the Romans. Pyle.

42. — the next sabbath.] Some think the true meaning of the words in the original to be "in the week between," (as in the margin,) that is, on some other day of the week, the Gentiles not keeping the seventh day holy as did the Jews. Bp. Pearce.

43. — to continue in the grace of God.] To continue steadfast in the profession which God had given them grace to embrace, chap. xiv. 22. Bp. Mann.

44. — came almost the whole city together to hear the word of God.] No wonder that all, even idolatrous nations, should be so ready to hearken to a message, so new, so unexpected, so salutary to them. Buried as they were in a system of belief, irrational in itself, and despised by their wisest philosophers, their conduct on this occasion at least merits some applause, as they were willing to place themselves in the way of instruction, and to listen to new truths which might prove beneficial to them. Surely such heathens will rise up in judgment against these nominal Christians, who, in the midst of a blaze of light, are contented to walk in darkness. Brewster.

46. — lo, we turn to the Gentiles.] Not from the Jews every where, for we find St. Paul still preaching to them in every synagogue where he came, chap. xvii. 2, but from the Jews of Antioch in Pisidia, it not being reasonable that the Jews of other places should be deprived of the Gospel for the perverseness of those at this place. Dr. Whitby.

47. — saying, I have set thee &c.] See Isai. xlix. 6, where is a plain prophecy that Christianity was not to be confined to the Jews, but was to be preached to the Gentiles also. It is probable, from what is said at ver. 2, 4, that St. Paul and St Barnabas had received a particular command from the Holy Ghost for this purpose, and perhaps in the words of Isaiah here quoted by St. Paul. Bp. Pearce.

48. — glorified the word of the Lord:] Glorified the Lord for the word which He had given. Dr. Whitby.

—— as many as were ordained &c.] As many as were fitly disposed and qualified for the Gospel to take root in their hearts. Dr. Hammond.

As many as were duly prepared and disposed in their hearts for the doctrines of eternal life, they with readiness received the word, (as in chap. xvii. 11,) and became Christians. Bp. Mann.

50. — the devout and honourable women,] Meaning, probably, such as were proselytes, (see note at ver. 16,) and, by being of higher quality than others, had more the power of raising a persecution. Bp. Pearce.

51. — shook off the dust of their feet] As they were directed by our Saviour to do, Matt. x. 14. See note there.

—— came unto Iconium.] Iconium was the chief city of Lycaonia, a small province of Asia Minor, lying northeast of Pisidia. Dr. Wells.

The Apostles, thus using only a mild but significant mark of their disapprobation of conduct so reprehensible, departed for another city, leaving behind them an infant Church, rejoicing in its new faith, and comforted by those inestimable spiritual gifts which were universally diffused on the primitive converts of the Gospel. Meanwhile this expulsion of the Apostles was the immediate cause of a greater dispersion of their doctrines, as it occasioned them to penetrate still further into the heart of the country. Thus truth works not in secret: justice seeks not a refuge in darkness: secret plots defeat their own purposes. Brewster.

Chap. XIV. ver. 1. — and also of the Greeks] Jewish proselytes who spoke the Greek language. Dr. Whitby.

Anno DOMINI 45.

2. —the Gentiles,] The heathens—"against the brethren," the Christians.

3. Long time therefore] "Therefore," that is, for the purpose of confirming the great number of believers, and of overcoming this opposition. Abp. Newcome.

5. —and to stone them,] As blasphemers against the law, Deut. xiii. 6, &c. So St. Stephen was stoned for speaking blasphemous words, chap. vi. 13; so St. Paul, ver. 19; and thus they endeavoured to stone our Lord for supposed blasphemy, John x. 33. Dr. Whitby.

It is observable, that St. Paul says of himself, at 2 Cor. xi. 25, "Once was I stoned:" and this stoning is mentioned in this chapter at ver. 19. Had the purpose of the Jews on the present occasion been put in execution, the history would have contradicted the assertion of his having been only once stoned. But, as it is, there is a perfect agreement in the two accounts, although they approach so very near to a contradiction. Archdeacon Paley.

6. —and fled unto Lystra &c.] In this they acted in perfect consistency with the spirit of Christ's religion, which by no means obliges its professors to court unnecessary dangers, as well as agreeably to the directions of our Lord at Matt. x. 23, "When they persecute you in one city, flee ye into another." Dr. Stack.

Here let the rashness of intemperate zeal learn an important lesson. It is no mark of wisdom, and certainly none of religion, to court persecution, and expose our persons to unnecessary danger. Divine Providence watches over the steps of a good man; and when his death or his sufferings will produce advantages, either to himself or to others, which his life or his prosperity cannot effect, his God calls him to suffer or to die, in that way which is best calculated to produce the most beneficial consequences. When that hour arrives, which brings with it so severe a trial, it is a Christian's duty submissively to acquiesce: but as many benefits arise from the various circumstances and changes of human life, he ought to use such wise expedients to extricate himself from impending difficulties, as prudence and his reasonable faculties suggest. St. Paul once escaped privately from the walls of Damascus: and now he avoids an imminent danger by a precipitate flight. Brewster.

——Lystra] This is thought by some to have been the birthplace of Timothy. Dr. Wells.

9. —perceiving that he had faith to be healed,] That he was disposed to believe the Gospel, and was therefore a fit object for a miraculous cure. Abp. Newcome.

Faith, being an act of the understanding, could not be discerned by the eye of sense; this therefore is an instance of that power of discerning the inward workings of men's spirit, mentioned at 1 Cor. xii. 10. Dr. Whitby.

10. Said with a loud voice, &c.] Such persons as these Lycaonians, who were gross idolaters, and little better than barbarians, are apt to be struck and affected more with signs and wonders than with reasons and arguments; and therefore it is that St. Paul, at his first preaching among them, very reasonably and fitly confirms his doctrine by a signal miracle. Bp. Newton.

11. —The gods are come down to us] It was often imagined, not only by the heathen poets, but also by their philosophers, that their gods appeared in a human shape. Dr. Whitby.

12. —Jupiter; —Mercurius,] Mercury was reputed the god of eloquence, and the heathen writers frequently represent Jupiter as accompanied by him. Hence they call St. Paul "Mercurius," because he was the chief speaker. Dr. Doddridge, Beausobre.

13. —of Jupiter, which was before &c.] Whose statue was before the city. The heathens in general supposed that the deity was present in his statue or image. Bp. Pearce.

——before their city,] It was customary to place the temple or statue of the tutelary god of a city before its gate. Abp. Newcome.

——oxen and garlands] Oxen and bulls used to be sacrificed to Jupiter. It was customary to place garlands about the heads of the victims, and also on the statue of the god which was worshipped, and on the priests who offered the sacrifice. Abp. Newcome.

——unto the gates,] The gates of the house where St. Paul and St. Barnabas lodged, for these things were done within the city, ver. 19. Dr. Whitby.

14. —they rent their clothes,] To express their sense and detestation of such blasphemous proceedings. See Matt. xxvi. 65. Dr. Hammond.

To witness that adoration paid to the creature, which only belongs to the Creator, was shocking in the sight of the Apostles, as offering violence to the first principles of rational piety. And herein we discover a wide and essential difference between the teachers of revealed religion, and the most enlightened heathen philosophers: some of whom were desirous of being themselves esteemed gods, and all were content to adopt the popular worship of even the meanest animals. While the primitive Christians, as we are well informed, were willing rather to die, than to worship any heathen idols. Dr. Stack.

15. —are men of like passions] We are not gods, but men of the same nature, and subject to the same infirmities as yourselves. Bp. Mann.

——from these vanities] Pretended and false deities. Idols are frequently spoken of as "vanities" in Scripture. See 1 Kings xvi. 13. Such was Jupiter, or the statue of Jupiter, mentioned at ver. 13. Bp. Pearce.

16. —suffered all nations to walk in their own ways.] Rather, "all the nations;" for the Jewish nation is excepted. Bp. Pearce. God so far suffered them "to walk in their own ways," that He gave them no positive revelation of His will, no written instructions respecting that way in which He would be worshipped, as He had done to the Jews. Dr. Whitby.

17. —he left not himself without witness,] That is, He gave proofs of His Godhead, by His exercising a providence over the world for its comfort and preservation.

The short speech delivered by St. Paul on this occasion is admirable. Disclaiming their intended worship, he declared that he and St. Barnabas were not gods, but men of like infirmities with themselves, who, by preaching the Gospel, wished to turn them from their vain idols to the living God: that although God, for many generations past, had suffered the heathen to follow their own inventions, yet that He had never left Himself unwitnessed, by the continued providence of His goodness, by sending them refreshing showers from heaven, and fruitful seasons, filling their hearts with food and gladness. From these premises, He left them to draw the obvious and necessary conclusion, that it was the height of stupidity and ingratitude to transfer to the creature the worship due only to the Creator. Dr. Hales.

His arguments on this occasion are as forcible, as they are plain and obvious to the meanest capacity. He is the Creator and Preserver of us and of all things; He is the Author and Giver of all the good which we enjoy, and He therefore is the only proper and adequate object of our worship. Bp. Newton.

21. —and Antioch,] Antioch in Pisidia, chap. xiii. 14.

22. —that we must through much tribulation &c.] That those, who would at that time embrace the Gospel of Jesus, must expect to meet with great troubles and oppositions. Bp. Pearce.

To this day however the observation is applicable to every disciple of the Gospel. Though we may not be called to equal sufferings with St. Paul or the first followers of Christ, or with those who in later ages have borne this severe witness to the truth, by being stoned, sawn asunder, slain with the sword, or committed to the flames; yet in most cases the Christian, like his Master, may expect to be tried by sufferings. If our afflictions come not always from without, most assuredly they will from within. Out of the heart of man proceed evil thoughts, and evil propensities of every kind. Here then surely is cause for trouble. But Christian faith triumphs over all: and "these afflictions, which are but for a moment," through the grace of God communicated to every one who thus believeth, "work for us a far more exceeding and eternal weight of glory," 2 Cor. iv. 17. Brewster.

23. —ordained them elders] These elders were the pastors of the several churches, each of his respective one; and they were the overseers of the flock, and feeders of the Church, as their office is described by St. Paul, at chap. xx. 28. They appear to have been considered as the next in dignity to the Apostles, chap. xv. 2, 4, &c. Bp. Pearce. See note at chap. xxi. 18.

The expression here used implies that these elders, or pastors, had a regular and formal appointment. When Christianity made further progress, we read in Scripture that different persons were appointed to preside over different churches; as Timothy over that of Ephesus, and Titus over those in Crete: and St. Paul gives both Timothy and Titus particular directions concerning the ordination of bishops and elders within their respective jurisdictions, 1 Tim. v. 22; Tit. i. 5, &c. If from Scripture we go to the writings of the Apostolical Fathers, we find the clearest proof of the continuance of the office and authority of ministers in their time. We thus ascertain that there was a regular order of clergy in the days immediately after the Apostles; and of its existence in following ages no doubt has ever been entertained. It is fully proved, not only by Christian writers themselves, but by a variety of laws made at various periods respecting the clergy. We trace therefore a regular and continued establishment of persons, to whom were committed the oracles of God, who were invested with authority to instruct the congregations entrusted to their care, to enforce obedience to their laws, and to maintain the unity of the faith in the bond of peace. In addition to this, such is the corruption of human nature, that the experience of all ages teaches us, even without referring to the written word of God, that religion cannot subsist in the world without publick rites, publick worship, and publick teaching: nor can these offices be performed with any degree of propriety or effect, except by persons duly qualified and set apart for that purpose. Bp. Tomline.

If any man may assume authority to preach and perform holy functions, it is certain that religion must fall into disorder and under contempt. Hotheaded men of warm fancies and voluble tongues, with very little knowledge and discretion, would be apt to thrust themselves on to the teaching and governing others, if they themselves were under no government. This would cause the publick service of God to be loathed, and would break and dissolve the whole body. Bp. Burnet.

If ministers be self-ordained, modest merit will never be called forth; presumptuous vanity will be ever ready to obtrude itself; ignorance will overpower diffident wisdom; and what will hinder vicious men from rising into power, especially if any considerable emoluments are annexed to the ministry? Nay, what can hinder doctrines opposite to each other from being taught, to the utter extirpation of all religious principle? What can hinder different men from officiating in such different ways, as to produce disturbance and confusion, and put to flight all religious affection? And how can it be brought about, that certain appearances, modes of dress and behaviour, shall be so associated with piety and virtue, as instantly to produce good feelings in the mind? Besides, the learning requisite to make a man a good minister of religion, requires that the ministry should be made a separate profession. Dr. Hey.

——in every church,] When we consider that in the early times of Christianity, there was so liberal an effusion of the Holy Spirit poured out on great numbers, who had extraordinary credentials, miracles, and the gift of tongues, to prove their mission, it does not seem so necessary, in such a time, and in such a state of things, that the Apostles should have "ordained elders in every church." We have therefore better reasons to conclude that this was at that time settled chiefly with a view to following ages; which, as it was foreseen they would fall off from that zeal and purity which then reigned among them, so would require rule and government to maintain the unity of the Church, and the order of sacred things. And for that reason chiefly we may conclude, that the Apostles settled the order and government in the Church, not so much for the age in which they themselves lived, as to establish, and give credit to, offices and appointments, which, they foresaw, would be yet more necessary to succeeding ages. Bp. Burnet.

——Except ye be circumcised] And so obliged to observe all the ceremonies of the Mosaical institution. Pyle.

The important question, whether the Gentiles converted to Christianity should also be obliged to obey the Mosaick law, was a subject which affected the most deep-rooted prejudices, and roused the strongest passions of every Jewish mind; on which some of the very chief of the Apostles seem to have been divided, if not in opinion, yet in some circumstances of their conduct, and to have expressed this difference of sentiment with considerable warmth, Gal. ii. 11, 12. Dr. Graves.

2.—disputation with them,] With the Jews who came from Judea; "they determined," that is, the brethren or disciples of Antioch determined. Bp. Pearce.

A signal advantage derived from the relation of these divisions in the infant Church is, that it affords the strongest collateral evidence that the whole scheme is founded in truth. Whenever the conductors of a scheme of imposition fall into contention and dispute, the deceit is immediately detected. Not so with the Gospel; though its teachers might in some points for a short time disagree, these disagreements impeded not in the least the completion of their sacred work; for this was conducted by the hand of God. Dr. Graves.

about ten or eleven years before, when Cornelius the centurion was converted, chap. x. 1. By the term "Gentiles," allusion is made to Cornelius, who, though a proselyte, being uncircumcised, was esteemed a Gentile by the Jews. Bp. Pearce.

9. And put no difference &c.] His argument is evidently this; that God, by pouring His Holy Spirit on the uncircumcised Gentiles, as He had done upon the circumcised Jews, had plainly shewn that He had received them into His favour, and made no discrimination, as to His choicest gifts, between them and the Jews; and that legal purification, which seemed wanting in them, He had abundantly supplied in "purifying their hearts by faith." Dr. Whitby.

10. —why tempt ye God,] Why do ye try the goodness and patience of God, by opposing His will, who has sealed the Gentiles for His own by giving them the Spirit? Abp. Newcome. Why do ye not acquiesce in the good pleasure of God, but compel the Gentiles to submit to greater burdens than He requires, as if ye distrusted the wisdom, or resolved to oppose the course, of His providence? Bp. Mann.

11. —we shall be saved, even as they.] We Jews believe that we shall be saved by the Gospel, and not by the Law; in like manner as the Gentiles also will be saved. Abp. Newcome.

14. Simeon] The same as Simon, meaning St. Peter.

——did visit the Gentiles,] God is said to visit when He blesses, as well as when He punishes, Gen. xxi. 1; Luke i. 68; xix. 44. Bp. Mann.

17. That the residue of men &c.] The Greek version of Amos, chap. ix. 12, is here followed. In the Hebrew the expression is, "that they may possess the remnant of Edom," who being the greatest enemies to Israel, the calling of them must denote the calling of the worst of the nations. Dr. Whitby.

18. Known unto God &c.] This God foretold by His prescience; for "known unto Him," &c. Dr. Whitby.

19. Wherefore my sentence is, &c.] It is worthy of observation, that this important question was determined according to the opinion of St. James, who seems to have presided in this meeting as Bishop of Jerusalem, even in the presence of St. Peter, who, as we see, claimed no authority or pre-eminence over his brethren. Much less then can the Bishop of Rome claim any, even though he could plainly make out his succession from St. Peter. Bp. Mann.

20. But that we write unto them, &c.] But it is expedient, he says, as the present state of the Church now stands, composed of Jews and proselyted Gentiles, that we should still oblige these converts to these four things, as proper to keep them at a further distance from the idolatrous worship they have renounced. Pyle. It seems probable that the things here mentioned were particularly forbidden the Gentiles, as giving peculiar scandal to the Jews, because Moses had so signally marked them out as things contrary to the holiness of a people, and to their separation unto God. So of things strangled or dead in their blood, God says, Deut. xiv. 21, "Ye shall not eat of any thing that dieth of itself, for thou art an holy people unto the Lord." Fornication is declared to be a thing not to be admitted in the commonwealth, Deut. xxiii. 17; the eating of things offered to idols is forbidden as contrary to the worship of the true God; the precept which commands the abstaining from blood was also enforced by the strongest penalties, Lev. vii. 26; xvii. 10. Since therefore these things were so solemnly forbidden to the Jewish nation, this may have been the reason that they were also on the present occasion forbidden to the Gentile Christians, that they might not follow practices so abominable in the sight of Jews. Dr. Whitby.

——from pollutions of idols,] In respect to things offered to idols, and blood, the Jews were not only forbidden the use of them, but were likewise forbidden all communication with those who did use them, though they were strangers, and not bound by the law of Moses. Bp. Sherlock.

——from fornication,] Which was not only often regarded with indifference by the heathens, but was even practised sometimes as a part of their idolatrous worship. Beausobre. All fornication it was no doubt intended hereby strictly to prohibit. Bp. Pearce.

——and from things strangled,] From the flesh of animals, the blood of which was not drained out of them when they were warm. Abp. Newcome.

Where idolatrous worship has wholly ceased, and no such ground of offence can possibly exist, these prohibitions relating to things strangled and to blood lose their force, and the use of them becomes, what it is in its own nature, a matter of indifference. Dr. Graves.

21. For Moses of old time &c.] The meaning seems to be, Because Moses, who forbids these things, is constantly read in the synagogues, therefore the Jewish Christians must be alienated from those who practise them. Abp. Newcome.

In these words St. James gives the reason for the decree he proposed. The Jews inhabiting the cities where Gentile churches were planted, having been born and bred under the law of Moses, could not easily be persuaded to depart from it; and, therefore, city them that preach him, being read in the synagogues every sabbath day.

22 Then pleased it the apostles and elders, with the whole church, to send chosen men of their own company to Antioch with Paul and Barnabas; namely, Judas surnamed Barsabas, and Silas, chief men among the brethren:

23 And they wrote letters by them after this manner; The apostles and elders and brethren send greeting unto the brethren which are of the Gentiles in Antioch and Syria and Cilicia:

24 Forasmuch as we have heard, that certain which went out from us have troubled you with words, subverting your souls, saying, Ye must be circumcised, and keep the law: to whom we gave no such commandment:

29 That ye abstain from meats offered to idols, and from blood, and from things strangled, and from fornication: from which if ye keep yourselves, ye shall do well. Fare ye well.

unless the Gentile Christians could be brought to avoid giving them any offence, there could be no hope of peace in the Christian Church. Bp. Sherlock.

22. — Judas surnamed Barsabas,] Not the Barsabas mentioned at chap. i. 23, for his name was Joseph. Some think it is his brother. It appears from ver. 32, that this Judas Barsabas was a Prophet.

23. — of the Gentiles in Antioch &c.] This decree is addressed to the Gentiles in three places only, where there were many Jews, but the spirit of it extended to all Gentile converts who lived with Jews; that social and brotherly intercourse might subsist between them, that the Gentile Christians might not be seduced to idolatry, by joining in some of the heathen rites, and that the Jews might not be averse to Christianity. Abp. Newcome.

24. — subverting your souls,] By the doctrine advanced, ver. 1. Abp. Newcome.

27. We have sent therefore Judas and Silas,] If St. Paul and St. Barnabas alone had been the bearers of the decree, their opposers might perhaps have raised some suspicion of its authenticity and strict correctness; the council therefore sent with them two other preachers, of signal reputation and piety, Judas and Silas, who had never been engaged in the contest, and would therefore be unsuspected vouchers of the sentence pronounced to decide it. Dr. Graves.

28. — the Holy Ghost, and to us,] To the "Holy Spirit," guiding us in the conclusions which we have made concerning the matter proposed to us. Abp. Newcome.

29. That ye abstain from &c.] The matter here controverted, and settled by decree of the council, was determined by prudential considerations, arising from the circumstances of the Christian Church at that time. It is one thing to be bound to observe the law of Moses as matter of necessary duty; it is another thing to comply with some parts of the law, upon motives of Christian charity and prudence. It was lawful for the Gentile converts to live without observing any part of the ceremonial law of Moses; but, though "all things are lawful," yet, as St. Paul says, "all things are not expedient,"—"all things edify not." And again, "meat commendeth us not to God: for neither, if we eat, are we the better; neither, if we eat not, are we the worse," 1 Cor. viii. 8.

This being the reason of the case, the circumstances of the Christian Church of the time weighed with the Apostolical council to require of the Gentile converts a compliance with some particulars of the Mosaick law. St. James, who opens this advice, gives the reason of it; he considered, that in all the cities where Gentile churches had been planted, there were Jewish converts likewise, who were zealous of the law, and would hold no communication with the Gentiles who wholly neglected it; and therefore, unless the Gentile Christians complied with some particulars, there must be an irreconcilable division in the Church of Christ, to the loss of that charity, on which the Gospel sets so great a price. Bp. Sherlock.

——from which if ye keep yourselves, ye shall do well.] The Apostolick decree pronounced on this occasion, far from betraying any of the folly and violence of enthusiasm, was dictated by reason and sobriety; it bears the clearest marks of prudent attention to the peace and welfare of the Church, and of charitable condescension to the prejudices of the well-meaning.

It is impossible to read over this decree without admiring the humility and moderation of its conclusion: it enumerates the prohibitions already stated, and closes with the words, "from which if ye keep yourselves, ye shall do well. Fare ye well." How different was this from the high strains of priestly arrogance and papal usurpation in the corrupted ages of the Church, or the bitter invectives of angry reformers, and the wild rants of heated enthusiasts, in more modern days! How conformable to that mild and sober dignity which we should expect in men, speaking the dictates of genuine inspiration, and following the example of their meek and humble Lord! Dr. Graves.

Though the Mosaick institution was pronounced by this high authority, not to be obligatory on those who embraced the Gospel, yet the attachment of the Jewish Christians to the rites and ceremonies, to which they had been accustomed, continued to be the cause of frequent dissensions in the Church of Christ; and we find that St. Paul on several occasions, (chap. xvi. 3; xxi. 26,) subsequent to this council, conformed to the law of Moses, not indeed as a matter of necessity, but in compliance with the prejudices of the Jews, and that he might make them better disposed to the Gospel, 1 Cor. ix. 20. Bp. Tomline.

This temperate decree, dictated indeed by the Holy Spirit, afforded a perfect model to all future general councils, how to maintain the harmony and communion of the catholick or universal Church; thus rejecting and censuring a mischievous heresy, erring in fundamentals, and subversive of the Christian faith; and yet mildly respecting the prejudices of weak and scrupulous brethren, still attached to the Mosaical institutions. The Gentile churches being only required to avoid such gross violations of the law of Moses, as would unavoidably offend their Jewish brethren, so as to break off all communion between them, and produce an irreconcilable schism, while the latter were bound to insist no more on circumcision as necessary to salvation, and on abstinence from all meats forbidden by the law of Moses. And by this sage decree, St. Paul appears to have governed the churches which he planted; shewing the most considerate attention to their prejudices in matters indifferent; holding that all things were not at all times expedient to be required, (1 Cor. vi. 12,) as not tending to edification, 1 Cor. x. 23. Dr. Hales.

31. — they rejoiced for the consolation.] Rejoiced for the comfort they had in knowing they were delivered from the necessity of circumcision, and the other ceremonies of the law. Bp. Mann.

32. — being prophets also themselves,] The word "prophet," as has been before remarked, is not only used for one who foretells things to come, but for a teacher who, by the immediate assistance of the Holy Spirit, instructs men in the way of salvation. Bp. Mann.

38. — who departed from them] See chap. xiii. 13. St. Mark was sister's son to St. Barnabas, Col. iv. 10, a circumstance which may have disposed St Barnabas to overlook St. Mark's desertion of the cause on the occasion alluded to.

39. — the contention was so sharp] It is with sensible regret that we read of any difference, much more of a sharp contention, between St. Paul and St. Barnabas, so dear to each other in the bonds both of human and Christian friendship: it arose from some remainder of imperfection in the temper of the one or the other of them, and probably of both. They separated, therefore, but it plainly appears that they did not become enemies; they preached the same Gospel, though in different companies, each taking his proper circuit; and thus the work of the Lord was performed with greater despatch, and perhaps with greater success. Dr. Doddridge.

It does not appear that it once entered in the minds of the sacred writers to consider how this or that action would appear to mankind, or what objections might be raised upon them. But, without at all attending to this, they lay the facts before us, at no pains to think whether they would appear creditable or not. They tell the plain truth, and attend to nothing else. Surely this looks like sincerity, and shews that they published nothing to the world but what they believed themselves. Duchal.

The providence of God caused the separation of these two Apostles to turn to the benefit of the Church, by making it the means of diffusing Christianity wider than if they had continued together. Also St. Mark, by St. Paul's severity, was brought to a sense of his former indifferency in the work of the Gospel, and became so useful a minister of Christ, that he not only deserved to be a companion of St. Paul, but received from him a high testimony of his zeal, that he was "profitable to him for the ministry," 2 Tim. iv. 11. Nelson.

The Apostles themselves were not exempt from the passions of human nature: but whenever they fell, they recovered, by the grace of God, from sin, and were restored to a sense of duty. When we err, may the consequence be the same! We may judge it expedient to differ in opinion from our neighbour; we may think it necessary to withdraw from any familiar intercourse with him: but it is certainly consistent, neither with Christian charity, nor with Christian justice, to remain in a state of impenetrable and obdurate irreconciliation; or to aggravate the evil of separation by irritating and unnecessary contention. Brewster.

Chap. XVI. ver. 1. — named Timotheus,] This is the Timothy to whom St. Paul addressed his epistle. It is probable that about this time the gift of the Holy Ghost was imparted to Timothy by the hands of St. Paul, 2 Tim. i. 6; for, as Barnabas, Mark, Silas, &c. chap. xi. 24; xv. 32, appear at this time to have had the gifts of the Spirit imparted to them, it is reasonable to suppose that Timothy, being adopted by St. Paul for the same ends, should be endued with the same gifts. Dr. Whitby.

—— a certain woman,] Named Eunice, 2 Tim. i. 5. She was a convert to Christianity from Judaism, but his father was a Gentile. Bp. Mann.

If we select a youthful character from the Scriptures, as an object worthy of imitation, none is found more exemplary than Timothy. Happy in being educated in the bosom of a religious family, he imbibed a knowledge of the sacred writings in his earliest years. By these he was well prepared for the reception of the pure doctrines of Christianity, to which the Jewish Scriptures only led the way: and, fortified with these, he was thoroughly furnished for the conduct of a strictly pious life. At this period of St. Paul's visit to Lystra, "he was well reported of by the brethren:" and every change in his condition confirmed their good opinion. An early education in sound religious principles is the best pledge of a persevering piety. Brewster.

3. — and circumcised him] This St. Paul did, that he might not offend the Jews, and thus obstruct his own usefulness, and that of Timothy, in preaching the Gospel. "For they all knew that his father was a Greek;" and, therefore, concluding that he was uncircumcised, would have no intercourse with him or with his companion St. Paul. Abp. Newcome.

The admirable wisdom and Christian benevolence, with which St. Paul conducted himself, appear strongly from contrasting his conduct towards two of his favourite converts, and most able assistants, Timotheus and Titus. The former he prevailed on to submit to circumcision, and obey the Mosaick law; because, as it was known his mother was a Jewess, his not acting thus would have given occasion of offence. The latter had been a Gentile, and therefore, when it was suggested that he also should be circumcised, the Apostle steadily refused, lest he should seem to establish a precedent for subjecting the liberty of all the Gentile Christians to the bondage of the law. Dr. Graves. See Gal. ii. 3.

——the region of Galatia,] This division of Asia adjoined to Phrygia on the northeast. It derived its name from the Galatæ, or Gauls, some of whom, leaving their own country in Europe, passed over into the Asiatick continent, and brought a great part of it under their command. Dr. Wells.

——and were forbidden &c.] They were forbidden to preach it there at that time, because it was the will of the Lord to employ them in a new work, which they had not yet begun, namely, to preach to a Roman colony, ver. 12. Dr. Whitby.

——in Asia,] See note at chap. ii. 9.

7. —the Spirit suffered them not.] The Spirit did not suffer them to waste their time in Asia Minor, intending that they should pass over to Europe, in order that they might sow the seed of a more abundant spiritual harvest. Dr. Hales.

8. —came down to Troas.] Troas was a small country lying west of Mysia, with a seaport town of the same name. Dr. Wells.

9. —Macedonia,] The Romans divided all the countries, which by heathen writers are included under the general name of Greece in an extended sense, into two provinces; namely, Macedonia and Achaia; under the former, they included Macedonia proper, Thessaly and Epirus; and under the latter, Greece properly so called, and the Peloponnesus. Dr. Wells. See the map.

10. —immediately we endeavoured] St. Luke here, for the first time, uses the term "we;" hence it is commonly thought that he set out from Troas in company with St. Paul. Bp. Pearce.

11. —to Samothracia,] An island in the Egean sea, near the coast of Thrace.

——Neapolis;] A seaport of Macedonia.

12. —Philippi,] This city lay to the west of Neapolis: it took its name from Philip, the famous king of Macedon, who repaired and beautified it. It is celebrated among Christians on account of the epistle addressed by St. Paul to its inhabitants. Dr. Wells.

——the chief city of that part of Macedonia, and a colony:] We are assured by Pliny that Philippi was a Roman colony; and it is attested by coins now extant, that a Roman colony was planted here first by Julius Cesar, and afterwards renewed by Augustus. The Roman historian Livy mentions, it is true, that Amphipolis was appointed the capital city of this part of Macedonia; but it is well known that nothing is more liable to change than the state of cities; and Spanheim observes, that it was a part of the Roman policy that their colonies should be the chief cities of the countries where they were placed. On these accounts, we have no reason to doubt the correctness of the author of the Acts in calling Philippi "the chief city." Biscoe.

13. —by a river side, where prayer was wont to be made;] The situation of the place where prayer was wont to be made, "by the river side," is remarkable; it appears, however, incidentally from the Jewish writers Philo and Josephus, and from Tertullian, that it was the custom of the Jews to have their oratories, or places of prayer, in such situations. Archdeacon Paley.

——where prayer was wont to be made;] Or, where was a house of prayer for the Jews and proselytes. These synagogues, or oratories, were often built in the fields, and sometimes near rivers, for the convenience of purification, or because the laws would not permit the Jews to exercise a strange religion within the city. Dr. Whitby.

15 And when she was baptized, and her houshold, she besought us, saying, If ye have judged me to be faithful to the Lord, come into my house, and abide there. And she constrained us.

16 ¶ And it came to pass, as we went to prayer, a certain damsel possessed with a spirit ‖ of divination met us, which brought her masters much gain by soothsaying:

‖ Or, of Python.

17 The same followed Paul and us, and cried, saying, These men are the servants of the most high God, which shew unto us the way of salvation.

18 And this did she many days. But Paul, being grieved, turned and said to the spirit, I command thee in the name of Jesus Christ to come out of her. And he came out the same hour.

19 ¶ And when her masters saw that the hope of their gains was gone, they caught Paul and Silas, and drew them into the ‖ marketplace unto the rulers,

20 And brought them to the magistrates, saying, These men, being Jews, do exceedingly trouble our city,

21 And teach customs, which are not lawful for us to receive, neither to observe, being Romans.

22 And the multitude rose up together against them: and the magistrates rent off their clothes, [e] and commanded to beat them.

Anno DOMINI 53.

23 And when they had laid many stripes upon them, they cast them into prison, charging the jailor to keep them safely:

[e] 2 Cor. 11. 25. 1 Thess. 2. 2.

24 Who, having received such a charge, thrust them into the inner prison, and made their feet fast in the stocks.

25 ¶ And at midnight Paul and Silas prayed, and sang praises unto God: and the prisoners heard them.

26 And suddenly there was a great earthquake, so that the foundations of the prison were shaken: and immediately all the doors were opened, and every one's bands were loosed.

27 And the keeper of the prison awaking out of his sleep, and seeing the prison doors open, he drew out his sword, and would have killed himself, supposing that the prisoners had been fled.

28 But Paul cried with a loud voice, saying, Do thyself no harm: for we are all here.

29 Then he called for a light, and sprang in, and came trembling, and fell down before Paul and Silas, 30 And brought them out, and said, Sirs, what must I do to be saved?

dispositions could not of themselves enable her to receive the light of the Gospel without Divine assistance. At the same time, the choice of such a person may shew us that the co-operation of a sincere mind is required. The seed must be sown in good ground, in order to bring forth fruit. God may knock at the door of men's hearts, but if they are unwilling to open them, and to receive instructions, vain is the heavenly call. Let us therefore on the one hand avoid a presumptuous confidence in our own strength, and on the other a careless neglect of the talents committed to us, expecting some miraculous power of the Holy Spirit in our favour. We cannot, it is true, of ourselves, help ourselves; but it is equally true, that without our own faithful exertions God will not help us, but will withdraw the only means by which we can act effectually or acceptably in His sight. Dr. Stack.

——she constrained us.] Prevailed on us by kind entreaty. Bp. Mann.

16. —a spirit of divination] The original Greek expresses, 'A spirit of Python,' which the Greeks supposed to be an inspiration from Apollo, whom they surnamed Pythius. Dr. Doddridge.

17. —These men are the servants &c.] God thus constraining even the wicked spirits to bear testimony to the truth of Christ's religion. Pyle.

21. —being Romans.] Being a colony of Romans; and, as such, subject to the Roman law. Bp. Mann.

There was no express law of the Roman senate or emperours against the Christians, but there was a law requiring them to worship the gods of their country. To these idolatrous practices Christianity was opposed, requiring men to turn "from idols to serve the living and true God," 1 Thess. i. 10. Dr. Whitby.

22. —rent off their clothes,] Thus violently stripping them, in order to their being scourged. Bp. Mann.

30. —Sirs, what must I do to be saved?] It is probable that he concluded at once their doctrine to be Divine, both from the extraordinary earthquake, and from their not taking advantage of the doors being open to make their escape. Bp. Pearce, Abp. Newcome. Happy are those sinners, whom God in merciful severity awakens by some present terrour, judgment, or calamity, to consider the bad state of their souls, and to think seriously of another world, when nothing else would have had any good effect upon them. Such a call to repentance shakes off their thoughtless security, and compels their stupid and dissipated minds to reflect upon their dangerous condition. But far more happy are they who, without such alarms, and in a state of prosperity, are awakened by the stiller voice of reason, by the suggestions of their own conscience, and by the secret influence of the Holy Spirit, to examine their conduct, to amend whatsoever is defective in it, and to have a religious fear of the displeasure of God. Dr. Jortin.

The question which the trembling and astonished jailor put to Paul and Silas, when he saw the prison doors opened in a miraculous manner, is a question of the utmost moment and importance, in which it nearly concerns us all to be well resolved. For, if there be a life beyond the present, and we do not die like beasts that perish; if death do not put a final period to our existence; but, when this short life is ended, we enter upon the regions of eternity, and shall be for ever happy or miserable, according as we demean ourselves in this short time of trial and probation; if this be the condition of mankind, (as the voice of reason, the dictates of conscience, and the Holy Scriptures, do loudly proclaim it is,) how does it behove every one of us to inquire what we must do to attain everlasting life; and to consider whether we are in the way that leads to heaven and immortality; or, if we have been so unhappy as to wander out of it, how we may recover and return to it again. Melmoth.

33 And he took them the same hour of the night, and washed their stripes; and was baptized, he and all his, straightway.

34 And when he had brought them into his house, he set meat before them, and rejoiced, believing in God with all his house.

35 And when it was day, the magistrates sent the serjeants, saying, Let those men go.

36 And the keeper of the prison told this saying to Paul, The magistrates have sent to let you go: now therefore depart, and go in peace.

37 But Paul said unto them, They have beaten us openly uncondemned, being Romans, and have cast us into prison; and now do they thrust us out privily? nay verily; but let them come themselves and fetch us out.

38 And the serjeants told these words unto the magistrates: and they feared, when they heard that they were Romans.

the Gospel, and to live according to the Gospel, is so plain a path to heaven, that no man can miss seeing it, unless he turns his eyes away from it. But this belief, which is made the condition and the means of salvation, must include all that is consequent on such belief, that esteem for the precepts of Christ, that repentance for past transgressions, that newness and holiness of life, which is made as positive and indispensable a condition of acceptance as faith itself. Dr. Jortin.

32. And they spake unto him the word of the Lord, &c.] That is, they explained to him the several articles of the Christian faith which he was to believe. This clearly shews that a distinct knowledge of the word of God was necessary to his believing aright in Christ. Thus St. Paul did not require him to believe with an implicit faith, without knowing why or what he believed; but he required him to have an explicit solid faith, grounded on the word of God. Bp. Beveridge.

33. — washed their stripes;] Washed the blood from their stripes. Bp. Pearce.

—— was baptized, he and all his,] From this and other passages, (see ver. 15; chap. x. 48; 1 Cor. i. 16,) it appears that the Apostles baptized whole families at once; and as no mention is made in the Acts or the Epistles of adults only being baptized on any occasion, we conclude that they baptized children among others. Many of the earliest Christian writers expressly mention the baptism of infants as the constant practice of their times. On these and other grounds we conclude, in the words of one of the Articles of our Church, that "the baptism of young children is in any wise to be retained in the Church, as most agreeable with the institution of Christ." Bp. Tomline.

36. — and go in peace.] Go, and peace be with you, or, fare you well. Bp. Pearce.

37. — being Romans,] Being citizens of Rome. The Roman government was peculiarly tender of the lives and liberties of its subjects; and every injury that was done to a Roman citizen was considered as an affront to the majesty of the whole people of Rome. Dr. Cave. It was especially against the privilege of a Roman to suffer scourging or any other punishment, without being condemned in a regular trial. Bp. Pearce.

40. — when they had seen the brethren,] St. Paul and Silas laid at Philippi the foundation of a very eminent church; which appears, by the Epistle of St. Paul addressed to it, to have shewn to him, and to have received from him, as many tokens of regard as any which he planted. Dr. Lightfoot.

We should observe that St. Paul, on this occasion, is not satisfied with securing his safety, without also guarding his character, which was exposed to suspicion and disgrace from the ignominious treatment he had received; and he uses that motive to procure an honourable dismissal, which alone could excite the attention of the magistrates. The event justified the expectation of the Apostles; for the magistrates, when they heard that they were Romans, "came and besought them, and brought them out." Also, having vindicated their character, they did not attempt to retaliate the ill usage they had received by public or legal complaint, or to irritate the resentment, and provoke the further vengeance of the magistrates, by obstinate opposition. When desired by them to depart out of the city, they only waited to see the brethren, "and when they had seen them, they comforted them, and departed." Dr. Graves.

Chap. XVII. ver. 1. — Amphipolis — Apollonia,] See the map of St. Paul's travels.

—— Thessalonica,] Thessalonica was the chief city of Macedonia, an excellent mart, and the most populous city of the country. It is at the present time called Salonichi; and is said to retain something of its ancient greatness and wealth, having a large safe haven in a bay which is called from its name. It is still an archbishop's see of the Christian Church, having been first converted to Christianity by St. Paul, at this his coming there; and it is, and will through all ages be memorable, on account of the two Epistles written by St. Paul to the Thessalonians, generally allowed by learned men to be the two earliest of the Epistles written by him. Dr. Wells.

3. Opening and alledging, that Christ &c.] Clearly proving from the Scriptures that Christ was not to be a temporal Prince, nor a deliverer of Israel by worldly conquests, but the Saviour and Redeemer of mankind, by dying and suffering for their sins, who was to triumph over their spiritual enemies by His resurrection; and then demonstrating all those prophetical characters to be exactly fulfilled in Jesus Christ, whose doctrine and religion he was preaching. Pyle.

from the dead; and that this Jesus, whom I preach unto you, is Christ.

4 And some of them believed, and consorted with Paul and Silas; and of the devout Greeks a great multitude, and of the chief women not a few.

5 ¶ But the Jews which believed not, moved with envy, took unto them certain lewd fellows of the baser sort, and gathered a company, and set all the city on an uproar, and assaulted the house of Jason, and sought to bring them out to the people.

6 And when they found them not, they drew Jason and certain brethren unto the rulers of the city, crying, These that have turned the world upside down are come hither also;

7 Whom Jason hath received: and these all do contrary to the decrees of Cesar, saying that there is another king, one Jesus.

8 And they troubled the people and the rulers of the city, when they heard these things.

9 And when they had taken security of Jason, and of the other, they let them go.

10 ¶ And the brethren immediately sent away Paul and Silas by night unto Berea: who coming thither went into the synagogue of the Jews. Anno DOMINI 53.

11 These were more noble than those in Thessalonica, in that they received the word with all readiness of mind, and searched the scriptures daily, whether those things were so.

12 Therefore many of them believed; also of honourable women which were Greeks, and of men, not a few.

13 But when the Jews of Thessalonica had knowledge that the word of God was preached of Paul at Berea, they came thither also, and stirred up the people.

14 And then immediately the brethren sent away Paul to go as it were to the sea: but Silas and Timotheus abode there still.

15 And they that conducted Paul brought him unto Athens: and receiving a commandment unto Silas and Timotheus for to come to him with all speed, they departed.

11. These were more noble &c.] Of a better disposition. Bp. Pearce. More ingenuous. Dr. Hammond. More liberal-minded. Dr. Hales.

The wise conduct of the Bereans, in receiving the Christian religion with docility and readiness, yet not without due inquiry and consideration, is here recorded to their praise; to the end that, wheresoever the Gospel should be preached in the whole world, this also that they had done should be told for a memorial of them, and for an example to others. Dr. Jortin.

—— received the word with all readiness of mind,] That is, they willingly and gladly gave ear to the doctrine of the Apostles, and were ready to embrace it, as soon as sufficient evidence of the truth of it should appear to them. In the mean time, they gave due attention, as became them, and as the weight and importance of the subject required; discovering no ill-will or hatred towards those who preached it to them, but hearing them candidly and favourably, without prejudice or prepossession, and with minds open to conviction. Dr. Balguy.

—— searched the scriptures &c.] As by hearing and receiving the word readily, they shewed the honesty of their minds, so their thus searching the Scriptures is a proof of their wisdom and good understanding. How good in itself and acceptable soever the Apostles' doctrine might be, it was certainly proper, before they embraced it, to satisfy themselves about the truth of it, that they might not expose themselves to delusion and disappointment. Without this, neither could their joy be reasonable, nor their faith well-grounded. Though they readily heard the Apostles, and gave attention to their preaching, they knew it was not fitting to give their assent without previous satisfaction and proper evidence. And herein, likewise, their proceeding was manly and rational, and such as became the lovers of truth. Dr. Balguy.

—— whether those things were so.] That is, whether the preaching of the Apostles was conformable to their Scriptures of the Old Testament, and how it agreed with the prophecies and declarations therein contained. Dr. Balguy.

The Bereans on this occasion are a fit pattern for our imitation, in respect both of the good disposition they shewed for the reception of truth, and also of their impartial and unprejudiced manner of proceeding, for in vain do we hearken with due attention, if we be any way disabled or indisposed by prejudices, for passing a right judgment on what we hear. From the character too of the Bereans here given, we learn the folly and absurdity of implicit faith, that is, of blindly surrendering up our belief without due examination and inquiry: for the Bereans are here applauded for taking quite a contrary method, for not embracing the Apostles' doctrines till they had brought them to the test, and compared them with the Scriptures, their acknowledged rule of faith. How strange then is it that such a faith as this should be required by the Romish church from its members; that any body of Christians should be enjoined to believe implicitly and blindly, when the praise of the Bereans is upon record in Scripture for refusing so to believe. Dr. Balguy.

14. — to go as it were to the sea:] "As if towards the sea;" that is, the better to elude the search of such as might follow or seize him, he set out from Berea with the appearance of going to some neighbouring seaport: but he changed his route, and went to Athens by land. Bp. Pearce, Grotius. Or, the words translated "to go as if towards the sea," may only mean, "to go towards the sea;" and, as no planting of the Gospel is mentioned to have taken place between Berea or Thessalonica, and Athens, it is thought by some commentators, that he went by sea to the latter city. Dr. Benson.

16. — wholly given up to idolatry.] That is, full of idols and altars, and much given to the worship of them. That the Athenians were peculiarly devoted to the superstitious worship of false gods, appears sufficiently from the testimonies of heathen writers. In particular, Pausanias says of this city, that there was no place where so many idols were to be seen. Dr. Hammond.

In our country, the carrying on religious disputations in the markets would be thought improper, and the effect of intemperate zeal: but it would, even now, not be strange in Arabia and other parts of the East, where people meet in such places for conversation. Harmer.

18. —Epicureans, —Stoicks,] These were two celebrated sects of Grecian philosophers, both of whom held opinions very inconsistent with the doctrines of St. Paul. The Epicureans acknowledged no gods, except in name only, and absolutely denied that they exercised any providence over the world. The Stoicks professed to believe both the existence of the gods, and their providence in the world; but they attributed all human actions to fixed and unalterable fate, to which they conceived the gods themselves to be subject; and thus destroyed the foundation of all religion, as much as the astheistical Epicureans did. Bp. Pearce.

——a setter forth of strange gods:] That is, of gods unknown to them before, alluding to Jesus; the plural being put for the singular. Bp. Pearce.

19. —unto Areopagus,] The word Areopagus signifies "Mars' hill," ver. 22. The highest court of judicature was held on the hill at Athens, which bore this name; the court thence obtained the name of the court of the Areopagus, and the members of it were called Areopagites. It has been questioned whether St. Paul was brought to this Areopagus, that he might be tried before the judges of the court, or whether he was only brought here, as to a convenient place where those who were disposed might hear what his doctrine was. Bp. Pearce. It appears, from several instances recorded by heathen writers, that the affairs of religion were considered as peculiarly belonging to this court, and therefore St. Paul may have been brought before them on the present occasion, as the preacher and assertor of a new Deity whom they had not admitted. Dr. Hammond. What a glorious scene was here for the manifestation of the truth, before such a promiscuous and numerous assembly of citizens and strangers, of philosophers of all sects and people of all conditions; and with what singular skill and contrivance is every part and member of this discourse so framed and adapted, as to obviate some principal errour or prejudice in some party or other of his hearers! Bp. Newton.

21. —either to tell, or to hear some new thing.)] This character had long before been given of the Athenians. Demosthenes, the celebrated orator, represents the Athenian people as spending their time in inquiring in the places of publick resort, whether there was any thing new. Grotius.

22. —in all things ye are too superstitious.] The word, here translated, "superstitious," is frequently used in a more favourable sense; and, if we attend to the spirit of St. Paul's oration, which is every where mild and conciliating, we shall be induced to believe that nothing more is here intended, than to convey the acknowledged character of the Athenians for attention to religious worship, above all other nations. Dr. Stack.

23. —beheld your devotions,] Rather, 'the things which ye worship.' Bp. Pearce. 'The several objects of your worship.' Dr. Hales.

——TO THE UNKNOWN GOD.] Respecting this altar at Athens, inscribed "to the unknown God," the discussions of the learned have been ample, and their conjectures extremely various. One opinion, supported and embraced by many, is, that by "the unknown God," the Athenians meant the God of the Jews. It is well known that this people always shewed great facility in admitting the objects of worship of other nations into the catalogue of their deities; and since, subsequently to the time of Alexander the Great, considerable intercourse had taken place between the Greeks and the Jews, it is highly probable that the former should have obtained some knowledge, indistinct and imperfect at least, of the religion of the latter. Nor is it difficult to explain why the Athenians should have given the name of "unknown" to the God of Jews. For the Jews invariably abstained from uttering the name of God, and always spoke of Him, as unutterable and incomprehensible. Thus no foreigner could ever learn to distinguish Him by any peculiar name; and hence the Athenians might naturally describe Him by the title of "the unknown God." Biscoe. On the other hand, while Pausanius and other writers attest the fact of the erection of an altar at Athens to the unknown God, various causes of the erection of it have been assigned. St. Chrysostom ascribes it to the excessive superstition of the Athenians, who, fearing lest they should be punished for neglecting the worship of some god of whom they were ignorant, dedicated an altar to the unknown God, for the purpose of providing for any possible omission. Schleusner, Bp. Pearce.

A deceiver would, on such an occasion as this, have retracted his doctrine to save his life; an enthusiast would have lost his life without trying to save it by innocent means. St. Paul did neither the one nor the other; he availed himself of an altar, inscribed "to the unknown God," and pleaded that he did not propose the worship of any new God, but only explained to the people the nature and attributes of that unknown Divinity whom their government had already received. Thus he eluded condemnation, without departing in the least from the truth of the Gospel, or violating the honour of his God; an admirable proof of the good sense with which he acted, and of there being no mixture of fanaticism in his religion. Lord Lyttleton.

It is peculiarly worthy of remark, that, in all the various trying situations, in which the Apostle of the Gentiles was placed, we find him always observant of those decorums of language, and those distinctions of rank, which the intercourse of society and the preservation of order require, but which the pride and violence of fanaticism almost always contemns and tramples on. He is brought before kings and rulers, to bear testimony to the name of Jesus; we see him, as at the tribunal of the Areopagus at Athens, so also before the council of the chief priests at Jerusalem, before two different Roman governours, and especially before king Agrippa; and to all he yields that tribute of external respect which their external situation demanded, without departing in the least from sincerity and truth, or debasing, by any mean adulation or unworthy compliance, the integrity of his character, and the honour of his God. Dr. Graves.

31 Because he hath appointed a day, in the which he will judge the world in righteousness by that man whom he hath ordained; whereof he hath ‖ given assurance

—— him declare I unto you.] This beginning of St. Paul's address completely refutes the charge they had brought against him of being "a setter forth of strange gods," ver. 18, by shewing, even from their own altar, that he introduced no strange demon, but the ancient established God, whose right worship they had ignorantly debased by the wrong worship of a multitude of demons or false gods. Dr. Hales.

St. Paul's judgment is manifest in his selection of topicks for this animated discourse. He does not address the Athenian philosophers as he had done the Jews, and infer that they ought to believe in Christ, because He had been foretold by the Prophets; for they knew nothing of the Prophets, or at least had no reverence for their writings, and as yet had no reason to believe them true. Brewster. To the Jew prophecy was the first proof, to the Gentiles it was the last. The Jew believed in Christ, because foretold by the Prophets; the Gentiles believed the Prophets, because they had so exactly foretold Jesus Christ. Both became firm believers, having each in his way a full view of all the dispensations of Providence towards mankind. Bp. Sherlock.

24. God that made the world] This assertion, though agreeable to the general belief and opinion, was yet directly contrary to the doctrine of the followers both of Epicurus and Aristotle; the former of whom attributed the formation of the world to the accidental meeting of atoms, and the latter maintained that the world was not created at all, but had subsisted as it is from all eternity. Bp. Newton.

25. Neither is worshipped — as though he needed &c.] Neither, he says, can you rationally think that this all-sufficient Being is pleased and delighted with the offerings and external services of mankind, as if He either wanted or received any addition to His happiness by them. For how can He receive advantage from us, who live by His power, and enjoy all we have from His goodness? Pyle.

26. And hath made of one blood &c.] Hath created the race of men, all from Adam their first parent, whose posterity were by degrees dispersed over the several countries of the earth; His providence having assigned to each people their particular country and climate, and ordering and disposing the several changes and periods of nations. Pyle.

This was opposed not only to the disciples of Epicurus, who derived the origin of the human race from the mere effects of matter and motion, and to those of Aristotle, who denied that mankind had any beginning, maintaining that they had subsisted in eternal succession; but was moreover opposed to the general pride and conceit of the people of Athens, who boasted themselves to be descended from no other stock, but to be themselves original natives of their own country. Bp. Newton.

27. That they should seek the Lord,] The grand design of man's creation, he informs them, was to be a religious being, "to seek the Lord" so far as He is discoverable; "if haply they could feel after and find Him" by the glimmering light of reason; revelation assuring us, what reason could not discover, that "He is (subsisting) not far from every one of us," as the universal Spirit and the Father of Spirits. Dr. Hales.

28. —certain also of your own poets] One poet, who said this, was Aratus, in a poem on the heavenly bodies; he was not an Athenian, but a native of Cilicia, St. Paul's country. Bp. Pearce.

In the writings which we possess of St. Paul are quotations from the Greek poets in three different places, Acts xvii. 28; 1 Cor. xv. 33; Tit. i. 12. In each of these instances he introduces the passages with propriety and judgment, and in a manner which implies his intimacy with the Greek poets; for superficial readers, who quote merely for a display of learning, are seldom happy in their application. Michaelis.

29. —we ought not to think &c.] He here plainly points at the gross idolatry of the lower people, who thought the very idols themselves to be gods, and terminated their worship in them. Bp. Newton.

30. —the times of this ignorance &c.] The times of this ignorance God hath hitherto suffered to pass without direct interposition, making no distinct revelation of His will.

—— but now commandeth &c.] But, now that He intends, in great mercy, to vouchsafe to them all the free offers of pardon, and a full discovery of His divine will, He justly expects that they should repent of their past errours, and worship Him in a true and acceptable manner. And, (ver. 31,) it infinitely concerns them so to do; for, as He has now given them His only Son Jesus Christ to be their Saviour and Redeemer, and has demonstrated the truth of His commission by raising Him from the dead; so has He appointed the same Jesus to be the judge of all the world, and to give eternal reward or punishment to every man according to his works. Pyle.

—— every where to repent:] When the world was in ignorance, and had not such assurance of a future state of eternal rewards and punishments after this life, the arguments to repentance were weak and feeble, in comparison of what they now are. For, now that God hath assured us of a future judgment, exhortations to repentance have a commanding influence over men; so that repentance, both as it is very earnestly inculcated in the Gospel, and as it derives its chief motives and enforcements from the Gospel, may be said to be one of the leading doctrines of Christ's religion. Abp. Tillotson.

31. —by that man whom he hath ordained;] The human nature of our Lord, ever intimately and indissolubly united to the Divine, being, after His resurrection, taken up into heaven, was thereupon invested with the glory and dominion of the Godhead, to be from thenceforth displayed and exercised in the government of His Church, until the final act of judgment shall close the amazing scene, and put a period to the mediatorial kingdom: which, when the Son, the man Jesus Christ, shall have delivered up to the Father, then God, or the Blessed Trinity, shall be all in all, reigning and ruling to eternity, as was the case from eternity, previous to the intervention of the Christian system. By whom indeed should God judge mankind, but by that man by whom they were redeemed? He, who took upon Him the form of a servant, was crowned the King of glory, and crowned for that reason, because He became "obedient unto death." Therefore by Himself hath God sworn, that to Him, when sitting on the throne of judgment, "every knee shall bow, and every tongue confess that (the man) Christ Jesus is Lord, to the glory of God the Father." Bp. Horne.

32. — some mocked:] Probably the Epicureans, who disbelieved a resurrection and future judgment, here asserted by St. Paul. Dr. Whitby. Perhaps among the mockers we may conclude were other philosophers, both Epicureans and Stoicks, whose tenets, though opposite to each other, were equally adverse to the reception of the Gospel. Dr. Hales.

—— others said,] Perhaps the disciples of Plato and the graver part of the audience. Bp. Newton.

34. — Dionysius the Areopagite,] A member of that body of magistrates who sat in the court of the Areopagus. Bp. Pearce. The members of this court were of the first class of citizens, and distinguished for their gravity, wisdom, and authority. Grotius.

Chap. XVIII. ver. 1. — came to Corinth;] This famous city was at this time the residence of the proconsul of Achaia. It was commodiously situated, not only for trade, but for the command of all Greece, lying at the bottom of the isthmus that joins the Morea, anciently called the Peloponnesus, to the main land. The inhabitants were chiefly given to trading, which rendered them very wealthy; here were also several orators and philosophers residing. Dr. Wells.

2. — a certain Jew] This man and his wife were afterwards assistants of St. Paul, and had a church in their house, Rom. xvi. 3—5; 1 Cor. xvi. 19. Bp. Pearce.

—— (because that Claudius &c.] The Roman historian Suetonius, in his life of Claudius, mentions the fact of that emperour having expelled the Jews from Rome for tumultuous conduct. Abp. Newcome. Dio indeed says, that he did not expel them, but forbade all their religious assemblies. This was in effect an expulsion: if he would not permit them to assemble on their sabbaths, and the other days enjoined by their law, they could no longer live there as Jews. Biscoe.

3. — he abode with them, and wrought: &c.] It was the custom of the Jews, even of such as had received a better education than ordinary, which was St. Paul's case, chap. xxii. 3, to learn some trade, in order that, wheresoever they were, they might the better provide for themselves in case of necessity. And, though St. Paul in some places lived on the bounty of his converts, yet he chose not to do so at Corinth and some other places, for a reason which he gives at 2 Cor. xi. 12. While he was at Corinth, he was supplied, when his own labour did not procure him a sufficiency, by the brethren which came to him there from Macedonia, 2 Cor. xi. 9. Bp. Pearce. There was a maxim among the Jews, that he, who teaches not his son a trade, teaches him to be a thief. Bp. Tomline.

5. — when Silas and Timotheus] These two now returned from Thessalonica in Macedonia. It is not directly asserted, but it is fully implied, in the history of the Acts, that they joined St. Paul at Athens. For he sent a message back to them "to come to him with all speed," chap. xvii. 15; his stay at Athens was on purpose that they might join him, chap. xvii. 16; and his departure from that city was by no means hastened or abrupt. The same fact is deducible from what St. Paul says to the Thessalonians, 1 Thess. iii. 1; "We thought it good to be left at Athens alone, and sent Timotheus our brother—to establish you:" for when it is said that St. Paul sent him from Athens to Thessalonica, it is implied that he had come to Athens. There is, in this case, a conformity between the history of the Acts, and the Epistle, of a peculiar species. The epistle discloses a fact which is not directly asserted in the history, but which makes what is said in the history more significant, probable, and consistent. The history bears marks of an omission; the epistle by reference furnishes a circumstance which supplies that omission. Archdeacon Paley.

—— was pressed in the spirit,] Meaning, that either his own spirit, or the Holy Spirit, so powerfully urged him, that he could not refrain from speaking. Dr. Whitby. The tidings brought by Silas and Timothy of the great proficiency and piety of the churches of Macedonia, 1 Thess. iii. 6, appear to have incited him, and made him more earnest to gain the Jews at Corinth. Dr. Lightfoot.

6. — he shook his raiment,] In case of great emotion and anxiety, the Jews used to throw open the upper garment, and shake it at the person with whom they were displeased, chap. xxii. 23. Bp. Mann.

—— Your blood be &c.] Or, "your blood is upon your own heads," that is, your guilt, or the punishment of it: I am clean from your blood, not polluted with it. St. Paul means, that the guilt of rejecting his doctrine, and the punishment due to it, was theirs only, as he had done his duty with regard to them. Bp. Pearce.

—— I will go unto the Gentiles.] See note at chap. xiii. 46.

[c] 1 Cor. 1. 14.

8 [c] And Crispus, the chief ruler of the synagogue, believed on the Lord with all his house; and many of the Corinthians hearing believed, and were baptized.

9 Then spake the Lord to Paul in the night by a vision, Be not afraid, but speak, and hold not thy peace:

12 ¶ And when Gallio was the deputy of Achaia, the Jews made insurrection with one accord against Paul, and brought him to the judgment seat,

13 Saying, This fellow persuadeth men to worship God contrary to the law.

14 And when Paul was now about to open his mouth, Gallio said unto the Jews, If it were a matter of wrong or wicked lewdness, O ye Jews, reason would that I should bear with you:

15 But if it be a question of words and names, and of your law, look ye to it; for I will be no judge of such matters.

16 And he drave them from the judgment seat.

19 And he came to Ephesus, and left them there: but he himself entered into the synagogue, and reasoned with the Jews.

20 When they desired him to tarry longer time with them, he consented not;

24 ¶ [e] And a certain Jew named Apollos, born at Alexandria, an eloquent man, and mighty in the scriptures, came to Ephesus.

25 This man was instructed in the way of the Lord; and being fervent in the spirit, he spake and taught diligently the things of the Lord, knowing only the baptism of John.

26 And he began to speak boldly in the synagogue: whom when Aquila and Priscilla had heard, they took him unto them,

He only means, that he would no longer preach to the Jews at that place. Dr. Whitby.

7. — entered into a certain man's house, &c.] It seems probable that this Justus had a large room in his house, fit for St. Paul's preaching to his disciples when he left the synagogue. Bp. Pearce.

10. — I have much people in this city.] So they are called, because Christ saw that they were disposed to believe, and by faith become His people. Dr. Whitby.

12. — Gallio] This Gallio was the elder brother of Seneca, the famous Roman philosopher, by whom he is praised for his great mildness of disposition. Bp. Pearce.

—— was the deputy of Achaia,] At the time when this was written, the Romans comprehended under the name of Achaia all that part of Greece which lay south of Thessaly. Gallio was the deputy-governour of this province: the Romans called such officer by the title of proconsul. Bp. Pearce.

13. — contrary to the law.] Meaning, contrary to their law, the law of Moses. Bp. Pearce.

15. — of words and names,] Of doctrine and of names, as whether Jesus be the Christ, &c. Abp. Newcome.

17. — Sosthenes,] He is mentioned at 1 Cor. i. 1.

—— And Gallio cared for none of those things.] It does not appear from hence, as some have thought, that Gallio was indifferent to all religion; he seems only to have determined not to make himself a judge, to decide upon the points of variance between the Jews and Christians. Bp. Pearce.

18. — Cenchrea:] Or, Cenchreæ, a seaport near to Corinth.

—— for he had a vow.] This was either a vow of Nazaritism, (see Numb. vi,) which St. Paul had made to accommodate himself to the Jews, or some other vow which he had made, perhaps to express his gratitude for the Divine goodness. Beausobre.

19. — came to Ephesus,] Ephesus was a famous city, the metropolis of Proconsular Asia, situated on the river Cayster, not far from the sea. It was particularly celebrated by heathen writers for its temple of Diana, which for size, furniture, and workmanship, was esteemed one of the seven wonders of the world. Dr. Wells.

21. — this feast] The feast of the passover. Bp. Pearce.

22. — and gone up, &c.] Gone up to Jerusalem, and saluted the church there. This was his fourth journey thither, about twenty-one years after his conversion, and he was now present at the passover. Bp. Pearce.

25. — instructed in the way of the Lord;] That is, in the doctrine taught by St. John the Baptist, which was to prepare the way of the Lord, Luke iii. 4.

—— and taught diligently the things &c.] That is, taught with exactness, as far as his instruction had enabled him; for, by knowing only St. John's baptism, he only knew, that men were to receive "the baptism of repentance for the remission of sins," and were to believe on Jesus, that was to come after him, chap. xix. 4; and Luke iii. 3, 16. *Bp. and expounded unto him the way of God more perfectly.

27 And when he was disposed to pass into Achaia, the brethren wrote, exhorting the disciples to receive him: who, when he was come, helped them much which had believed through grace:

28 For he mightily convinced the Jews, and that publickly, shewing by the scriptures that Jesus was Christ.

CHAP. XIX.

6 The Holy Ghost is given by Paul's hands. 9 The Jews blaspheme his doctrine, which is confirmed by miracles. 13 The Jewish exorcists 16 are beaten by the devil. 19 Conjuring books are burnt. 24 Demetrius, for love of gain, raiseth an uproar against Paul, 35 which is appeased by the townclerk.

AND it came to pass, that, while Apollos was at Corinth, Paul having passed through the upper coasts came to Ephesus: and finding certain disciples,

2 He said unto them, Have ye received the Holy Ghost since ye believed? And they said unto him, We have not so much as heard whether there be any Holy Ghost.

3 And he said unto them, Unto what then were ye baptized? And they said, Unto John's baptism.

[a] Matt. 3. 11.

4 Then said Paul, [a] John verily baptized with the baptism of repentance, saying unto the people, that they should believe on him which should come after him, that is, on Christ Jesus.

5 When they heard this, they were baptized in the name of the Lord Jesus. Anno DOMINI 56.

6 And when Paul had laid his hands upon them, the Holy Ghost came on them; and they spake with tongues, and prophesied.

7 And all the men were about twelve.

8 And he went into the synagogue, and spake boldly for the space of three months, disputing and persuading the things concerning the kingdom of God.

9 But when divers were hardened, and A. D. 57. believed not, but spake evil of that way before the multitude, he departed from them, and separated the disciples, disputing daily in the school of one Tyrannus.

10 And this continued by the space of two years; so that all they which dwelt in Asia heard the word of the Lord Jesus, both Jews and Greeks.

11 And God wrought special miracles by the hands of Paul:

12 So that from his body were brought unto the sick handkerchiefs or aprons, and the diseases departed from them, and the evil spirits went out of them.

13 ¶ Then certain of the vagabond A. D. 58. Jews, exorcists, took upon them to call over them which had evil spirits the name of the Lord Jesus, saying, We adjure you by Jesus whom Paul preacheth.

14 And there were seven sons of one Sceva, a Jew, and chief of the priests, which did so.

27. — through grace:] Through the favour of God in vouchsafing to them the knowledge of it. Dr. Whitby.

Chap. XIX. ver. 1. — having passed through the upper coasts came &c.] Having passed through those parts of Asia Minor, which lay to the north of Ephesus, namely, Galatia and Phrygia, chap. xviii. 23, he came to Ephesus, as he had promised in chap. xviii. 21. Bp. Pearce.

2. — Have ye received the Holy Ghost] Have ye received the gifts of the Holy Ghost, since ye believed? Dr. Whitby.

—— We have not so much as heard &c.] The expression signifies, not that they had never heard of the Spirit of God, but only that they had not heard of the giving of it, which the Apostle mentioned. So we read at John vii. 39, that "the Holy Ghost was not yet;" where is not denied the existence of the Holy Ghost, but the plentiful effusion of it. Bp. Pearson.

3. — Unto what then were ye baptized?] Hereby intimating to these ignorant disciples, that, if they were baptized according to the rule of Christ, they could not be ignorant that there is a Holy Ghost, because the Apostles were commanded to baptize "in the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost." Bp. Pearson.

4. — John verily baptized &c.] The meaning of this reply is, St. John indeed baptized you unto the expectation of the Messiah that was to come; but, before you enjoy the benefit of His actual coming, you must verify that expectation by receiving Him, now that He is come; and fulfil the intention of St. John's baptism, by being afterwards baptized unto the name of Christ. St. John's baptism was but a promise or declaration of your intention, of being afterwards baptized unto Christ; and the advantage you expect from being baptized by St. John, can be made good to you only by fulfilling that promise, in embracing the doctrine and religion of Christ. Dr. S. Clarke.

—— the baptism of repentance,] Exhorting men to such a reformation of life, as would qualify them for the blessings the Messiah was to bring. Pyle.

5. — in the name of the Lord Jesus.] That is, into the faith and obedience of the Christian religion, and in the form appointed by the Lord Jesus, at Matt. xxviii. 19. Bp. Mann.

8. — went into the synagogue, &c.] This was conformable to his usual custom of first proposing the Gospel to his own brethren, the Jews. Dr. Hales.

9. — when divers were hardened,] That is, would not believe, after sufficient evidence afforded them, that "Jesus was the Christ." Dr. Whitby.

—— but spake evil of that way] Not only rejected this holy religion, but railed and openly reviled it. Pyle.

—— disputing daily &c.] Using the private room of Tyrannus as a place where he discoursed to the converts, and satisfied the doubts and answered the objections of others. Bp. Mann. Tyrannus may probably have been a teacher of philosophy or rhetorick, who had a large room in which he used to read lectures to his followers. Bp. Pearce.

12. — the diseases — the evil spirits] Observe that the diseases and evil spirits are here mentioned, as things distinct from each other. See note at Matt. iv. 24. Bp. Pearce.

13. — certain of the vagabond Jews, exorcists,] Certain Jews who made a trade of strolling about with the pretence of curing possessed persons by magical arts. Pyle.

Anno DOMINI 58.

15 And the evil spirit answered and said, Jesus I know, and Paul I know; but who are ye?

16 And the man in whom the evil spirit was leaped on them, and overcame them, and prevailed against them, so that they fled out of that house naked and wounded.

17 And this was known to all the Jews and Greeks also dwelling at Ephesus; and fear fell on them all, and the name of the Lord Jesus was magnified.

18 And many that believed came, and confessed, and shewed their deeds.

19 Many of them also which used curious arts brought their books together, and burned them before all men: and they counted the price of them, and found it fifty thousand pieces of silver.

Anno DOMINI 58.

20 So mightily grew the word of God and prevailed.

21 ¶ After these things were ended, A. D. 59. Paul purposed in the spirit, when he had passed through Macedonia and Achaia, to go to Jerusalem, saying, After I have been there, I must also see Rome.

22 So he sent into Macedonia two of them that ministered unto him, Timotheus and Erastus; but he himself stayed in Asia for a season.

23 And the same time there arose no small stir about that way.

24 For a certain man named Demetrius, a silversmith, which made silver shrines

16.—naked] That is, without their upper garment, which was a gown or cloak. Bp. Pearce. See the note on Job xxii. 6.

18. And many that believed came, &c.] So good an effect for the advancement of the Christian profession was produced, that those converts, who had formerly dealt in any of these magical arts, came to the Apostles, confessing and repenting of their bad practices. Pyle.

19.—fifty thousand pieces] If these were the Roman silver denarii, then the whole sum is computed to amount to more than 1600*l.* of our money. Bps. Pearce and Mann.

20. So mightily grew &c.] The Gospel is frequently in the New Testament compared to light; and it did in nothing more resemble light than in this, that, as soon as the heavenly doctrine, therein contained, arose upon the world, it darted its bright rays and diffused its quickening influence from east to west with an inconceivable rapidity. The kingdom of God came not with observation, neither could men say, "Lo here! or, lo there!" Luke xvii. 20, 21. That is, it did not establish itself, like other kingdoms, in a slow and leisurely manner, so that men might easily trace it from its rise through the several steps of its progress, but fixed itself at once almost every where, with so rapid and amazing a course, as did, as it were, leave the eyes and observations of men behind it. And still, as it went along, it gained mighty spoils from all religions, and gathered vast multitudes of every country under its banners. And it is most clear that this success of the Gospel was miraculous, and chiefly owing to the mighty operations of the Holy Spirit of God; for the natural and visible causes, which concurred to the production of this great effect, were not any ways equal to the effect produced; and therefore some supernatural and invisible cause must needs have given birth to it. The appearing causes and instruments of this wondrous revolution were, chiefly, twelve men, of obscure birth and plain understandings, without learning, eloquence, or experience. These men set out from Jerusalem with the design of altering the settled habits, the inveterate prejudices, the established rites and religions, of all countries. They dispersed themselves through all quarters of the earth, and they succeeded every where, prevailing with great multitudes in a very short time, in every nation and kingdom, to submit to the laws, and to own the religion, of Jesus. Here was no manner of proportion between the effect and the cause, between the work which was wrought, and the instruments which wrought it; and therefore we may, and must, conclude that a Divine invisible power went along with them at every step, and miraculously blessed their endeavours. Bp. Atterbury.

The word of God, which grew from very unpromising beginnings so mightily, and prevailed so speedily over the unbelieving world, was manifestly propagated in opposition to the united force and cunning of men and devils, by a power eminently superiour to both, and therefore most certainly Divine. This wonderful propagation of the Gospel, with such incredible success, and by methods so very extraordinary and peculiar, should ever be contemplated with just wonder, and ought always to be esteemed a most illustrious proof of the truth of Christianity; so that, if no other miracle had been wrought in support of it, this alone would have been sufficient to establish its truth. For, that a doctrine so unacceptable to flesh and blood, so irreconcilable with the secular interest, as well as the corrupt inclinations of mankind, so violently opposed by all the force and malice of men, should irresistibly persuade both Jew and Gentile, and draw the whole world after it by cords so strong, and yet so easy, without any outward compulsion, or prospect of advantage or reward, except what was future and invisible, but with the present and visible terrour of the greatest hardships and sufferings: this, if all other tokens had been wanting, must have been owned to be the effect of a power truly Divine. And hereby the Christian religion stands remarkably distinguished from all religious impostures, whose rise and growth have always manifestly been owing to the plausibility and agreeableness of the doctrines taught, or to the subtlety and artifice of the teachers, or to the last and strongest argument of a bad cause, menace and coaction. Such was the introduction of Mahometism into the world, which is a scheme of religion compounded out of all other religions, that it might recommend itself to some of all; and it is dressed up with a good deal of art and cunning, and admirably suited to the palate of the most sensual; and yet, with all those plausible coverings, it was forced to hew out its way with the sword, and it is supported to this day by the same method of violence.

Whereas the Christian religion, stript of all these advantages and aids, and clogged with all possible disadvantages and impediments, found a way unforced, and prevailed by its own native efficacy, and even by suffering; baffled and subdued all the boisterous rage and cruelty of its most inveterate enemies; so that we may well believe it, what it has distinguished itself to be, the power of God, and the wisdom of God. Again, since the Gospel has from the beginning prevailed so mightily, and triumphed so remarkably over all opposition; we rely upon the same Divine power and wisdom, by which it hath been hitherto supported, that it will still prevail, still increase and advance, conquering and to conquer! for we may comfort ourselves in this, that the Christian faith hath already been engaged in all sorts of conflicts and trials, but has always risen superiour: hath been opposed (but always in vain) by arts and arguments, and artillery of all sorts; so that no modern engine can now be played upon us, no subtle stratagem invented, but what hath been anciently used and often baffled. Dr. Moss.

25 Whom he called together with the workmen of like occupation, and said, Sirs, ye know that by this craft we have our wealth.

26 Moreover ye see and hear, that not alone at Ephesus, but almost throughout all Asia, this Paul hath persuaded and turned away much people, saying that they be no gods, which are made with hands:

27 So that not only this our craft is in danger to be set at nought; but also that the temple of the great goddess Diana should be despised, and her magnificence should be destroyed, whom all Asia and the world worshippeth.

28 And when they heard these sayings, they were full of wrath, and cried out, saying, Great is Diana of the Ephesians.

29 And the whole city was filled with confusion: and having caught Gaius and Aristarchus, men of Macedonia, Paul's companions in travel, they rushed with one accord into the theatre.

30 And when Paul would have entered in unto the people, the disciples suffered him not.

31 And certain of the chief of Asia, which were his friends, sent unto him, desiring him that he would not adventure himself into the theatre.

been small representations in silver of that wonder of the world, the temple of Diana at Ephesus, in each of which, perhaps, a little image of her was placed: they were bought by strangers as matters of curiosity, and also of devotion. Bp. Pearce. It was the custom to place these little chapels, representing the form of a temple, upon an altar or other solemn place; and then, the doors being opened, the image was represented to the spectators, standing or sitting in state. Dr. Hammond.

27. — the temple of the great goddess Diana] The heathens reckoned Diana among their greater divinities, and the title of the "great goddess" was applied by way of peculiar distinction to Diana of Ephesus. This false deity had altars and temples in various parts of Greece; but the Diana of Ephesus was far more celebrated than all others, both on account of the antiquity of the worship there established, and the extraordinary magnificence of the temple. Beausobre.

30. — would have entered in unto the people,] For the purpose of making a publick defence in favour of himself and his two friends, whom the people had dragged into the theatre. Bp. Mann.

31. — certain of the chief of Asia,] The chief rulers of the province. Abp. Newcome. The literal translation of the word in the original is, "Asiarchs." These were persons of rank and opulence, selected from the principal provinces and cities of Asia, whose office it was to take charge of all religious solemnities, and to celebrate, at their own expense, publick games in the theatre, in honour of the gods. Schleusner. From the mention of these "Asiarchs," it is supposed by some that the publick games were now celebrating in the theatre, and that St. Paul and his companions were in danger of being thrown by the populace to the wild beasts. Dr. Hammond.

33. — the Jews putting him forward.] It seems probable that Alexander, a Jew, (ver. 34,) seeing those of his own nation involved in the affair, was urged by them to undertake their defence, and make the whole accusation fall on St. Paul and the Christians. The people stop him on perceiving him to be a Jew, as supposing that he was going to speak against Diana. Beausobre.

35. — the townclerk] Or principal magistrate of the city. Schleusner.

—— is a worshipper &c.] The word in the original means more properly, 'the guardian of the temple of the great goddess Diana;" or, as in the margin of our translation, "the temple keeper." Medals of Ephesus are now extant, on which the name of some officer is inscribed, with this title, 'Guardian' or 'warden of the temple;' and, as this officer was appointed by the citizens, the city itself was properly called by the same title, 'The guardian' or 'warden of the temple.' Bp. Pearce.

—— the image which fell down from Jupiter?] The statue of Diana here was of such high antiquity, that it was a received opinion among the vulgar, that it had come down from heaven, Beausobre.

37. — nor yet blasphemers of your goddess.] He seems to argue, that what had been said by St. Paul against the worship of images made with hands, could not affect their case, who were worshippers of an image which they were persuaded was not made with hands, but came down from heaven. The townclerk, or recorder, seems to have given this artful turn to St. Paul's argument, solely with a view to pacify the people. Bp. Mann.

38. — the law is open,] There were appointed days when the proconsul and his deputy used to attend the courts. Grotius.

CHAP. XX.

1 Paul goeth to Macedonia. 7 He celebrateth the Lord's supper, and preacheth. 9 Eutychus having fallen down dead, 10 is raised to life. 17 At Miletum he calleth the elders together, telleth them what shall befall to himself, 28 committeth God's flock to them, 29 warneth them of false teachers, 32 commendeth them to God, 36 prayeth with them, and goeth his way.

AND after the uproar was ceased, Paul called unto him the disciples, and embraced them, and departed for to go into Macedonia.

2 And when he had gone over those parts, and had given them much exhortation, he came into Greece,

Anno DOMINI 60.

3 And there abode three months. And when the Jews laid wait for him, as he was about to sail into Syria, he purposed to return through Macedonia.

4 And there accompanied him into Asia Sopater of Berea; and of the Thessalonians, Aristarchus and Secundus; and Gaius of Derbe, and Timotheus; and of Asia, Tychicus and Trophimus.

5 These going before tarried for us at Troas.

6 And we sailed away from Philippi after the days of unleavened bread, and came unto them to Troas in five days; where we abode seven days.

7 And upon the first day of the week,

Chap. XX. ver. 2. — when he had gone over those parts,] At this time probably it was, that he preached the Gospel, as he states at Rom. xv. 19, "round about from Jerusalem unto Illyricum." Dr. Wells.

—— he came into Greece,] The term "Greece," as used in the New Testament, seems equivalent to Achaia, that is, to include not only Greece proper, where Athens stood, but also the Peloponnesus; accordingly, St. Paul is thought to have visited Corinth during his three months' stay at this time in Greece. Dr. Wells.

4. — Sopater — Aristarchus &c.] We know but few particulars concerning the persons mentioned in this verse. Sopater is generally thought to be the same with Sosipater, whom St. Paul mentions as his kinsman at Rom. xvi. 21. Aristarchus of Thessalonica is before mentioned, as a Macedonian, chap. xix. 29; he attended St. Paul in his voyage to Rome, chap. xxvii. 2, and was his fellow-labourer, Philem. ver. 24, and a fellow-prisoner with him, Coloss. iv. 10, 11. Secundus is not mentioned any where but here. Gaius of Derbe, if he be not a different person of the same name, is elsewhere mentioned as a man of Macedonia, chap. xix. 29, of which, as some suppose, he was a native, but descended from a family that came from Derbe; he was baptized by St. Paul at Corinth, 1 Cor. i. 14, and entertained him as his host while he abode there, Rom. xvi. 23. And afterwards St. John directs his third Epistle to him. Timothy was a native of Lystra, chap. xvi. 1, whom St. Paul particularly honoured with his friendship, and distinguished by his two Epistles to him, as well as by joining his name with his own in the title of several other epistles, 2 Cor. Philip. Col. 1 and 2 Thess. Philem. He frequently attended the Apostle in his travels, and laboured with him in the service of the Gospel, in which he was so diligent and zealous, that it was no wonder he was imprisoned for it, Heb. xiii. 23. Tychicus of Asia was often sent on messages by St. Paul, 2 Tim. iv. 12; Tit. iii. 12; and more than once is recommended by him to the churches as a beloved brother, and faithful minister and fellow-servant in the Lord, whom he employed not only to acquaint them with his own affairs, but for this purpose also, that he might know their state, and comfort their hearts, Eph. vi. 21, 22; Col. iv. 7, 8. Trophimus, who was of Ephesus, appears to have been a Gentile convert, whom we find afterwards with St. Paul at Jerusalem, chap. xxi. 29, and who attended him in other journeys till he left him at Miletum sick, 2 Tim. iv. 20. These two last are said to be "of Asia;" and being distinguished here from Gaius and Timothy, who were of Derbe and Lystra, which lay in Asia Minor, it is plain they are so called as being natives of the Proconsular Asia. Dr. Doddridge.

5. — tarried for us at Troas.] St. Paul being at this time accompanied by St. Luke, as appears from the use of the first person plural.

7. — upon the first day of the week,] We have here a clear proof that the first Christians were accustomed to keep holy the first day of the week, as a day appointed for religious worship; for the words are, "when the disciples came together," as a matter of ordinary custom, not as if they met on any extraordinary occasion. Dr. Whitby.

So early was this day set apart for the uses of religion; so early was the practice of joining with the worship of God the preaching of His word, as means co-operating to the same general end, the edification of those who were already Christians. Dr. H. Stebbing.

It appears from Gen. ii. 3, that God "blessed the seventh day and sanctified it;" and thus ordained, that every seventh day, or one day in seven, should be exempted from the ordinary cares and business of the world, and more immediately dedicated to religious uses and the service of God. This ordinance, which from the nature of its origin must necessarily be binding on all mankind, was repeated as one of the ten commandments given on mount Sinai, which our Lord expressly declared to be of perpetual obligation, Matt. v. 17—19. The strict observance of the seventh day, or sabbath, was enforced upon the Jewish nation by peculiar commands adapted to the general tenour of institutions designed to separate them from the rest of the world, and declared to be founded in circumstances peculiar to that people, Deut. v. 15. These positive injunctions, designed to commemorate their deliverance from Egyptian bondage, which was "a shadow of things to come," Col. ii. 17, were of a temporary nature, and ceased to be binding on them when the Jewish law was abrogated by the coming of the Messiah; and, the Saviour of the world having risen from the dead on the first day of the week, that day was then appointed to be set apart for the purpose of religious worship, according to the original institution at the creation, to commemorate the emancipation of all mankind from the power of sin and death. The sacred writers do not mention that the Apostles received any express direction to make this change in the day, which had been so long appropriated to the service of God; but, as we know that they acted by inspiration on all occasions where religious doctrines or duties were concerned, it is impossible to doubt their authority on this point; and indeed this change seems clearly to have been sanctioned by the appearance of Christ in the midst of them, when they were assembled together, John xx. 19, and by the descent of the Holy Ghost, both on the first day of the week. It is difficult to imagine circumstances more strikingly calculated to prove the universal and perpetual obligation of devoting the seventh day, or one day in seven, as "holy unto the Lord," and the abolition of the Jewish ritual by the establishment of Christianity. Bp. Tomline.

Anno DOMINI 60.

when the disciples came together [a] to break bread, Paul preached unto them, ready to depart on the morrow; and continued his speech until midnight.

[a] Chap. 2. 46.

8 And there were many lights in the upper chamber, where they were gathered together.

9 And there sat in a window a certain young man named Eutychus, being fallen into a deep sleep: and as Paul was long preaching, he sunk down with sleep, and fell down from the third loft, and was taken up dead.

10 And Paul went down, and fell on him, and embracing him said, Trouble not yourselves; for his life is in him.

11 When he therefore was come up again, and had broken bread, and eaten, and talked a long while, even till break of day, so he departed.

12 And they brought the young man alive, and were not a little comforted.

13 ¶ And we went before to ship, and sailed unto Assos, there intending to take in Paul: for so had he appointed, minding himself to go afoot.

14 And when he met with us at Assos, we took him in, and came to Mitylene.

15 And we sailed thence, and came the next day over against Chios; and the next day we arrived at Samos, and tarried at Trogyllium; and the next day we came to Miletus.

Anno DOMINI 60.

16 For Paul had determined to sail by Ephesus, because he would not spend the time in Asia: for he hasted, if it were possible for him, to be at Jerusalem the day of Pentecost.

17 ¶ And from Miletus he sent to Ephesus, and called the elders of the church.

18 And when they were come to him, he said unto them, Ye know, from the first day that I came into Asia, after what manner I have been with you at all seasons,

19 Serving the Lord with all humility of mind, and with many tears, and temptations, which befell me by the lying in wait of the Jews:

20 And how I kept back nothing that was profitable unto you, but have shewed you, and have taught you publickly, and from house to house,

21 Testifying both to the Jews, and also to the Greeks, repentance toward God, and faith toward our Lord Jesus Christ.

22 And now, behold, I go bound in the spirit unto Jerusalem, not knowing the things that shall befall me there:

23 Save that the Holy Ghost witnesseth in every city, saying that bonds and afflictions ‖ abide me.

‖ Or, wait for me.

——to break bread,] To celebrate the eucharist, or the Lord's supper. Thus it was the custom of the Church, in the earliest times, to celebrate the holy communion on the Lord's day. Accordingly Pliny, in his letter to the Roman emperour Trajan, written probably only six years after the death of the Evangelist St. John, says, that he found nothing to allege against the Christians except their obstinacy in their superstition, and their custom of meeting together on a set day before it was light, and binding themselves by a sacrament to do no evil. Justin Martyr also, who wrote about forty years after the death of that same Apostle, states that on Sunday, as the day of our Lord's resurrection, all the Christians met together, to read publickly the writings of the Apostles and Prophets; that, after this, the president made an oration to them, exhorting them to imitate and practise the things which they had heard, and that, after joining in prayer, they used to celebrate the sacrament and to give alms. Dr. Whitby.

9.—fell down from the third loft,] Or story. Sir J. Chardin informs us, that the windows in the East are very large, and even with the floor of the room. Harmer.

10.—for his life is in him.] St. Paul restores him to life by a miracle; yet humbly declines attributing this great power to himself. Abp. Newcome.

11.—and had broken bread,] Although the expression, here and in other places, used for the Lord's Supper, is "breaking bread;" yet it is to be understood that the cup also was consecrated and distributed. This is allowed even by the members of the Church of Rome, who acknowledge that the eucharist was always consecrated in both kinds. Dr. Whitby.

13.—unto Assos,] A seaport town at the southwest part of the province of Troas, over against Mitylene. Dr. Wells.

14.—Mitylene.] A principal city in the island of Lesbos, reckoned about seven miles from the mainland of Troas. It is now called Metelin. Dr. Wells.

15.—Chios;—Samos,] Islands in the Archipelago. See the map.

——Trogyllium;—Miletus.] Towns on the continent of Asia Minor, lying south of Ephesus.

17.—the elders of the church.] Who these elders were, cannot accurately be known. Whether they were the bishops of Asia Minor in general, or only the chief of the church at Ephesus, of which Timothy (at this time travelling with St. Paul) was bishop. Brewster.

18.—Ye know, &c.] In every part of this address, conscious truth and honesty, sincere piety, and prudent, but earnest zeal, are displayed in a very striking manner, which cannot fail to penetrate the heart and convince the understanding of every reader. Dr. Graves.

In this his last visitation, St. Paul takes leave of the people in a most cordial and affectionate manner. Conscious of his own integrity, he appeals to them as witnesses of his behaviour from his first coming into Asia; how he had "served the Lord with all humility," and through many trials and temptations; how he had preached the word amongst them with the utmost sincerity; had concealed no profitable truth, but had freely and openly communicated every thing of moment, pressing equally on Jews and Gentiles the necessity of "repentance toward God and faith toward our Lord Jesus Christ." Bp. Newton.

21. Testifying] Declaring or preaching (Bp. Pearce) both to the Jews and to the Gentiles that they should turn unto God, doing works meet for repentance, and should believe on the Lord Jesus. Dr. Whitby.

22.—I go bound in the spirit] He either means that he was compelled, and, as it were, constrained with bonds by the Holy Ghost to go up to Jerusalem; or, that he foresaw by the Holy Ghost that bonds awaited him at Jerusalem; which therefore he speaks of, as if they were present. Dr. Stack.

Anno DOMINI 60.

24 But none of these things move me, neither count I my life dear unto myself, so that I might finish my course with joy, and the ministry, which I have received of the Lord Jesus, to testify the gospel of the grace of God.

25 And now, behold, I know that ye all, among whom I have gone preaching the kingdom of God, shall see my face no more.

26 Wherefore I take you to record this day, that I am pure from the blood of all men.

27 For I have not shunned to declare unto you all the counsel of God.

28 ¶ Take heed therefore unto yourselves, and to all the flock, over the which the Holy Ghost hath made you overseers, to feed the church of God, which he hath purchased with his own blood.

29 For I know this, that after my departing shall grievous wolves enter in among you, not sparing the flock.

30 Also of your own selves shall men arise, speaking perverse things, to draw away disciples after them.

Anno DOMINI 60.

31 Therefore watch, and remember, that by the space of three years I ceased not to warn every one night and day with tears.

32 And now, brethren, I commend you to God, and to the word of his grace, which is able to build you up, and to give you an inheritance among all them which are sanctified.

33 I have coveted no man's silver, or gold, or apparel.

34 Yea, ye yourselves know, [b] that these hands have ministered unto my necessities, and to them that were with me.

[b] 1 Cor. 4. 12. 1 Thess. 2. 9. 2 Thess. 3. 8.

35 I have shewed you all things, how that so labouring ye ought to support the weak, and to remember the words of the Lord Jesus, how he said, It is more blessed to give than to receive.

24. But none of these things move &c.] He affirms, that, whatever may befall him, he will remain resigned and contented, while he is discharging the most honourable and high office of preaching the gracious terms of Christ's religion for the good of mankind; and that death itself would only put a happy and joyful period to those labours, the success of which is the main end for which he desires to live. Pyle.

26. — I am pure from the blood of all men.] I am not answerable for the ruin of any, if they perish; "for I have not shunned to declare unto you all the counsel of God." Hence we learn how necessary it is for a pastor to declare to his people all that is necessary for them to believe and to do, in order to their salvation, that the guilt of their ruin may not rest upon him. Dr. Whitby.

27. — the counsel of God.] The counsel of God is His will, with the conditions that He requires to be performed, in order to salvation. Bp. Mann.

28. — overseers.] Literally, bishops. It does not indeed appear that there was time to assemble all the bishops of Asia, or even the greater part of them; but as Ephesus was the metropolis of the Church, as well as of the province, it is probable that a considerable number of them might be able to attend the summons. Brewster.

—— the church of God,] The Church of God is the body of Christian people, (Matt. xviii. 17,) the flock, over which the authorized ministers of God are shepherds and overseers. Bp. Mann.

—— the church of God, which he hath purchased] It is this consideration that stamps a peculiar value on the Church, that it was purchased at no less a price than the precious blood of Christ. This passage particularly displays the divinity of our Saviour, for the blood of Jesus is here emphatically called "the blood of God." Brewster.

From these words it undoubtedly follows, that Jesus Christ, who shed His blood for His Church, is here eminently styled God. It is true indeed that some ancient manuscripts have in this passage 'the Church of the Lord' instead of "the Church of God:" but, in support of the received text, it may be observed, that the phrase, 'the Church of the Lord,' never once occurs in the New Testament, whereas the phrase "the Church of God," occurs most frequently. See 1 Cor. i. 2; x. 32; xi. 22; xv. 9; 2 Cor. i. 1; Gal. i. 13; 1 Tim. iii. 5. Dr. Whitby.

Besides those ancient manuscripts which read 'the Church of the Lord,' there are also others which read 'the Church of Christ,' and 'the Church of the Lord God.' There is, however, little doubt, but that the reading given in our translation, "the Church of God," is the true reading. If the author wrote the words "of God," we can easily explain why different transcribers may have written the words 'of the Lord,' or 'of Christ,' as corrections of the text, or as notes in the margin to explain it, since the expression "the blood of God," is a very extraordinary expression. But, if the author had originally written 'of the Lord,' or 'of Christ,' it is quite inconceivable that any one should have altered these words into so unusual an expression as that which stands in our text; and on this supposition the great variety of different readings is wholly inexplicable. Michaelis.

According to either reading, the sense is much the same; for Christ, who purchased the Church with His own blood, is both Lord and God. Pyle.

29. — grievous wolves] False teachers, seducing the faithful, and causing great mischief in the Church. Dr. Hammond. Such were Cerinthus and other false apostles and deceitful workers among the Jews. Dr. Whitby.

30. — shall men arise, &c.] Such were Hymenæus and Alexander, who made shipwreck of the faith, 1 Tim. i. 20; Hymenæus and Philetus, who taught that the resurrection was past already, 2 Tim. ii. 18; for it is probable that, in those epistles addressed to Timothy, the Apostle speaks of persons dispersing pernicious doctrines at Ephesus. Dr. Whitby.

32. — I commend you to God, &c.] I recommend you to the providence of God, and to the blessings and promises of His Gospel, which, with your own sincere endeavour, will not fail to keep you steady in all branches of your duty, and bring you to the eternal reward of all true believers. Pyle.

35. I have shewed you all things, &c.] Among other necessary Christian duties, I have taught you, even by my own example, to be industrious in your respective callings, that, working as I have done, ye may be able, not only to supply your own wants, but also to support those who cannot work to support themselves. Bp. Mann.

—— It is more blessed to give] Because, to give rather than to receive, is an argument of a more happy spirit and temper; also because it shews a more happy state and condition, and because it will have the happiness of a greater reward. Abp. Tillotson. This saying of our Lord is not recorded in any of the Gospels, but was delivered by tradition, and was at that time well known and remembered amongst Christians. Bp. Newton. The Evangelists have assured us, that they neither intended to relate, nor have

2 And finding a ship sailing over unto Phenicia, we went aboard, and set forth.

3 Now when we had discovered Cyprus, we left it on the left hand, and sailed into Syria, and landed at Tyre: for there the ship was to unlade her burden.

4 And finding disciples, we tarried there seven days: who said to Paul through the Spirit, that he should not go up to Jerusalem.

5 And when we had accomplished those days, we departed and went our way; and they all brought us on our way, with wives and children, till we were out of the city: and we kneeled down on the shore, and prayed.

—— unto Patara:] A seaport town in Syria, formerly beautified with a fair haven and many temples. Dr. Wells.

3. — and sailed into Syria,] Phenicia, to which place the ship was bound, was reckoned a part of Syria. Bp. Pearce.

4. — who said to Paul through the Spirit, &c.] It had been revealed to them by the Spirit, that St. Paul could not go to Jerusalem without exposing himself to danger; and in consequence, from charitable motives, they tried to dissuade him from going. Beausobre.

7. And when we had finished &c.] The sense seems to be, "And we came from Tyre to Ptolemais, where our voyage ended." Dr. Whitby, Bp. Pearce.

—— Ptolemais,] This was a celebrated seaport in Syria. Its ancient name was Accho, Judg. i. 31. It was enlarged and beautified by the first of the Egyptian Ptolemies, and from him was called Ptolemais. It has been celebrated in modern history under the name of Acre. Dr. Wells.

8. — and came unto Cesarea:] It seems that they travelled by land from Ptolemais to Cesarea, ver. 7. Bp. Pearce.

—— Philip the evangelist,] So styled, not from his writing, but from his preaching, the Gospel. Dr. Cave. By an Evangelist is meant a person who, being attached to no particular church, was sent by the Apostles, as was necessary, either for the purpose of founding new churches, or of confirming those which were already established. Beausobre.

—— which was one of the seven;] One of the seven deacons, whose appointment is mentioned at chap. vi. 5.

9. — the same man had four daughters,] In opposition to the celibacy required of Christian ministers in the Romish church, it should be observed, that St. Philip the Evangelist is here mentioned as a married man: and, if Christ did not require celibacy in the first preachers of the Gospel, there is no reason to think that it is necessary in their successors. Bp. Tomline.

—— which did prophesy.] This was an instance of God's accomplishing an ancient promise, that, in the times of the Messiah, He would pour out His Spirit on all flesh, on their sons and their daughters, servants and handmaidens, and they should prophesy, Joel ii. 28, 29. These virgin prophetesses were endowed with the gift of foretelling future events. Dr. Cave.

11. — he took Paul's girdle,] This was according to a custom not unfrequent with Prophets, of representing some future events by actions expressive of them. See Isai. xx. 2; Jerem. xiii. 1, 4; xxvii. 2, &c. Dr. Stack.

—— So shall the Jews — bind] So shall the Jews be the occasion of his being there bound, and delivered up to the Gentiles, ver. 33. Bp. Pearce.

13. — and to break mine heart?] The true Christian does not root out his affections, but fixes them on proper objects: we are only to guard against their excesses; to take care that they may not tempt us to violate or omit any of the Divine commands, or so entirely to occupy the mind, as in any manner to prevent our perfect submission to the Divine will. Dr. Stack.

——and went up to Jerusalem.] This was St. Paul's fifth and last journey to Jerusalem, about twenty-five years from his conversion. Bp. Mann.

18. —unto James;] St. James the Apostle, who was now bishop of Jerusalem. Bp. Mann. Here we find St. James bishop of Jerusalem, his presbyters or elders with him, and his deacons, mentioned ver. 28; and so we have reason to believe that other celebrated churches conformed to this model, having bishops, presbyters, and deacons. Dr. Whitby.

——and all the elders] The word, rendered in the New Testament "elders," is in the original "presbyters," from which our word "priest" is corrupted. Our ancestors, the Saxons, first used Preoster, whence by a farther contraction came Preste, and Priest. The high and low Dutch have Priester; the French Prestre, or Prêtre; the Italian Prete; but the Spaniard only speaks full Presbytero. Jos. Mede.

21. —they are informed of thee, &c.] They were misinformed in this, as we may reasonably conclude: for it no where appears that St. Paul had taught any thing, but what was agreeable to the decrees made by the Apostles and elders in chap. xv. 24, &c. namely, that it was not necessary for the believing Gentiles to be circumcised and keep the law of Moses. And he had prevailed with Timothy, though the son of a Greek, to be circumcised, that he might not give offence to the Jews, chap. xvi. 3. Bp. Pearce.

22. What is it therefore? &c.] What therefore is to be done, since the multitudes of Jews, which have thus been informed of thee, must needs come together? Dr. Whitby.

23. —which have a vow on them;] Most probably, the vow of a Nazarite. See the laws concerning Nazarites at Numb. vi.

24. —purify thyself] Or, "separate thyself." This purification was a separation unto the Lord; and the persons, who were to be purified, were to abstain from certain meats, actions, and habits, and were more particularly to guard themselves against touching any thing dead or unclean. See Numb. vi. 6, 7, 9. Bp. Pearce.

——and be at charges with them,] Or, be at charges for them; that is, defray their expenses for shaving their heads, and making the appointed offerings. Bp. Pearce.

It appears from a passage of Josephus, that it was deemed an act of piety among the Jews to defray for those, who were under the Nazarite vow, the expenses which attended its completion. The custom, as mentioned by him, is remarkable, and in close conformity with this scriptural account. Archdeacon Paley.

26. Then Paul took the men, &c.] We see from this behaviour of St. Paul, that for the sake of peace, and to avoid giving offence, it is expedient and lawful to conform to established usages and ceremonies, if innocent, though not essential to religion. Bp. Mann.

——entered into the temple,] He entered into the inner temple, or the court of the Israelites, (into which no Gentile or proselyte of the gate was allowed to enter,) "to signify the accomplishment," &c. that is, to declare when the days of purification were to end. It seems to have been in the choice of the purifier what the number of days should be, and St. Paul seems to have chosen seven days. Bp. Pearce.

29 (For they had seen before with him in the city Trophimus an Ephesian, whom they supposed that Paul had brought into the temple.)

30 And all the city was moved, and the people ran together: and they took Paul, and drew him out of the temple: and forthwith the doors were shut.

31 And as they went about to kill him, tidings came unto the chief captain of the band, that all Jerusalem was in an uproar.

32 Who immediately took soldiers and centurions, and ran down unto them: and when they saw the chief captain and the soldiers, they left beating of Paul.

33 Then the chief captain came near, and took him, and commanded him to be bound with two chains; and demanded who he was, and what he had done.

34 And some cried one thing, some another, among the multitude: and when he could not know the certainty for the tumult, he commanded him to be carried into the castle.

35 And when he came upon the stairs, so it was, that he was borne of the soldiers for the violence of the people.

36 For the multitude of the people followed after, crying, Away with him.

37 And as Paul was to be led into the castle, he said unto the chief captain, May I speak unto thee? Who said, Canst thou speak Greek?

37, 38. — Canst thou speak Greek? Art not thou that &c.] The officer tells him, that he did not expect to hear him speak the Greek language; for, by the tumult he had raised, he took him to be that Egyptian false prophet, who a year or two ago had excited a sedition in Judea, and was routed by Felix, as Josephus relates, but made his escape. The chief captain thought that he was now taken in a similar attempt. Pyle.

38. — that Egyptian, &c.] This person, according to Josephus, came from Egypt to Jerusalem, saying that he was a prophet, and persuading the people to follow him to the mount of Olives, in order to see the walls of the city fall down at his command. Eusebius adds, that he intended, with the people whom he collected, to force a passage into the city and seize upon the Roman guards. But the attempt was prevented by Felix. Dr. Hammond.

—— that were murderers?] The word in the original means, cut-throats, shortswordsmen. These were persons, as Josephus mentions, who came up to Jerusalem, under pretence of religion, with daggers or short swords under their cloaks: and being employed by Felix to assassinate Jonathan the high priest, for which crime they escaped with impunity, they afterwards made it a practice to come up to the feasts; and, either hiring themselves out as assassins to others, or acting from motives of personal revenge, they committed numerous murders, even in the temple itself. The number of these persons, he adds, afterwards grew very considerable. Dr. Hammond.

6 And it came to pass, that, as I made my journey, and was come nigh unto Damascus about noon, suddenly there shone from heaven a great light round about me.

7 And I fell unto the ground, and heard a voice saying unto me, Saul, Saul, why persecutest thou me?

8 And I answered, Who art thou, Lord? And he said unto me, I am Jesus of Nazareth, whom thou persecutest.

9 And they that were with me saw indeed the light, and were afraid; but they heard not the voice of him that spake to me.

10 And I said, What shall I do, Lord? And the Lord said unto me, Arise, and go into Damascus; and there it shall be told thee of all things which are appointed for thee to do.

11 And when I could not see for the glory of that light, being led by the hand of them that were with me, I came into Damascus.

12 And one Ananias, a devout man according to the law, having a good report of all the Jews which dwelt there, 13 Came unto me, and stood, and said unto me, Brother Saul, receive thy sight. And the same hour I looked up upon him.

14 And he said, The God of our fathers hath chosen thee, that thou shouldest know his will, and see that Just One, and shouldest hear the voice of his mouth.

15 For thou shalt be his witness unto all men of what thou hast seen and heard.

16 And now why tarriest thou? arise, and be baptized, and wash away thy sins, calling on the name of the Lord. Anno DOMINI 60.

17 And it came to pass, that, when I was come again to Jerusalem, even while I prayed in the temple, I was in a trance;

18 And saw him saying unto me, Make haste, and get thee quickly out of Jerusalem: for they will not receive thy testimony concerning me.

19 And I said, Lord, they know that I imprisoned and beat in every synagogue them that believed on thee:

21 And he said unto me, Depart: for I will send thee far hence unto the Gentiles.

22 And they gave him audience unto this word, and then lifted up their voices, and said, Away with such a fellow from the earth: for it is not fit that he should live.

23 And as they cried out, and cast off their clothes, and threw dust into the air,

24 The chief captain commanded him to be brought into the castle, and bade that he should be examined by scourging; that he might know wherefore they cried so against him.

25 And as they bound him with thongs, Paul said unto the centurion that stood by, Is it lawful for you to scourge a man that is a Roman, and uncondemned?

26 When the centurion heard that, he went and told the chief captain, saying, Take heed what thou doest: for this man is a Roman.

27 Then the chief captain came, and said unto him, Tell me, art thou a Roman? He said, Yea.

9. — they heard not the voice] They understood not the voice.

16. — calling on the name of the Lord.] On the name of the Lord Jesus, that is, professing thyself a Christian. At chap. ix. 14, Christians are styled those who call on the name of Christ. By this expression, says St. Chrysostom, he shews that Christ was God, because it is not lawful to invoke any besides God. Dr. Whitby.

19. — Lord, they know that I imprisoned, &c.] The Jews know full well what a zealous and bitter adversary I have been against Thy religion; how I joined in the first act of persecution against St. Stephen, and carried it on in many instances afterwards, so that they could not but be convinced it must be on some certain and irresistible grounds of persuasion, that I should thus preach up the faith I once destroyed; and consequently would hearken unto me before any other Christian Apostle. Pyle.

21. — far hence unto the Gentiles.] The Apostle shewed great fortitude in thus boldly declaring, on this occasion, his mission to the Gentiles; but, as the Jews of Asia were his hearers, this expression immediately renewed the cause of their former clamour. Abp. Newcome, Grotius.

23. — and cast off their clothes, &c.] They cast off their clothes, as in the instance of St. Stephen, chap. vii. 58, that they might be the more ready to stone him; and they threw dust in the air, to shew their rage, and abhorrence of him. Dr. Whitby. It is mentioned in Ockley's History of the Saracens, that it is in modern times the practice of the Arabians to throw dust in the air, when they would express their contempt of a person speaking, and their abhorrence of what he publickly pronounced. Bp. Pearce.

24. — that he should be examined by scourging;] Scourging was inflicted in order to make a prisoner confess the crime of which he was accused. *Bp. 28. — With a great sum obtained I &c.] It appears from the Roman history, that the right of citizenship was purchased at a high price under the first emperours. Beausobre. The freedom of the city of Rome was oftentimes sold, and more particularly in the reign of the emperour Claudius. It is plain, from many unquestionable authorities, that this freedom was attainable by foreigners in various ways; by merit, by favour, by money, by being freed from servitude. It appears that multitudes of the Jews, in particular, became free in this last manner. Biscoe.

—— But I was free born.] It is doubted whether Tarsus was a Roman colony, so as to entitle the citizens to the freedom of Rome; and it is therefore conjectured that some of St. Paul's ancestors may have had the freedom of Rome conferred upon them in the civil wars for military services. Grotius.

Chap. XXIII. ver. 1. — I have lived in all good conscience] According to the best light of my conscience towards God, first as a Pharisee, Phil. iii. 6, and now as a Christian. Grotius.

St. Paul begins by endeavouring to remove the bad impressions occasioned by his appearing before the council as a malefactor. Abp. Newcome.

2. — the high priest Ananias] All that is here mentioned, relating to Ananias, is fully explained by circumstances stated by the Jewish historian Josephus, who was living at the time. Ananias was high priest at the time when the Jews were supplied with corn from Egypt, during the famine which took place in the fourth year of Claudius, Acts xi. St. Paul therefore, who took a journey to Jerusalem at that period, (Acts xv.) could not have been ignorant of the elevation of Ananias to that dignity. Soon after the holding of the first council, as it is called, at Jerusalem, Ananias was dispossessed of his office, in consequence of certain acts of violence between the Samaritans and the Jews, and sent prisoner to Rome, whence he was afterwards released, and returned to Jerusalem. From that period he could not be called high priest, in the proper sense of the word; and Jonathan, in the mean time, was raised to that office. Between the death of Jonathan, who was murdered by order of Felix, and the appointment of a successor, elapsed an interval of a vacancy in the dignity. Precisely in this interval it happened that this event occurred of St. Paul's apprehension at Jerusalem; and, the Sanhedrim being destitute of a president, Ananias undertook, of his own authority, the discharge of that office, which he executed with the greatest tyranny. It is possible, therefore, that St. Paul, who had been only a few days at Jerusalem, might be ignorant that Ananias, who had been dispossessed of the priesthood, had taken upon himself a trust to which he was not entitled; he might therefore very naturally exclaim, "I wist not, brethren, that he was the high priest." On the other hand, if he was acquainted with the fact, his expression must be considered as an indirect reproof, and a tacit refusal to recognize usurped authority. Michaelis.

—— to smite him on the mouth.] This command seems not so much to have proceeded from St. Paul's assertion of his innocence, as from the rancour entertained against him for preaching to the Gentiles, or from the imperious disposition of Ananias. Abp. Newcome.

3. — God shall smite thee, &c.] 'God is about to smite thee,' 'will shortly smite thee.' About five years after this, Ananias was dragged from an aqueduct in which he had concealed himself from a tumult, and put to death by assassins. Bp. Pearce.

—— thou whited wall:] The great men among the Jews were used to wear a white robe, and probably Ananias was so clothed at this time. St. Paul compares him to one of the Jewish sepulchres, the outside of which was made white for ornament, while the inside contained nothing but rottenness. Bp. Pearce.

This is the only instance in which an indignant reproach was drawn from St. Paul, against Ananias, who offered to him a wanton and unmerited insult: and even here the testimony of the history seems to render it probable that Ananias was not high priest, but that, in a period of anarchy, when the office was unfilled, he rashly assumed that character, which by his insolence he disgraced. This single instance excepted, (if indeed it constitutes an exception,) the language and conduct of the Apostle were uniformly temperate and decorous, as they were firm and dignified, naturally resulting from piety and sobriety of mind, utterly inconsistent with folly and fanaticism. Dr. Graves.

5. — for it is written, &c.] Exod. xxii. 28. His answer is, in substance, I did not consider his high station; if I had, I should not have spoken so sharply to him; for I am sensible, it is contrary to the law of God to treat persons in authority with disrespect. Bp. Mann.

6. But when Paul perceived &c.] On this occasion St. Paul availed himself of 'the wisdom of the serpent' to extricate himself from the hands of his enemies, thus shewing that he was no rash enthusiast, who courted persecution; and, that the Lord himself approved of his conduct, appears from ver. 11. Dr. Hales.

—— that the one part were Sadducees,] Of this sect, probably, were the high priest and his relations. Bp. Pearce. See note at chap. iv. 1.

Anno DOMINI 60.

Pharisee: [c] of the hope and resurrection of the dead I am called in question.

7 And when he had so said, there arose a dissension between the Pharisees and the Sadducees: and the multitude was divided.

8 [d] For the Sadducees say that there is no resurrection, neither angel, nor spirit: but the Pharisees confess both.

9 And there arose a great cry: and the scribes that were of the Pharisees' part arose, and strove, saying, We find no evil in this man: but if a spirit or an angel hath spoken to him, let us not fight against God.

10 And when there arose a great dissension, the chief captain, fearing lest Paul should have been pulled in pieces of them, commanded the soldiers to go down, and to take him by force from among them, and to bring him into the castle.

11 And the night following the Lord stood by him, and said, Be of good cheer, Paul: for as thou hast testified of me in Jerusalem, so must thou bear witness also at Rome.

12 And when it was day, certain of the Jews banded together, and bound themselves ‖ under a curse, saying that they would neither eat nor drink till they had killed Paul.

13 And they were more than forty which had made this conspiracy.

14 And they came to the chief priests and elders, and said, We have bound ourselves under a great curse, that we will eat nothing until we have slain Paul.

15 Now therefore ye with the council signify to the chief captain that he bring him down unto you to morrow, as though ye would enquire something more perfectly concerning him: and we, or ever he come near, are ready to kill him.

16 And when Paul's sister's son heard of their lying in wait, he went and entered into the castle, and told Paul.

17 Then Paul called one of the centurions unto him, and said, Bring this young man unto the chief captain: for he hath a certain thing to tell him.

18 So he took him, and brought him to the chief captain, and said, Paul the prisoner called me unto him, and prayed me to bring this young man unto thee, who hath something to say unto thee.

19 Then the chief captain took him by the hand, and went with him aside privately, and asked him, What is that thou hast to tell me?

20 And he said, The Jews have agreed to desire thee that thou wouldest bring down Paul to morrow into the council, as though they would enquire somewhat of him more perfectly.

21 But do not thou yield unto them: for there lie in wait for him of them more than forty men, which have bound themselves with an oath, that they will neither eat nor drink till they have killed him: and now are they ready, looking for a promise from thee.

22 So the chief captain then let the young man depart, and charged him, See thou tell no man that thou hast shewed these things to me.

23 And he called unto him two centurions, saying, Make ready two hundred soldiers to go to Cesarea, and horsemen threescore and ten, and spearmen two hundred, at the third hour of the night;

24 And provide them beasts, that they may set Paul on, and bring him safe unto Felix the governor.

When the Sadducees are said to deny any spirits, this is not to be understood as if they denied God to be a spirit, or the existence of any spirit in man; but they denied the continuance of the soul after death, and the subsistence of the spirit of man in a separate state. Dr. Whitby.

—— so must thou bear witness also at Rome.] It was by Divine appointment that St. Paul was to go to Rome, but without any constraint being laid upon his will. His appeal to Cesar was used by him as an expedient to deliver himself from the rage of the Jews, chap. xxv. 11, &c. Dr. Whitby.

12. — certain of the Jews banded together,] It was a practice too common among the zealots of the Jews at that period, to cut off, without any judicial process, those whom they considered as transgressors of the law, and enemies of the people. That the chief priests and Sanhedrim approved of such practices, appears too plainly from the confident address of these Jews to them, ver. 14, 15, and their consent to the fact at ver. 20: thus plainly proving, by their lying and murderous dispositions, that they were the children of the devil, John viii. 44. See chap. xxv. 2, 3. Dr. Whitby.

35. — Herod's judgment hall.] The word, rendered "judgment hall," signifies the house of the pretor, where causes were sometimes heard. This at Cesarea was called "Herod's," because it was built by Herod the Great, for his own palace; but, afterwards, it was converted into a residence for the Roman governour; one part being made a place of confinement for particular prisoners. Dr. Stack.

Chap. XXIV. ver. 1. — descended with the elders,] Came down with the elders to Cesarea. To go from the capital city, Jerusalem, to any place, is called going down; and to go to Jerusalem is called going up, chap. xxv. 1. Bp. Mann.

—— a certain orator named Tertullus,] It is probable, from the name, that this was a Roman advocate, whom the Jews engaged on this occasion, as being more conversant in the Roman language, and the forms of justice. Beausobre.

2. — and that very worthy deeds are done &c.] There was much flattery in this preamble, mixed with some truth. Felix had been of service in clearing the country of banditti, with which it had abounded; among others, he had put to death a chief of robbers, named Eleazar, and an Egyptian impostor. Still he was a cruel and tyrannical governour; insomuch that, within two years after this, the Jews preferred a publick accusation against him before the Roman emperour. Bp. Pearce, Beausobre.

5. — a mover of sedition] One who stirreth up tumults. He plainly means that the Jews could no where be quiet for the tumults, which he caused against them by means of his converts, the sect of the Nazarenes. Bp. Pearce.

—— of the sect of the Nazarenes:] This is the only passage in Scripture where Christians are called by this name, although the name had often been applied to Christ Himself. See chap. ii. 22; iii. 6; iv. 10, &c. Beausobre.

6. — and would have judged according to our law.] It appears from chap. xxi. 31, that they were going to do more than seize and judge him; they were about to kill him when Lysias interposed. Bp. Pearce.

Anno DOMINI 60. A. D. 53. Felix made procurator over Judea.

10 Then Paul, after that the governor had beckoned unto him to speak, answered, Forasmuch as I know that thou hast been of many years a judge unto this nation, I do the more cheerfully answer for myself:

11 Because that thou mayest understand, that there are yet but twelve days since I went up to Jerusalem for to worship.

12 And they neither found me in the temple disputing with any man, neither raising up the people, neither in the synagogues, nor in the city:

13 Neither can they prove the things whereof they now accuse me.

14 But this I confess unto thee, that after the way which they call heresy, so worship I the God of my fathers, believing all things which are written in the law and in the prophets:

15 And have hope toward God, which they themselves also allow, that there shall be a resurrection of the dead, both of the just and unjust.

16 And herein do I exercise myself, to have always a conscience void of offence toward God, and toward men.

17 Now after many years I came to bring alms to my nation, and offerings. Anno DOMINI 60.

18 [a] Whereupon certain Jews from Asia found me purified in the temple, neither with multitude, nor with tumult. [a] Chap. 21. 27.

19 Who ought to have been here before thee, and object, if they had ought against me.

20 Or else let these same here say, if they have found any evil doing in me, while I stood before the council,

21 Except it be for this one voice, that I cried standing among them, [b] Touching the resurrection of the dead I am called in question by you this day. [b] Chap. 23. 6.

22 And when Felix heard these things, having more perfect knowledge of that way, he deferred them, and said, When Lysias the chief captain shall come down, I will know the uttermost of your matter.

23 And he commanded a centurion to keep Paul, and to let him have liberty, and that he should forbid none of his acquaintance to minister or come unto him.

24 And after certain days, when Felix came with his wife Drusilla, which was a Jewess, he sent for Paul, and heard him concerning the faith in Christ.

10. Then Paul, — answered,] Tertullus had brought charges against St. Paul for sedition, for heresy, as a ringleader of the Nazarenes, and for profanation of the temple. St. Paul in his defence answered to each of these charges. 1st, He denied the charge of sedition, because it was only twelve days since he came to Jerusalem to keep the feast of Pentecost, during which time he had neither debated with any one in the temple, nor excited sedition among the people, ver. 10—13. 2d, He confessed himself a Christian, but denied that Christianity was a heresy; on the contrary, he maintained that it was conformable to the Law and the Prophets; that he held the hope which they did, of a general resurrection from the dead, and that his practice was conformable to his profession, for he endeavoured always to maintain an unoffending conscience, ver. 14—16. 3d, He denied the charge of profaning the temple, ver. 17—19; and, 4thly, he challenged the chief priests themselves to bring forward any misdemeanour which he had committed, before the Sanhedrim, ver. 20, 21. Dr. Hales.

—— thou hast been of many years a judge] Felix had been governour between five and seven years, as is pretty generally agreed. St. Paul, on this account, addresses him with the greater confidence, as a judge qualified to know the Jewish opinions, customs, and laws; without frequent reference to which the Apostle could not make his defence. Abp. Newcome.

14. — worship I the God of my fathers,] The Roman law forbade the introduction of new objects of worship. This therefore was a very proper defence before a Roman governour. Abp. Newcome.

In St. Paul we have here a great instance of true Christian magnanimity. He abhorred that mean and base-spirited principle which makes it lawful for men to deny their religion when it brings them into danger; he studied no secret arts of compliance with his adversaries to secure himself; he valued his religion beyond his own safety, and regarded not all the calumnies and reproaches of his enemies, as long as he made it his constant exercise to keep a conscience void of offence towards God and towards men. He was sensible how great was the malice of his adversaries; he knew that he was to answer before a judge who regarded neither justice nor religion; yet he neither flatters his judge, nor betrays any distrust of him; he neither inveighs against his enemies nor betrays any fear of them; but with a modest freedom and a manly courage owns the main part of their accusation, and effectually vindicates at once both his religion and his own innocence. Bp. Stillingfleet.

—— believing all things which are written &c.] In making his own defence, St. Paul makes also the defence of his religion, which consisted, he implies, in believing all that the law had prefigured, and the Prophets foretold, concerning the Messiah, and the calling of the Gentiles. Beausobre.

15. — which they themselves also allow,] That is, the Pharisees and the bulk of the nation.

—— both of the just and unjust.] The Pharisees, according to Josephus, restrained the resurrection to the just, condemning the unjust to perpetual torment without resurrection. Hence these words, marking the difference between the resurrection expected by St. Paul and that expected by the Pharisees. Dr. Whitby.

17. Now after many years] After many years of absence from Jerusalem, probably about six. Bp. Pearce.

—— I came to bring alms] It appears from Philo, that it was customary for the Jews, however dispersed, to send offerings to Jerusalem. Bp. Pearce.

22. — having more perfect knowledge of that way,] Felix, having been many years governor of Judea, and having had his residence at Cesarea, where Cornelius the centurion and his friends were converted, where St. Philip the Evangelist dwelt, and where there were many disciples, chap. xxi. 8, 16, had thus opportunities of becoming acquainted with "the way" of Christianity. Dr. Whitby. Or the meaning may be, Having become better acquainted with Christianity, from the account just given by St. Paul.

24. — with his wife Drusilla,] Drusilla was the daughter of Herod Agrippa, mentioned at chap. xii. 1, 19. Felix, when procurator of Judea, fell in love with her, and seduced her from her husband Azizus, king of the Emesians, prevailing on her, by means of his agents, to quit her husband and marry him. By this, he shewed both his injustice and incontinence. Bp. Pearce.

Anno DOMINI 60.

25 And as he reasoned of righteousness, temperance, and judgment to come, Felix trembled, and answered, Go thy way for this time; when I have a convenient season, I will call for thee.

26 He hoped also that money should have been given him of Paul, that he might loose him: wherefore he sent for him the oftener, and communed with him.

27 But after two years Porcius Festus came into Felix' room: and Felix, willing to shew the Jews a pleasure, left Paul bound.

Anno DOMINI 62.

CHAP. XXV.

2 The Jews accuse Paul before Festus. 8 He answereth for himself, 11 and appealeth unto Cesar. 14 Afterwards Festus openeth his matter to King Agrippa, 23 and he is brought forth. 25 Festus cleareth him to have done nothing worthy of death.

25. —of righteousness, temperance, &c.] The subject matter of St. Paul's discourse before Felix is not more remarkable for its general excellence and importance, than for its particular suitableness in regard to the person whom he addressed. The two vices, of which Felix was most remarkably guilty, were injustice and intemperance, as historians of unsuspected credit, both heathen and Jewish, inform us. In particular, Josephus tells us, that Drusilla, who now sat with him on the judgment seat, was the wife of a foreign king, who had been enticed by Felix into an adulterous connexion. Nothing therefore could be more appropriate than a discourse concerning righteousness and temperance, before such a cruel and voluptuous person; nothing more proper than to put this unjust judge in mind of another, a more impartial and dreadful tribunal, before which he himself should one day stand and be judged. Bp. Atterbury.

What a sincere and disinterested spirit appears in St. Paul on this occasion! He stood accused of heinous crimes, and was ready to sink under the malice and mighty power of his accusers, the high priest and chief men of the Jewish Sanhedrim then present, and soliciting a severe sentence against him. And yet he seems regardless of the imminent peril in which he was, and, forgetting his own private interest, and all concern for himself, turns all his thoughts and bends his whole force towards promoting the general interest of the Gospel, and the salvation of souls. Again, how do we observe in his conduct marks of undaunted and exemplary courage! He fears not, we see, to utter necessary, though harsh and ungrateful truths, in the ears of one who had the power of life and death over him. He knew with what dangers the faithful discharge of his duty would in this case be attended; how impatient the great are under reproof, even when couched in the least offensive language; and yet no such consideration repressed his godly zeal, or checked his freedom; he conducted indeed his discourse with great caution and prudence, yet with such force and success, as to strike confusion and terrour into the person for whom they were intended. Bp. Atterbury.

—— Felix trembled,] Let us well observe the wonderful effect that followed on St. Paul's discourse. The mind of Felix was filled with horrour, at the remembrance of past crimes, and the apprehension of a future reckoning: and these inward fears and forebodings appeared in the outward and visible marks of a great consternation. Though he was one of the mightiest men on earth, and St. Paul a poor despised prisoner; though he was then sitting on the seat of judgment, where it behoved him to do nothing that misbecame his high place and character; yet he could not dissemble the pangs and agonies of his uneasy mind. "He trembled." We learn from this instance how great is the force and efficacy of the word of God, duly handled and applied. There is no sin so secret, that it will not find out and expose; no heart so hard, that it cannot soften; no conscience so far plunged in lethargic sleep, that it is not able to rouse. How should this instance of the operative virtue of God's word reproach our sluggishness and insensibility! An impure and wicked heathen, we hear, trembled at St. Paul's doctrine. The same doctrine sounds every day in the ears of negligent Christians without terrifying, without alarming them. The same Apostle still reasons with them in his Epistles concerning righteousness, temperance, and judgment to come: but he reasons to no purpose; his words seem to them as idle tales: they neither feel their force nor regard their meaning. Surely, for this, Felix shall one day rise up in judgment against them: for he heard and trembled. Bp. Atterbury.

—— Go thy way for this time; &c.] Whenever we find our consciences touched to the quick by some awakening circumstance or discourse, let us beware that we do not endeavour to get rid of the smart, and dismiss such troublesome reflections, by saying to them, as Felix did, "Go thy way for this time; when I have a convenient season, I will call for you." For, this is the proper time, this the most convenient season for our entertaining them, and conversing with them, when they press to be admitted and heard. Let us not therefore call in company, business, or pleasure, to divert our thoughts from their present melancholy employments, but rather let us study every way to cherish and promote these good beginnings by retirement, meditation, and prayer. Let us commune with our own hearts in our chambers and be still, Ps. iv. 4; let us suffer these terrours freely to reason and plead with us till they have persuaded us there in private; but let us reapply, enforce, and improve these good impressions, till we have riveted their influence fast in our minds, and attained the end for which the good Spirit of God intended them, even till, by means of them, we have wrought out "a repentance to salvation not to be repented of," 2 Cor. vii. 10. Bp. Atterbury.

26. He hoped also that money &c.] We unhappily see that the seed of the word, sown by the Apostle, "fell among thorns." The love of unjust and oppressive gain quickly returned upon Felix, and drove out the impressions of St. Paul's reasonings; and when he had once stood the shock of his conscience, and got the better of his fears, he afterwards heard the same things said, without any degree of the same remorse and concern. He sent for St. Paul often, and communed with him with no other design but that of gratifying his curiosity and extorting a bribe from him. So suddenly and easily may the best reflections be stifled, and the strongest convictions overborne by the force of one prevailing vice or lust, that hath gotten an absolute dominion over us. Bp. Atterbury.

Happy had it been for Felix, if he had been moved by the discourse of St. Paul to that "godly sorrow which worketh repentance." But unfortunately he dismissed his good thoughts and the Apostle together. He sent for him indeed afterwards, and communed with him; but this was not done from any religious motive, but merely from avarice. He had heard St. Paul say, that he brought "alms to his nation and offerings," and he might suppose that he could not want money for his own uses and occasions. Thus the lightning which darted upon his soul, vanished almost as soon as it appeared; and it were well if there were not many, like Felix, having only short transient fits of religion, and never improving them into habits. They easily frame some excuse for putting off the necessary work of repentance and reformation to a more convenient season. But there can be no season to make our peace with God so convenient as the present; and such is the uncertainty of human life, that, if it be not done now, it may be done never. Let us therefore consider in this our day the things which belong unto our peace, before they are hid from our eyes. Bp. Newton.

27. —Porcius Festus] Felix was removed by Nero from his situation of procurator of Judea, and Porcius Festus appointed to succeed him. Dr. S. Clarke.

—— willing to shew the Jews a pleasure,] The Jews were not grateful for this; for, as soon as Felix was recalled by the emperour Nero, the Jews of Cesarea went to Rome to prefer complaints against him; from the consequences of which he escaped with difficulty. Beausobre.

Anno DOMINI 62. NOW when Festus was come into the province, after three days he ascended from Cesarea to Jerusalem.

2 Then the high priest and the chief of the Jews informed him against Paul, and besought him,

3 And desired favour against him, that he would send for him to Jerusalem, laying wait in the way to kill him.

4 But Festus answered, that Paul should be kept at Cesarea, and that he himself would depart shortly thither.

5 Let them therefore, said he, which among you are able, go down with me, and accuse this man, if there be any wickedness in him.

6 And when he had tarried among them ‖ more than ten days, he went down unto Cesarea; and the next day sitting on the judgment seat commanded Paul to be brought.

‖ Or, as some copies read, no more than eight or ten days.

7 And when he was come, the Jews which came down from Jerusalem stood round about, and laid many and grievous complaints against Paul, which they could not prove.

8 While he answered for himself, Neither against the law of the Jews, neither against the temple, nor yet against Cesar, have I offended any thing at all.

9 But Festus, willing to do the Jews a pleasure, answered Paul, and said, Wilt thou go up to Jerusalem, and there be judged of these things before me?

10 Then said Paul, I stand at Cesar's judgment seat, where I ought to be judged: to the Jews have I done no wrong, as thou very well knowest.

11 For if I be an offender, or have committed any thing worthy of death, I refuse not to die: but if there be none of these things whereof these accuse me, no man may deliver me unto them. I appeal unto Cesar. Anno DOMINI 62.

12 Then Festus, when he had conferred with the council, answered, Hast thou appealed unto Cesar? unto Cesar shalt thou go.

13 And after certain days king Agrippa and Bernice came unto Cesarea to salute Festus.

14 And when they had been there many days, Festus declared Paul's cause unto the king, saying, There is a certain man left in bonds by Felix:

15 About whom, when I was at Jerusalem, the chief priests and the elders of the Jews informed me, desiring to have judgment against him.

16 To whom I answered, It is not the manner of the Romans to deliver any man to die, before that he which is accused have the accusers face to face, and have licence to answer for himself concerning the crime laid against him.

17 Therefore, when they were come hither, without any delay on the morrow I sat on the judgment seat, and commanded the man to be brought forth.

18 Against whom when the accusers stood up, they brought none accusation of such things as I supposed:

19 But had certain questions against him of their own superstition, and of one Jesus, which was dead, whom Paul affirmed to be alive.

Chap. XXV. ver. 3. — laying wait in the way to kill him.] That is, designing so to do when St. Paul was on the road. Bp. Pearce.

6. — more than ten days,] Some manuscripts read, as the margin states, "No more than eight or ten days."

8. — Neither against the law of the Jews,] For he had committed nothing against the customs of their fathers, chap. xxviii. 17, and to the Jews he became as a Jew, 1 Cor. ix. 20; nor against the temple, for he had neither profaned it, nor raised any tumults in it, chap. xxiv. 18; nor against Cesar, whom he commanded all men to obey, as from the ordinance of God, Rom. xiii. 1—7. Dr. Whitby.

10. — I stand at Cesar's judgment seat, &c.] How admirably does the Apostle, in this reply, guard both his safety and his character; how contrary is his behaviour on this occasion to the artifice and conscious guilt of imposture on the one side, or the folly of enthusiasm on the other. Dr. Graves.

11. — no man may deliver me unto them.] The words translated "deliver me" properly signify, deliver me up to them by way of doing them a pleasure or favour. Bp. Pearce. The expression means, No man can justly deliver me unto them; not only as I am an innocent person, having done no wrong, ver. 10; but also, as being a Roman, who ought therefore to be judged, not by them, and according to their laws, but at the tribunal of Cesar, and by the Roman laws. Dr. Whitby.

—— I appeal unto Cesar.] It was the right and privilege of every freeman of Rome, in a criminal cause, to appeal from the governing magistrate of the province to the emperour: the effect of which was, that the person who appealed was sent to Rome, and had his cause there tried by persons acting for that purpose under a commission from the emperour. Bp. Pearce.

The Roman emperours called themselves by the title of Cesar, whatever was their proper name: the emperour, to whom St. Paul appealed, was Nero. Bp. Mann.

12. — with the council,] It appears expressly from a passage in Cicero's speech against Verres, that it was usual for the Roman presidents to have a council, consisting of their friends and other chief Romans in the province. Archdeacon Paley.

13. — king Agrippa and Bernice.] This Agrippa was the son of Herod Agrippa, mentioned at chap. xii. 1. Upon the death of his father's younger brother Herod, he succeeded him in the kingdom of Chalcis, by favour of the emperour Claudius. Claudius afterwards gave him other dominions in Judea, to which Nero made further additions. Bernice was the sister of this Agrippa, and of Drusilla mentioned at chap. xxiv. 24. Josephus says, that she was suspected of living in an incestuous intercourse with her brother Agrippa. Bp. Pearce.

19. — of their own superstition,] It was customary for heathens to speak of the Jewish religion by this name. Thus Quinctilian

Anno DOMINI 62.

20 And because ‖ I doubted of such manner of questions, I asked him whether he would go to Jerusalem, and there be judged of these matters.

‖ Or, I was doubtful how to enquire hereof.

21 But when Paul had appealed to be reserved unto the ‖ hearing of Augustus, I commanded him to be kept till I might send him to Cesar.

‖ Or, judgment.

22 Then Agrippa said unto Festus, I would also hear the man myself. To morrow, said he, thou shalt hear him.

23 And on the morrow, when Agrippa was come, and Bernice, with great pomp, and was entered into the place of hearing, with the chief captains, and principal men of the city, at Festus' commandment Paul was brought forth.

24 And Festus said, King Agrippa, and all men which are here present with us, ye see this man, about whom all the multitude of the Jews have dealt with me, both at Jerusalem, and also here, crying that he ought not to live any longer.

25 But when I found that he had committed nothing worthy of death, and that he himself hath appealed to Augustus, I have determined to send him.

26 Of whom I have no certain thing to write unto my lord. Wherefore I have brought him forth before you, and specially before thee, O king Agrippa, that, after examination had, I might have somewhat to write.

27 For it seemeth to me unreasonable to send a prisoner, and not withal to signify the crimes laid against him.

Anno DOMINI 62.

CHAP. XXVI.

2 Paul, in the presence of Agrippa, declareth his life from his childhood, 12 and how miraculously he was converted, and called to his apostleship. 24 Festus chargeth him to be mad, whereunto he answereth modestly. 28 Agrippa is almost persuaded to be a Christian. 31 The whole company pronounce him innocent.

THEN Agrippa said unto Paul, Thou art permitted to speak for thyself. Then Paul stretched forth the hand, and answered for himself:

2 I think myself happy, king Agrippa, because I shall answer for myself this day before thee touching all the things whereof I am accused of the Jews:

3 Especially because I know thee to be expert in all customs and questions which are among the Jews: wherefore I beseech thee to hear me patiently.

4 My manner of life from my youth, which was at the first among mine own nation at Jerusalem, know all the Jews;

5 Which knew me from the beginning, if they would testify, that after the most straitest sect of our religion I lived a Pharisee.

6 And now I stand and am judged for the hope of the promise made of God unto our fathers:

7 Unto which promise our twelve tribes, instantly serving God day and night, hope to come. For which hope's sake, king Agrippa, I am accused of the Jews.

calls Moses the author of the Jewish superstition. Beausobre. But probably no evil imputation is here intended by the name, and it should rather be rendered 'religion,' since Festus would scarcely speak with disrespect of Judaism while he was addressing Agrippa a Jew. Abp. Newcome.

——of their own superstition, and of one Jesus,] Nothing could be more in the character of a Roman governour than these words. They also supply us with a proof of the fairness of the sacred writers. A dishonest narrator would not have represented his cause, or have made a great magistrate represent it, in such a manner as this; that is, in terms not a little disparaging, and bespeaking, on his part, much unconcern and indifference about the matter. Archdeacon Paley.

21. —unto the hearing of Augustus,] All the Roman emperours assumed the title of Augustus as well as that of Cesar. Bp. Pearce.

23. —into the place of hearing,] Probably some room in the palace of Festus, where he was wont to give audience. That which here passed was not a trial of St. Paul, for no Jews were present to accuse him, and he could not be tried any where but at Rome, after he had appealed unto Cesar. Bp. Pearce.

Chap. XXVI. ver. 2. I think myself happy, &c.] In this speech of St. Paul before king Agrippa, giving an account of his conduct both before and after his conversion, we discover a character of wisdom, of moderation, and at the same time of ingenuity, steadiness, and courage, which very plainly denote the innocence and zeal of this Apostle. The mild and respectful, but, at the same time, frank and sincere manner, in which he spake upon this occasion, should teach us to answer always, as we are exhorted by St. Peter, with meekness and humility, those who require an account of our faith, and of the hope which is in us; and never to conceal or dissemble the truth. Ostervald. We here observe the beauty and force of the most persuasive eloquence, the sincerity of the Christian, and the authority and majesty of the Apostle. S. Clarke.

3. —to be expert in all customs &c.] Agrippa, as being a Jew, educated under his father, Herod Agrippa, who resided as king of Judea at Jerusalem, had now, by permission of the emperour, the direction of the sacred treasure, the government of the temple, and the right of nominating the high priest. Dr. Doddridge.

5. —after the most straitest sect] After the sect of our religion, the most rigid in points of faith, and most exact in the ceremonial duties, of all others. Pyle.

6. And now I stand and am judged &c.] And now the very point on which I am accused is no other than that great Divine promise made to Abraham and the Patriarchs; namely, the promise of Christ the Messiah, and of our resurrection and future state, now proved and demonstrated by His rising from the dead. Pyle.

7. Unto which promise &c.] Which promise has ever been received by all Jews of right faith, and is the spring and foundation of all the worship they constantly pay to God. Pyle.

——our twelve tribes,] Although ten out of the twelve tribes never returned from the Babylonish captivity, yet there were a great number of individuals from those ten tribes who joined the two that returned. Beausobre.

——For which hope's sake, — I am accused &c.] Concerning which hope I am accused; that is, for saying that God hath raised up from the dead Jesus whom they have crucified, and that this Jesus is the hope of Israel, chap. xxviii. 20; some of them maintaining that there is no resurrection of the dead at all, and others denying that Christ is risen from the dead. Dr. Whitby.

In this passage we have the strength of the Apostle's argument to prove the truth of the mysterious doctrine of the resurrection. He first shews that it was not a vain thing to believe this doctrine, because God had promised it, ver. 7. For no tradition of fathers, no conjectures of philosophers, no power of nature, could be a sufficient foundation to build such an article of faith upon; nothing short of the promise made by God. 2d, That it was not a new doctrine started by him to disturb and perplex the minds of men; it was a promise made to "our fathers," that is, it was involved and implied in the great promise of the Messiah, and the happiness of the world to come by Him; the full and complete enjoyment of which happiness must suppose a resurrection from the dead. 3d, That it is not an unreasonable doctrine. "For why should it be thought a thing incredible with you," &c. In this the Apostle has shewn us the true method of asserting and defending the mysteries of the Christian faith; namely, not by undertaking to demonstrate, by natural reason, things which are incapable of it; but by first proving them to be the subject of Divine revelation, and then shewing that there is no objection from reason, which can make that revelation incredible. Bp. Stillingfleet.

8. —incredible with you,] With you Jews; Agrippa, whom he addressed, being a Jew. Bp. Pearce.

Agrippa was an observer of the Mosaick law; and, according to his own principles, ought to believe the possibility of a resurrection of the dead: and, if he conceded this as a general argument, St. Paul was ready to press the conclusion: Why then do you make any difficulty in crediting a particular instance of the power of the Almighty? Brewster.

9. —of Jesus of Nazareth.] This was a title of contempt applied by the Jews to our Lord. St. Paul probably uses it in imitation of his Lord's humble manner of expressing Himself, recorded at chap. xxii. 8. Abp. Newcome.

24 And as he thus spake for himself, Festus said with a loud voice, Paul, thou art beside thyself; much learning doth make thee mad.

25 But he said, I am not mad, most noble Festus; but speak forth the words of truth and soberness.

26 For the king knoweth of these things, before whom also I speak freely: for I am persuaded that none of these things are hidden from him; for this thing was not done in a corner.

27 King Agrippa, believest thou the prophets? I know that thou believest.

28 Then Agrippa said unto Paul, Almost thou persuadest me to be a Christian.

29 And Paul said, I would to God, that not only thou, but also all that hear me this day, were both almost, and altogether such as I am, except these bonds.

30 And when he had thus spoken, the king rose up, and the governor, and Bernice, and they that sat with them:

Anno DOMINI 62.

31 And when they were gone aside, they talked between themselves, saying, This man doeth nothing worthy of death or of bonds.

cleared from the shades of ignorance and errour; the tidings of a happy immortality. Beausobre.

24. — Paul, thou art beside thyself;] We perceive, by the judgment which Festus here forms respecting St. Paul, taking him for a madman, that the most serious things seem folly to the worldlyminded. The wise and respectful answer which St. Paul returns to Festus, is a noble instance of moderation and courage. Ostervald.

27. — believest thou the prophets?] The miracles, sufferings, and death of Christ, compared with the prophecies of the Old Testament, were abundantly sufficient evidences of the truth of the Gospel. Upon this ground St. Paul asks the question, "Believest thou the Prophets?" Agrippa was by nation and by profession a Jew. St. Paul therefore, knowing it was impossible to doubt this, answers for him, "I know that thou believest." Thus the conclusion, which he leaves him to draw, is this; Since thou believest the Prophets, and since thou knowest that the predictions concerning the Messiah are accomplished in Jesus of Nazareth, thou canst not but own that the Gospel is true, and that I have done well to obey the heavenly vision, in preaching Jesus of Nazareth as the Christ. S. Clarke.

28. — Almost thou persuadest me &c.] An impression was made on Agrippa by the discourse of St. Paul, but that impression was not to salvation, since Agrippa took no farther care to be instructed therein. It is in vain to be but faintly affected with the word of God, or to be a half, an almost Christian. We must be so altogether, and with all the affections of our soul. Ostervald.

We see how great was the evidence and force of what the Apostle delivered when the king owns himself almost persuaded to become a Christian. And why not altogether? Was it for want of sufficient proofs? Certainly not. The arguments, which the Apostle used, were so convincing, that, had he only thoroughly and seriously given his attention to them, he would have been not only almost, but altogether persuaded. It was not therefore for want of evidence that he was only almost convinced, but for want of due consideration and attention. He would not give himself leisure thoroughly to weigh these things, agreeably to their importance. He was in haste, and had other things to mind. Besides this, his pride made him unwilling to yield to the persuasions of his prisoner, and the purity of the Christian doctrines would ill have agreed with that indulgence of sinful passions in which he habitually lived. These then were invincible obstacles to his becoming a thorough Christian: so that, though he was by the force of truth almost persuaded, yet he persisted in his infidelity to the last, and, as history assures us, perished in it. This history affords to all Christians a very instructive and important lesson. In how lively a manner does this king represent the case of multitudes in our day, who are often almost persuaded to become Christians; that is, true, sincere, and faithful disciples of Christ, yet through the power of their lusts, and their love of the world, are never thoroughly persuaded, and come to a full resolution! In one sense, indeed, they are Christians; that is, they profess the Christian name, to which they have been bred, and they perhaps see the evidence of the truth of the Gospel, so that they cannot but believe it. To them the same appeal may be made, which St. Paul made to Agrippa; but still they are not persuaded to become the subjects of Christ indeed, and to be governed by His holy laws. S. Clark.

—— a Christian.] It hence appears, that this had become a common name of a disciple of Christ, since the Christians were first so called at Antioch, chap. xi. 26. Beausobre.

29. — I would to God, &c.] Every body must be charmed with the spirit and good manners of the Apostle, and the decency and delicacy of his answer. Bp. Newton.

—— except these bonds.] The chain which he carried, and by which his hand was usually bound to the soldier who guarded him, chap. xxviii. 20. Abp. Newcome.

32. — This man might have been set at liberty, &c.] This publick attestation of St. Paul's innocence from so noble and learned a judge as Agrippa, was highly advantageous. It contributed to soften the prejudices of the Jews in general against St. Paul, as an apostate and subverter of the law of Moses; and to counteract, as false and malicious, the accusations of the chief priests, which might follow him to Rome; while it tended to gain him greater indulgence from Festus, and a more favourable representation of his case to the emperour, when sanctioned by so high and so respectable a Jewish authority. Dr. Hales. It was probably owing to Agrippa's favourable representations that St. Paul was treated so indulgently while in the ship and at Rome, as is related in the following chapters. Bp. Pearce.

Chap. XXVII. ver. 1. — that we should sail] By the expression "we," it appears that St. Luke, the writer of this book, was on board the ship in which St. Paul sailed; and this enabled him to give so particular an account of the voyage and shipwreck. Bp. Pearce.

coasts of Asia; one Aristarchus, a Macedonian of Thessalonica, being with us.

3 And the next day we touched at Sidon. And Julius courteously entreated Paul, and gave him liberty to go unto his friends to refresh himself.

4 And when we had launched from thence, we sailed under Cyprus, because the winds were contrary.

5 And when we had sailed over the sea of Cilicia and Pamphylia, we came to Myra, a city of Lycia.

6 And there the centurion found a ship of Alexandria sailing into Italy; and he put us therein.

7 And when we had sailed slowly many days, and scarce were come over against Cnidus, the wind not suffering us, we sailed under ‖ Crete, over against Salmone;

‖ Or, Candy.

8 And, hardly passing it, came unto a place which is called The fair havens; nigh whereunto was the city of Lasea.

9 Now when much time was spent, and when sailing was now dangerous, because the fast was now already past, Paul admonished them,

10 And said unto them, Sirs, I perceive that this voyage will be with ‖ hurt and much damage, not only of the lading and ship, but also of our lives.

‖ Or, injury.

Anno DOMINI 62.

11 Nevertheless the centurion believed the master and the owner of the ship, more than those things which were spoken by Paul.

12 And because the haven was not commodious to winter in, the more part advised to depart thence also, if by any means they might attain to Phenice, and there to winter; which is an haven of Crete, and lieth toward the south west and north west.

13 And when the south wind blew softly, supposing that they had obtained their purpose, loosing thence, they sailed close by Crete.

14 But not long after there ‖ arose against it a tempestuous wind, called Euroclydon.

‖ Or, beat.

15 And when the ship was caught, and could not bear up into the wind, we let her drive.

16 And running under a certain island which is called Clauda, we had much work to come by the boat:

17 Which when they had taken up, they used helps, undergirding the ship; and, fearing lest they should fall into the quicksands, strake sail, and so were driven.

—— one Aristarchus,] Aristarchus was a convert of Macedonia, who accompanied St. Paul in his travels from Macedonia to Jerusalem, chap. xix. 29; xx. 4; was a coadjutor with him in the work of the Gospel, Philem. ver. 24; went with him to Rome, and was there in bonds with him, Coloss. iv. 10; and on this account he is here taken notice of, as a companion of St. Paul in the voyage. Dr. Whitby.

3. — to go unto his friends] There were Christians in Phenicia, where Sidon was, as appears from chap. xi. 19. Bp. Pearce.

4. — we sailed under Cyprus,] They were obliged, it appears, to sail between Cyprus and the coast of Asia, by Cilicia and Pamphylia, leaving that island on the left hand, because the south-west wind would not permit them to pass to the south of it. Dr. Doddridge.

5. — Myra, a city of Lycia.] Myra was the capital of that province. Dr. Wells.

7. — against Cnidus,] Cnidus stood on a promontory of the same name, in that part of the province of Caria, which was more peculiarly called Doris. Dr. Wells.

—— the wind not suffering us, we &c.] It appears that the master of the vessel designed to take the shortest cut to Italy from Cnidus, steering directly westward, and so keeping to the north of Crete; but, the wind not permitting, they were obliged to change their intended course, and to let the ship sail under the east and southeast of Crete. Dr. Wells.

—— Salmone;] Was a promontory or cape on the eastern side of Crete. Dr. Wells.

8. — fair havens;] This, it is reasonably supposed, is the same with, or at least a part of, that coast of Crete, which is called by Stephanus the Fair Shore or Coast. Dr. Wells.

9. — the fast was now already past,] Meaning the great fast of expiation, instituted Levit. xvi. 29, which took place on the 10th of the month Tisri, answering to about the 25th of our September. Thus, on account of the lateness of the season, sailing was dangerous. It appears that, at this season, the equinoctial gales prevail in the Mediterranean; and sailing, on account of them, used to be laid aside for the winter. Dr. Whitby.

—— Paul admonished them,] St. Paul, it will be remembered, had now had considerable experience in voyages by sea, in the course of his several journies. He had been oftener in danger too by sea than St. Luke has recorded. See 2 Cor. xi. 25. Bp. Pearce.

14. — a tempestuous wind, called Euroclydon.] It is pretty generally agreed among the learned that the wind here meant is a northeast wind; and the word Euroclydon is, in fact, thought to be a corruption from two words which signify the east and the north. Dr. Hammond, Grotius.

The word translated "tempestuous" denotes properly a violent storm, with a whirlwind attending it. The ancient name is still preserved in the term Tuffoone, which is now used by seamen in the Levant. Bp. Pearce.

15. — was caught,] Was borne away by the wind. Abp. Newcome.

16. — a certain island — called Clauda,] The name of this island is given differently by different geographers. Ptolemy calls it Claudos; Strabo, Gaudos; Pliny and others, Gaudon. Grotius.

—— to come by the boat:] To be masters of the boat; it seems they were in danger of losing it, and, for fear of so doing, drew it into the ship, ver. 30. Bp. Pearce.

The Eastern people are wont to leave their skiffs in the sea, fastened to the stern of their vessels; as appears to have been done in this instance. Sir J. Chardin.

17. — undergirding the ship;] Undergirding a ship is still practised by seamen in violent storms. It is done by passing rope under the ship, and fastening the ends together, to hold the sides of the ship tight together, and keep the timbers from starting. Bp. Pearce.

—— into the quicksands,] Meaning, perhaps, the large bank of sand, called Syrtis Major, which is on the coast of Africa, near the country of Cyrene; to this a strong northeast wind would carry the vessel directly from Clauda. Bp. Pearce.

Anno DOMINI 62.

18 And we being exceedingly tossed with a tempest, the next day they lightened the ship;

19 And the third day we cast out with our own hands the tackling of the ship.

20 And when neither sun nor stars in many days appeared, and no small tempest lay on us, all hope that we should be saved was then taken away.

21 But after long abstinence Paul stood forth in the midst of them, and said, Sirs, ye should have hearkened unto me, and not have loosed from Crete, and to have gained this harm and loss.

22 And now I exhort you to be of good cheer: for there shall be no loss of any man's life among you, but of the ship.

23 For there stood by me this night the angel of God, whose I am, and whom I serve,

24 Saying, Fear not, Paul; thou must be brought before Cesar: and, lo, God hath given thee all them that sail with thee.

25 Wherefore, sirs, be of good cheer: for I believe God, that it shall be even as it was told me.

26 Howbeit we must be cast upon a certain island.

27 But when the fourteenth night was come, as we were driven up and down in Adria, about midnight the shipmen deemed that they drew near to some country;

Anno DOMINI 62.

28 And sounded, and found it twenty fathoms: and when they had gone a little further, they sounded again, and found it fifteen fathoms.

29 Then fearing lest they should have fallen upon rocks, they cast four anchors out of the stern, and wished for the day.

30 And as the shipmen were about to flee out of the ship, when they had let down the boat into the sea, under colour as though they would have cast anchors out of the foreship,

31 Paul said to the centurion and to the soldiers, Except these abide in the ship, ye cannot be saved.

32 Then the soldiers cut off the ropes of the boat, and let her fall off.

33 And while the day was coming on, Paul besought them all to take meat, saying, This day is the fourteenth day that ye have tarried and continued fasting, having taken nothing.

34 Wherefore I pray you to take some meat: for this is for your health: for there shall not an hair fall from the head of any of you.

18. — they lightened the ship;] It appears from ver. 38, that they did not, in the first instance, throw overboard all the freightage of the ship. Beausobre.

20. — when neither sun nor stars—appeared,] At that time, the mariner's compass not being known, they had no means of directing their course, but by the observations they could take from the sun by day, and the stars by night. Bp. Mann.

21. — after long abstinence] See note at ver. 33.

25. — I believe God, that it shall be even as it was told me.] In this speech of St. Paul, delivered under very peculiar circumstances, we are taught how far the providence of God interferes in the accomplishment of human purposes. We are not told that the storm was raised on account of St. Paul, or on account of any person in the ship. And yet many particular events were to be brought about by means of it: a barbarous country was to be introduced to the first light of the Gospel; the lives of all those who sailed with the Apostle were to be preserved for his sake; and, for any thing that appears to the contrary, not only the lives but the souls of many might be saved. Thus are the general laws of nature subservient to the influences of a particular Providence. The winds may blow, and the waves roll. This is the original destination of the Creator. But the moral as well as natural ends, to which they may be adapted, are instances of that superintending care, which every day, every hour, every moment, is extended over our heads. A firm belief of this keeps alive the spirit of piety in our hearts. It tells us that we are never beyond the reach of Omnipotence; we are never out of the protection of One, who hath begotten us again unto a lively hope, and who graciously permits us to call Him Father; a word which no one can repeat without bringing to his recollection every thing that is kind, forgiving, compassionate, and good. Brewster.

27. — when the fourteenth night was come,] That is, after their sailing from "fair havens," ver. 8, 13. Bp. Pearce.

—— in Adria,] Or the Adriatick sea, comprehending not only the part of the Mediterranean which bears that name in modern geography, but also, as the learned have shewn from the writings of the ancient geographers, all the sea lying between Sicily and Crete. Dr. Wells, Bp. Pearce.

28. — and found it fifteen fathoms.] The sea being more shallow than when they sounded the first time, they concluded that land was near. Bp. Mann.

29. — cast four anchors out of the stern,] However unusual it may be in modern times for an anchor to be dropped from the stern of a ship, it may be collected from passages in different authors that this custom frequently prevailed in ancient times. Bp. Pearce. The large modern Egyptian ships, called saiques, always carry their anchors at their stern, and never at the prow. Sir J. Chardin.

31. — Except,—ye cannot be saved.] Meaning that, without the assistance of these men remaining in the vessel, all would be lost. Bp. Mann.

This does not at all contradict the observation which the Apostle made before, that there should be "no loss;" as he implied that God would bless the exertions which should be made. These were the conditions of safety. We have every reason on all occasions to rely on the Divine promise: but we must at the same time remember, that God requires us to do, in all ordinary cases, whatever the abilities which He hath given us will permit. When we neglect these means of assisting ourselves, we tempt God. Brewster.

33. — and continued fasting,] A strong expression, implying that they had taken very little nourishment, as indeed is generally the case during a storm at sea. Beausobre. The meaning seems to be, that they had no set times of eating, but had taken only short, scanty, and irregular meals. Dr. Whitby.

34. — for this is for your health: &c.] Having exhausted your spirits and strength by the fatigue you have undergone, food is absolutely necessary for your support: for much labour still remains for you; however, do not despair, you will all escape at last unhurt. Bp. Mann.

—— not an hair fall] A proverbial expression, implying complete and perfect safety, Luke xxi. 18; 1 Sam. xiv. 45, &c. Beausobre.

Anno DOMINI 62.

35 And when he had thus spoken, he took bread, and gave thanks to God in presence of them all: and when he had broken it, he began to eat.

36 Then were they all of good cheer, and they also took some meat.

37 And we were in all in the ship two hundred threescore and sixteen souls.

38 And when they had eaten enough, they lightened the ship, and cast out the wheat into the sea.

39 And when it was day, they knew not the land: but they discovered a certain creek with a shore, into the which they were minded, if it were possible, to thrust in the ship.

40 And when they had ‖ taken up the anchors, they committed themselves unto the sea, and loosed the rudder bands, and hoised up the mainsail to the wind, and made toward shore.

‖ Or, cut the anchors, they left them in the sea, &c.

41 And falling into a place where two seas met, they ran the ship aground; and the forepart stuck fast, and remained unmoveable, but the hinder part was broken with the violence of the waves.

Anno DOMINI 62.

42 And the soldiers' counsel was to kill the prisoners, lest any of them should swim out, and escape.

43 But the centurion, willing to save Paul, kept them from their purpose; and commanded that they which could swim should cast themselves first into the sea, and get to land:

44 And the rest, some on boards, and some on broken pieces of the ship. And so it came to pass, that they escaped all safe to land.

CHAP. XXVIII.

1 Paul after his shipwreck is kindly entertained of the barbarians. 5 The viper on his hand hurteth him not. 8 He healeth many diseases in the island. 11 They depart towards Rome. 17 He declareth to the Jews the cause of his coming. 24 After his preaching some were persuaded, and some believed not. 30 Yet he preacheth there two years.

AND when they were escaped, then they knew that the island was called Melita.

35. — gave thanks to God] The behaviour of St. Paul on this occasion exhibits, in a very striking manner, his true and genuine piety. Though placed in circumstances of imminent and pressing danger, he does not forget to return his grateful thanks to God for the sustenance with which His bounteous providence supplied him; and, in so doing, he affords to all Christians an example of religious gratitude, which they will do well seriously to consider, and carefully to imitate.

—— in presence of them all:] The whole ship's company were witnesses to the piety of St. Paul: the good effects therefore might be proportionally extensive, and his example might be visible, when he himself should be no longer present. They saw his heart in his actions: and, heathens as they were, doubtless they would for the future think reverently of the God of St. Paul; and some of them, perhaps, might be led to the true worship of Him, whom they were thus taught to respect. Brewster.

36. Then were they all of good cheer,] We should well observe what comfort and encouragement are derived to the whole ship's company from the presence of St. Paul. We see this blessed Apostle infusing confidence, and even cheerfulness, into those, from whom hope itself was departed. The reason why many sink into despair, and are lost in a troubled sea of sorrow, is, that they have no friend to administer properly the comforts of religion; none to raise their thoughts from the storm that beats upon them to the mercy of that God who stilleth the raging of the sea. See how the Apostle performs this office to those, who had brought him into all this danger, by neglecting his advice. Instead of being offended at their past perverseness, he considers their present distress, informs them how they are all to be given to his prayers, encourages them to eat with thankfulness for their necessary refreshment, and sets them the example in his own person. Jones of Nayland.

38. — cast out the wheat] This vessel of Alexandria (ver. 6) seems to have been laden with wheat, to carry to Rome, as was frequently done. Beausobre.

40. — and loosed the rudder bands,] In the original, "the bands of the rudders," the term "rudders" being plural. It appears from several passages in ancient authors, that some of the ships of the ancients had more rudders than one. By the term "bands" seem to be meant such ropes as were used for fastening the rudders in some particular position. Bp. Pearce.

42. — the soldiers' counsel was to kill the prisoners,] As St. Paul himself, being a prisoner, must have fallen a sacrifice to this barbarous execution, we have here a striking instance of the insensibility and brutality of the human mind, when it is neither polished by learning, nor rectified and softened by a knowledge of God. How strange is it that these soldiers have neither the gratitude nor compassion to shudder at the consequence of this bloody proposal, for the sake of St. Paul, to whom they were indebted, not only for admonition, but also for their lives. Jones of Nayland.

We learn, from this instance of the shipwreck of St. Paul, that the best of men are liable to misfortunes as well as other people; that they are not only involved in the general calamities which befall mankind, but are also subject to particular accidents and disasters of their own. From this and other instances, let us comfort ourselves that misfortunes are no certain marks and tokens of the Divine displeasure; they are rather frequently sent for the exercise of our patience, for the trial and illustration of our virtue, and will work for us a far more exceeding and eternal weight of glory. Bp. Newton.

Chap. XXVIII. ver. 1. — the island was called Melita.] It has been the subject of some discussion among the learned, whether this is the island now called Malta, or another in the Adriatick sea, bearing the name of Melida. However, by far the most general opinion is, that the island of Malta is meant. This island is situated in the Mediterranean sea, between Sicily and Africa, but nearer to Sicily, and on the southeastern side of it. It has been celebrated in modern history for having been possessed by the knights of St. John of Jerusalem, who were thence called the knights of Malta. One principal consideration which determines for the island of Malta being intended, is, that St. Paul and his company, after having wintered at Melita, landed at Syracuse (ver. 12, 13) in Sicily, and thence went to Rhegium in Italy. But, if Melita had been the island near the Illyrian coast in the Adriatick sea, the proper course of the ship would have been direct to Rhegium, without touching at Syracuse at all. On the other hand, in a voyage from the present Malta to Italy, it was necessary to pass Syracuse, before they could arrive at Rhegium. In addition to this, constant tradition has pointed to the island of Malta, as the place where St. Paul was shipwrecked. Bp Pearce, Dr. Wells.

Anno DOMINI 62.

2 And the barbarous people shewed us no little kindness: for they kindled a fire, and received us every one, because of the present rain, and because of the cold.

3 And When Paul had gathered a bundle of sticks, and laid them on the fire, there came a viper out of the heat, and fastened on his hand.

4 And when the barbarians saw the venomous beast hang on his hand, they said among themselves, No doubt this man is a murderer, whom, though he hath escaped the sea, yet vengeance suffereth not to live.

5 And he shook off the beast into the fire, and felt no harm.

6 Howbeit they looked when he should have swollen, or fallen down dead suddenly: but after they had looked a great while, and saw no harm come to him, they changed their minds, and said that he was a god.

7 In the same quarters were possessions of the chief man of the island, whose name was Publius; who received us, and lodged us three days courteously. Anno DOMINI 62.

8 And it came to pass, that the father of Publius lay sick of a fever and of a bloody flux: to whom Paul entered in, and prayed, and laid his hands on him, and healed him.

9 So when this was done, others also, which had diseases in the island, came, and were healed:

10 Who also honoured us with many honours; and when we departed, they laded us with such things as were necessary.

11 And after three months we departed A. D. 63. in a ship of Alexandria, which had wintered in the isle, whose sign was Castor and Pollux.

12 And landing at Syracuse, we tarried there three days.

13 And from thence we fetched a compass, and came to Rhegium: and after one

2. — the barbarous people] The inhabitants of this island were originally a colony of Phenicians or Carthaginians, and had still their ancient language in use, though mixed, perhaps, with some Roman and Greek words: and it was the custom of the Romans and Greeks to give the name of "barbarians" to those people who spoke a language with which they were not acquainted. Bp. Pearce.

—— shewed us no little kindness:] These heathens, though called by the name of "barbarians," proved themselves by their actions to be far superiour in point of humanity to many of those who pass for civilized people. Certainly, hospitality to strangers, compassion to persons in distress, are not only amiable qualities as we are men, but are our distinguishing ornaments as we are Christians. Bp. Newton.

3. — out of the heat,] Obviously meaning, from among the sticks, when they began to grow warm by the fire. Bp. Pearce.

4. — the venomous beast] Rather, 'the venomous animal.'

—— No doubt this man is a murderer,] Thus it appears that this barbarous people had some notions of a God and a providence, and of a particular vengeance that was due to murder, and did not fail to pursue it. Indeed there is hardly any nation to be found destitute of some general notions of religion; so careful has God been not to leave Himself without witness. This passage should serve as a caution to us, how we interpret the misfortunes of others as punishments for their sins. As this life is designed only for a state of probation, and the next for a state of retribution; as here men are only placed upon their trial, and hereafter shall receive the reward of their works; it is impossible for us in many cases "to know either love or hatred," mercy or judgment, "by all that is before us," Eccles. ix. 1: there may be "just men unto whom it happeneth according to the work of the wicked," Eccles. viii. 14; and there may be "wicked men to whom it happeneth according to the work of the righteous." Not but temporal punishments are often inflicted upon men for their wickedness; and sometimes we may plainly discern the hand of God in the execution of His judgments. But, generally speaking, we cannot be too cautious and tender in making such reflections: we know too little of men and things, to say for certain what is a judgment, and what is not: there may be mercy in judgment, as there may be judgment in mercy; and it would better become us to err on the modest and charitable side, than on the presumptuous and uncharitable; for presumptuous such conclusions are with regard to God, and uncharitable with regard to men. Bp. Newton.

—— yet vengeance suffereth not to live.] Vengeance or Divine justice, which was personified by the heathens, and placed among their divinities. Beausobre.

The word rendered "suffereth not" signifies more properly 'hath not suffered.' They considered him as in effect a dead man, having been bitten by the venomous creature. Beza.

5. And he shook off the beast &c.] We have here a specimen of that miraculous power which accompanied the Apostles, agreeably to the prediction and promise of our Saviour, Mark xvi. 17, 18. Thus here was not merely a miracle performed, but one which had been signified beforehand by the spirit of prophecy. This miracle was well calculated to awaken the consideration of the people of the island, to convince them that an extraordinary person was come among them, and to procure the greater reverence to his person, and attention to his doctrine. And this, no doubt, with the other miracles which he wrought, contributed greatly to the easier reception of Christianity among them. So wonderfully do all events conspire to the glory of God; and so seasonably was the Apostle preserved in the crisis of imminent danger. Bp. Newton.

6. — and said that he was a god.] See an instance of a similar change of sentiments in the common people at chap. xiv. 11, 12, &c. Hercules was worshipped in this island, and the power of curing the bite of serpents was attributed to him. Bp. Pearce, Beausobre.

7. — the chief man] The governour of the island. The word in the original is, 'the first man of the people of Melita;' and it so happens that this very term is used, in an ancient inscription found in the island, to denote the governour. Grotius.

10. — honoured us with many honours;] Or 'presented us with many gifts,' as is frequently the meaning of the words here in the original. Drs. Lightfoot and Whitby.

11. — whose sign was Castor and Pollux.] Meaning that figures of these two supposed deities were painted on the forepart of the ship; they were thought to be propitious to mariners. Dr. Whitby.

12. — Syracuse,] This city, lying on the eastern side of Sicily, was formerly the capital of the island; being a seaport with an excellent harbour. It still bears the same name. Dr. Wells.

13. — we fetched a compass,] Meaning that, instead of pursuing a straight course, they kept along the coast of the island of Sicily. Bp. Mann.

—— to Rhegium:] A town in that part of Italy which is nearest to Sicily; now called Reggio.

Anno DOMINI 63. day the south wind blew, and we came the next day to Puteoli:

14 Where we found brethren, and were desired to tarry with them seven days: and so we went toward Rome.

15 And from thence, when the brethren heard of us, they came to meet us as far as Appii forum, and The three taverns: whom when Paul saw, he thanked God, and took courage.

16 And when we came to Rome, the centurion delivered the prisoners to the captain of the guard: but Paul was suffered to dwell by himself with a soldier that kept him.

17 And it came to pass, that after three days Paul called the chief of the Jews together: and when they were come together, he said unto them, Men and brethren, though I have committed nothing against the people, or customs of our fathers, yet was I delivered prisoner from Jerusalem into the hands of the Romans.

18 Who, when they had examined me, would have let me go, because there was no cause of death in me.

19 But when the Jews spake against it, I was constrained to appeal unto Cesar; not that I had ought to accuse my nation of.

20 For this cause therefore have I called for you, to see you, and to speak with you: because that for the hope of Israel I am bound with this chain. Anno DOMINI 63.

21 And they said unto him, We neither received letters out of Judea concerning thee, neither any of the brethren that came shewed or spake any harm of thee.

22 But we desire to hear of thee what thou thinkest: for as concerning this sect, we know that every where it is spoken against.

23 And when they had appointed him a day, there came many to him into his lodging; to whom he expounded and testified the kingdom of God, persuading them concerning Jesus, both out of the law of Moses, and out of the prophets, from morning till evening.

24 And some believed the things which were spoken, and some believed not.

25 And when they agreed not among themselves, they departed, after that Paul had spoken one word, Well spake the Holy Ghost by Esaias the prophet unto our fathers, 26 Saying, [a] Go unto this people, and say, Hearing ye shall hear, and shall not understand; and seeing ye shall see, and not perceive: [a] Isai. 6. 9. Matt. 13. 14. Mark 4. 12. Luke 8. 10. John 12. 40. Rom. 11. 8.

27 For the heart of this people is waxed gross, and their ears are dull of hearing, —— Puteoli:] Now called Pozzuoli, a town not far from Naples.

14. Where we found brethren,] Puteoli was a city of great trade and commerce; whence it is not surprising that Christian converts should be found there, on account of the resort and concourse of strangers. Dr. Lightfoot.

15. — when the brethren heard of us,] By "the brethren" are here meant the Christians that were at Rome. Bp. Mann. As Christianity had now continued twenty-eight years from the ascension of our Lord, and the sound of it had gone through all the world, Rom. x. 18, it is reasonable to suppose that, as it converted Cornelius and his kinsman to the faith, so it would prevail on other Romans in various places; and that, as Rome was a place to which there was a general conflux from all places of the world, it should abound with Christian brethren from various parts. Dr. Whitby.

—— Appii forum, — The three taverns:] The former place being about fifty miles from Rome, and the latter about thirty. Dr. Wells.

16. — the captain of the guard:] In the Greek, the commander of the camp; probably the officer who commanded the part of the army stationed at Rome, called the Prætorian cohorts. Beausobre.

—— was suffered to dwell by himself] This kindness was probably shewn to him, either from the testimony the centurion had given of him, as a good and virtuous man, or on account of the letter sent by Festus to Cesar concerning him, stating that he was guilty of no crime against the Roman laws. Dr. Whitby. He dwelt in his own hired house, ver. 30.

—— with a soldier that kept him.] To whom he was bound by a chain, according to the custom of the Romans, ver. 20. See note at chap. xxvi. 29. St. Paul frequently mentions this chain in his Epistles, Coloss. iv. 18; Phil. i. 7, 13, 16; 2 Tim. ii. 9; Philem. ver. 10, 13. Grotius.

17. — against the people,] Meaning, against the nation of the Jews. Bp. Mann.

19. — not that I had ought to accuse my nation of.] The Apostle acted here as he had before done on similar occasions: he made his first offers in every place to the native or conforming Jews. With that courtesy which always marks his character, he acquaints them with all the circumstances which had led him into his present situation, and asserts his own innocence, without bringing any accusation against his countrymen. Brewster.

20. — for the hope of Israel] That is, for preaching the coming of the Messiah, and a future state. Pyle.

22. — we know that every where it is spoken against.] We should here observe the strict veracity of the historian, in publishing such an expression of the opponents of Christianity; and his confidence in the truth of the Gospel. Abp. Newcome.

23. — testified the kingdom of God,] Testified that the kingdom of God, which they expected, Luke ii. 25, 38; xix. 11, was already come, and persuaded them of the truth of the things which he asserted concerning the birth, life, miracles, &c. of Jesus Christ. He expounded to them what related to these subjects out of the Law and the Prophets, as Christ had done to His disciples after His resurrection, Luke xxiv. 26, 27. Dr. Whitby.

24. And some believed — and some believed not.] We cannot possibly have a stronger proof of candour, or less disposition to extol and magnify, than in this declaration of the effect of St. Paul's preaching to the Jews from morning till evening, on his first arrival at Rome. Archdeacon Paley.

25. — by Esaias the prophet] This passage from Isai. vi. 9, is applied by Christ, and occurs four times in the Gospels, (see the marginal references,) and is once again employed by St. Paul in the Epistle to the Romans, Rom. xi. 8. Dr. Doddridge.

Anno DOMINI 63. and their eyes have they closed; lest they should see with their eyes, and hear with their ears, and understand with their heart, and should be converted, and I should heal them.

28 Be it known therefore unto you, that the salvation of God is sent unto the Gentiles, and that they will hear it.

29 And when he had said these words, the Jews departed, and had great reasoning among themselves.

Anno DOMINI 63. A. D. 65.

30 And Paul dwelt two whole years in his own hired house, and received all that came in unto him,

31 Preaching the kingdom of God, and teaching those things which concern the Lord Jesus Christ, with all confidence, no man forbidding him.

27. — and I should heal them.] That is, I should heal their spiritual diseases, (which would be the effect of their conversion:) St. Mark, chap. iv. 12, gives the words, "Lest they should be converted, and their sins should be forgiven them." Bp. Pearce.

30. — dwelt two whole years] Thus this history ends at the twenty-seventh year of St. Paul, after his conversion. Bp. Pearce.

31. — with all confidence,] With all freedom or openness. Bp. Pearce.

—— no man forbidding him.] Hence it appears, that there was no edict of Nero, or of any preceding Roman emperour, against the Christians, till that which took place in the tenth year of Nero, the year following that in which St. Paul was released from imprisonment. Dr. Whitby.

During this residence at Rome, St. Paul wrote his Epistles to the Ephesians, Philippians, Colossians, and to Philemon; and it is probable that he wrote his Epistle to the Hebrews soon after his release. Bp. Tomline.

The scriptural history ends with this release of St. Paul from his two years' imprisonment at Rome, and no ancient author has left us any particulars of the remaining part of this Apostle's life. It seems probable that, immediately after he recovered his liberty, he went to Jerusalem; and that afterwards, he travelled through Asia Minor, Crete, Macedonia, and Greece, confirming his converts, and regulating the affairs of the different churches, which he had planted in those countries. Whether at this time he also preached the Gospel in Spain, as some have supposed, is very uncertain. It was the unanimous tradition of the church, that St. Paul returned to Rome, that he underwent a second imprisonment there, and at last was put to death by the emperour Nero. The Roman historians, Tacitus and Suetonius, have mentioned a dreadful fire which happened at Rome in the time of Nero. It was believed, though probably without any reason, that the emperour himself was the author of that fire; but, to remove the odium from himself, he chose to attribute it to the Christians; and, to give some colour to that unjust imputation, he persecuted them with the utmost cruelty. In this persecution, St. Peter and St. Paul suffered martyrdom, probably in the year 65: and, if we may credit Sulpitius Severus, a writer of the fifth century, the former was crucified, and the latter beheaded. Bp. Tomline.

In all the several stages of the propagation of Christianity, the history is without a parallel; for it should be remembered, that it treats of the establishment of a system, the very basis of which was a supernatural character ascribed to a particular person; of a doctrine, the truth whereof depended entirely upon the truth of a matter of fact then recent. To establish a new religion, even amongst a few people, or in one single nation, is a thing in itself exceedingly difficult. To reform some corruptions which may have spread in a religion, or to make new regulations in it, is not perhaps so hard, when the main and principal part of that religion is preserved entire and unshaken; and yet this very often cannot be accomplished, without an extraordinary concurrence of circumstances, and may be attempted a thousand times without success. But to introduce a new faith, a new way of thinking and acting, and to persuade many nations to quit the religion, in which their ancestors had lived and died, which had been delivered down to them from time immemorial, to make them forsake and despise the deities which they had been accustomed to reverence and worship; this is a work of still greater difficulty. The resistance of education, worldly policy, and superstition, is almost invincible. Archdeacon Paley, Dr. Jortin.

We find, in the Acts of the Apostles, and in their Epistles, that the number of converts to the Christian religion began to increase considerably, almost immediately after our Saviour's ascension, and continued increasing to an astonishing degree through every age, till the final establishment of Christianity by Constantine. The first assembly, which we meet with, of Christ's disciples, and that a few days after His removal from the world, consisted of 120, chap. i. 15. About a week after this, 3,000 were added in one day, chap. ii. 41. And the number of Christians publicly baptized, and publicly associating together, were very soon increased to 5,000, chap. iv. 4. In a few years after this, the converts were described as increasing in great numbers, in great multitudes, and even in myriads, tens of thousands, chap. xxi. 20: and multitudes both of men and women continued to be added daily; so that within about thirty years after our Lord's death, the Gospel was spread, not only throughout almost all parts of the Roman empire, but even to Parthia and India. It appears from the Epistles written to several churches by the Apostles, that there were large congregations of Christians, both at Rome and in all the principal cities of Greece and Asia. This account is confirmed by contemporary Roman historians; and Pliny, about eighty years after the ascension, complains that the superstition, as he calls it, had seized not cities only, but the lesser towns also, and the open country; that the Pagan temples were almost deserted, the sacred solemnities suspended, and scarce any purchaser to be found for the victims. About twenty years after this, Justin Martyr, a Christian writer, declares, that there was no nation of men, whether Greeks or barbarians, not excepting even those savages that wandered in clans from one region to another, and had no fixed habitation, who had not learned to offer prayers and thanksgivings to the Father and Maker of all, in the name of Jesus, who was crucified. And thus the Church of Christ went on increasing more and more, till, under Constantine, the empire became Christian; at which time there is every reason to believe that the Christians were more numerous and more powerful than the Pagans. Now, in what manner can we account for this wonderful and unexampled progress of the Christian religion?

If this religion had set out with flattering the corrupt passions of mankind, and held up to them the prospect of power, wealth, rank, or pleasure, as the rewards of their conversion; if it had soothed their vices, humoured their prejudices, and encouraged their ancient superstitions; if the persons who taught it had been men of brilliant talents, or commanding eloquence; if they had first proposed it in times of darkness and ignorance, and among savage and barbarous nations; if they had been seconded by all the influence and authority of the great potentates of the earth, or propagated their doctrines at the head of a victorious army; one might have seen some reason for their extraordinary success. But it is well known that the very reverse of all this was the real truth of the case. It is well known, that the first preachers of the Gospel declared open war against all the follies, the vices, the interests, the inveterate prejudices and favourite superstitions of the world: that they were (with few exceptions) men of no abilities, no learning, no artificial rhetorick or powers of persuasion; that their doctrines were promulgated in an enlightened age, and to the most polished nations, and had all the wit and learning, and eloquence and philosophy of the world to contend with; and that, instead of being aided by the authority and influence of the civil powers, they were opposed and harassed, and persecuted by them, even to death, with the most unrelenting cruelty; and all those who embraced their doctrines were exposed to the same hardships and sufferings.

Is it then credible, that, under these circumstances, the new religion should have spread, merely by the natural powers of its first propagators, in so short a space, over so large a part of the then known world, without any superiour assistance or co-operation? Did any thing of the kind ever happen in the world before or since? It is plainly unprecedented and impossible. As therefore all human means of success were against them, what else but supernatural means were left for them? It is clear almost to demonstration, that they must have been endowed with those miraculous powers, and favoured with that Divine assistance, to which they pretended, and which of course proved them to be the messengers of heaven. Bp. Porteus.

GENERAL INTRODUCTION

TO

ST. PAUL'S EPISTLES.

ST. PAUL, the principal particulars of whose life are recorded in the Acts of the Apostles, and are frequently alluded to by himself in his Epistles, was a person of great natural abilities, of quick apprehension, strong passions, firm resolution, and irreproachable life: he was conversant with Grecian and Jewish literature; and he gave early proofs of an active and zealous disposition. If we may be allowed to consider his character, independent of his supernatural endowments, we may pronounce that he was well qualified to have risen to distinction and eminence, and that he was by nature peculiarly adapted to the high office to which it pleased God to call him. As a minister of the Gospel he displayed the most unwearied perseverance and undaunted courage. He was deterred by no difficulty or danger, and he endured a great variety of persecutions with patience and cheerfulness. He gloried in being thought worthy of suffering for the name of Jesus, and continued with unabated zeal to maintain the truth of Christianity against its bitterest and most powerful enemies. He was the principal instrument under Providence of spreading the Gospel among the Gentiles; and it appears from the Acts of the Apostles, that his labours lasted many years, and reached over a considerable extent of country. Though he is emphatically styled the great Apostle of the Gentiles, he began his ministry in almost every city by preaching in the synagogue of the Jews; and though he owed by far the greater part of his persecutions to the opposition and malice of that proud and obstinate people, whose resentment he particularly incurred by maintaining that the Gentiles were to be admitted to an indiscriminate participation of the benefits of the new dispensation, yet it rarely happened in any place, that some of the Jews did not yield to his arguments, and embrace the Gospel. He watched with paternal care over the churches which he had founded, and was always ready to strengthen the faith, and regulate the conduct, of his converts by such directions and advice as their circumstances might require.

The exertions of St. Paul in the cause of Christianity were not confined to personal instruction; he also wrote fourteen Epistles to individuals or churches, which are now extant, and form a part of our canon. In these letters of the Apostle, there are those obscurities and difficulties which belong to epistolary writing. Many circumstances are mentioned with brevity, and many opinions and facts are barely alluded to, as being well known to the persons whom he addresses, but which it is very difficult at this distant period to discover and ascertain. He does not formally announce the subjects which he means to discuss; he enters upon them abruptly, and makes frequent transitions without any intimations or notice; he answers objections without stating them, and abounds in parentheses, which are not always easily discerned. Perspicuity, indeed, and a strict adherence to the rules of composition, were scarcely compatible with the fervour of his imagination, and the rapidity of his thoughts. "He is," says Mr. Locke, "full of the matter he treats; and writes with warmth, which usually neglects method, and those partitions and pauses, which men educated in the schools of rhetoricians usually observe." There is however a real connexion and coherence in all his writings; and his reasoning, although it may sometimes seem to be desultory, will always be found to be correct and convincing. Instead of the beauties which arise from a nice arrangement of words, an harmonious cadence of periods, and an artificial structure of sentences, we have a style at once concise and highly figurative, and a striking peculiarity and uncommon energy of language. When he speaks of the doctrines and excellency of the Christian religion, enlarges upon the nature and attributes of the Deity, or terrifies with the dread of Divine judgments, his style rises with the subject; and while our minds are impressed with the justness and the dignity of the sentiments, we cannot but admire the force and sublimity of the expressions. Though he never departs from the authority of the Apostolick character, yet the sensibility of his own heart frequently leads him to appeal to the feelings and affections of those to whom he writes; and the zeal of his temper is so constantly apparent throughout his Epistles, that no one can read them with attention, without catching some portion of that fire by which he was animated. Bp. Tomline.

Any one, who reads the Apostolical Epistles, particularly those of St. Paul, with any care and attention, will find the constant method of the writers to have been, first to explain the particular point debated in the Church, or amongst persons they wrote to, and which was the occasion of their writing; and in the next place, to give them such exhortations to every Christian duty and virtue as would be at all times, and in every Church in every age, necessary and of absolute importance; having a special eye to the particular virtues those disputes might most probably tempt them to the neglect of. Now the former part of these epistolary writings cannot be rightly understood any other way, than by attending carefully to the state of the questions handled, and determined. And therefore the errours and vain disputes, that are to be seen in many writings of these latter ages of Christianity concerning faith and works, justification and sanctification, election and reprobation, and such like; that have confounded, vexed, and distracted the minds of many Christians; have all arisen from this one grand mistake, of applying certain particular phrases, or passages in these writings, to themselves, or to any other particular persons, which plainly appear to have referred to the then condition, not of particular persons, but of whole Churches, of the Jewish or Gentile part. It is this mistake that has troubled the hearts, and so diverted the minds of many otherwise good men, from attending to the more excellent parts of these writings, the moral and weighty exhortations given to Christians; and by puzzling them about former controversies, that do very little, if at all, concern us now; have turned off their thoughts from the great matters of the law, which are most easy to be understood, and of infinite obligation to be put in practice. Pyle.

Besides those causes of obscurity, which are common to St. Paul, with most of the other penmen of the several books of the New Testament, we may add those that are peculiarly his, and owing to his style and temper. He was, as it is visible, a man of quick thought, and warm temper, mighty well versed in the writings of the Old Testament, and full of the doctrines of the New. All this put together, suggested matter to him in abundance, on those subjects which came in his way: so that one may consider him, when he was writing, as beset with a crowd of thoughts all striving for utterance. In this posture of his mind it was impossible for him to keep that slow pace, and observe minutely that order and method of ranging all he said, from which results an easy and obvious perspicuity. To this his copiousness and vehemence, may be imputed those many large parentheses, which a careful reader may observe in his Epistles. Upon this account also it is that he often breaks off in the middle of an argument, to let in some new thought suggested by his own words; which having pursued and explained, as far as conduced to his present purpose, he re-assumes the thread of his discourse, and goes on with it, without taking any notice, that he returns again to what he had been before saying; though sometimes it be so far off, that it may well have slipt out of his mind, and requires a very attentive reader to observe, and so bring the disjointed members together, as to make up the connexion, and see how the scattered parts of the discourse hang together in a coherent, well agreeing sense, that makes it all of a piece.

Besides the disturbance in reading St. Paul's Epistles, from the copiousness and vivacity of his thoughts, which may obscure his method, and often hide his sense from an unwary or over-hasty reader; the frequent changing of the personage he speaks in, renders the sense very uncertain, and is apt to mislead one that has not some clue to guide him; sometimes by the pronoun "I," he means himself; sometimes any Christian; sometimes a Jew, sometimes any man, &c. If speaking of himself in the first person singular has so various meanings; his use of the first person plural is with a far greater latitude, sometimes designing himself alone, sometimes those with himself, whom he makes partners to the Epistles; sometimes with himself comprehending the other Apostles, or preachers of the Gospel, or Christians: nay sometimes he in that way speaks of the converted Jews, other times of the converted Gentiles, and sometimes of others in a more or less extended sense, every one of which varies the meaning of the place, and makes it to be differently understood.

In the current also of his discourse, he sometimes drops in the objections of others, and his answers to them, without any change in the scheme of his language, that might give notice of any other speaking, besides himself. This requires great attention to observe; and yet, if it be neglected or overlooked, will make the reader very much mistake and misunderstand his meaning, and render the sense very perplexed.

These are intrinsick difficulties arising from the text itself, whereof there might be a great many other named, as the uncertainty, sometimes, who are the persons he speaks to, or the opinions or practices, which he has in his eye, sometimes in alluding to them, sometimes in exhortations and reproofs. But those above mentioned being the chief, it may suffice to have opened our eyes a little upon them, which, well examined, may contribute towards our discovery of the rest. Locke.

Of the fourteen Epistles ascribed to St. Paul in our canon, the thirteen first have, in all ages of the Church, been universally acknowledged to have been written by that Apostle. Some doubts have been entertained, as we shall see hereafter, concerning the Epistle to the Hebrews. As the testimonies in favour of the genuineness of these thirteen Epistles are nearly the same, it may be advisable to state them at once; and this the rather, because the style of these different Epistles is so exactly the same, and of so peculiar a kind, that whatever proves any one of them to be genuine, may be considered as a proof of the genuineness of them all.

Clement of Rome, and Polycarp, both quote the first Epistle to the Corinthians; and Ignatius and Polycarp both quote the Epistle to the Ephesians; and Polycarp also quotes the Epistle to the Philippians. Besides these quotations, all the thirteen Epistles, except the short one to Philemon, are plainly referred to by one or more of the apostolical Fathers, although they do not expressly say that they were written by St. Paul. Justin Martyr does not quote by name any one of St. Paul's Epistles; but there are passages in his remaining works, which may be considered as allusions to seven of them; namely, to the Epistle to the Romans, to the first to the Corinthians, to the Galatians, Ephesians, Philippians. Colossians, and the second to the Thessalonians. Athenagoras quotes the first Epistle to the Corinthians. Theophilus of Antioch refers to the Romans, to the first and second to the Corinthians, to the Ephesians, Philippians, Colossians, first to Timothy, and Titus. All the thirteen Epistles, except that to Philemon, are quoted by Irenæus, Clement of Alexandria, and Cyprian; and all, without any exception, are quoted by Tertullian, Origen, Dionysius of Alexandria, Eusebius, Athanasius, Epiphanius, St. Jerome, St. Augustine, and St. Chrysostom.

These writers reach from the days of the Apostles to the end of the fourth century, and are amply sufficient to establish the genuineness of these Epistles. It is unnecessary to enumerate writers of a later date.

The brevity of the Epistle to Philemon, and the private nature of its subject, account for its not being quoted so early or so frequently as the other Epistles of St. Paul. It appears from the above statement, that Tertullian is the earliest author who mentions this Epistle; but he tells us, that it was received by Marcion, who lived in the beginning of the second century. It was also inserted in every catalogue of the books of the New Testament; and, short as it is, it bears strong internal marks of being the genuine production of St. Paul.

It may be here observed, that these Epistles are not placed in our Bibles in the order in which they were written. The Epistles to whole Churches are placed before those which are addressed to particular persons. The Epistle to the Romans is placed first, probably because, when the Gospel was propagated, Rome was the mistress of the world. The Epistle to the Corinthians was placed next, because Corinth was at that time the capital of Greece. Then comes the Epistle to the Galatians, who were not the inhabitants of a single city, but of a country in Asia Minor, in which several churches had been founded. This is followed by the Epistle to the Ephesians, Ephesus being the principal city of Asia Minor. Philippi was a Roman colony, which might, perhaps, cause the Epistle to the Philippians to be placed before those to the Colossians, and Thessalonians, whose cities were not distinguished by any particular circumstance. The Epistles to Timothy have the precedence among those which are written to individuals, because there are two of them; or because they are the longest; or, because Timothy was a frequent and favourite companion of St. Paul. Then follows the Epistle to Titus, who was a preacher of the Gospel; and the last of these Epistles is that to Philemon, who was probably a private Christian. The Epistle to the Hebrews seems to have been placed the last of all St. Paul's Epistles, because, as was just now observed, some doubts were at first entertained whether it were really written by that Apostle. Bp. Tomline.

Some difference of opinion has prevailed respecting the years, wherein the Epistles of St. Paul were written: the following synopsis is according to the dates printed to each Epistle in the authorized editions of our Bibles, agreeably to the computation of Bp. Lloyd. The places, from which the several Epistles are supposed to have been written, are annexed.

THE EPISTLE OF PAUL THE APOSTLE

TO THE ROMANS.

INTRODUCTION.

THIS Epistle was written from Corinth, probably in the year of our Lord 58, being the fourth year of the emperour Nero, just before St. Paul set out from thence for Jerusalem with the contributions, which the Christians of Macedonia and Achaia had made for the relief of their poor brethren in Judea. It was transcribed or written, as St. Paul dictated it, by Tertius; and the person who conveyed it to Rome was Phebe, a deaconess of the Church at Cenchrea, which was the eastern part of the city of Corinth. It is addressed to the Church at Rome, which consisted partly of Jewish, and partly of heathen converts: and throughout the Epistle it is evident that the Apostle has regard to both these descriptions of Christians.

St. Paul, when he wrote this Epistle, had not been at Rome, but he had heard an account of the state of the Church in that city from Aquila and Priscilla, two Christians who were banished from thence by the edict of Claudius, and with whom he lived during his first visit to Corinth. Whether any other Apostle had at this time preached the Gospel at Rome, cannot now be ascertained. Among those who witnessed the effect of the effusion of the Holy Ghost, are mentioned, "strangers of Rome, Jews, and Proselytes," that is, persons of the Jewish religion, who usually resided at Rome, but who had come to Jerusalem to be present at the feast of Pentecost. It is highly probable that these men, upon their return home, proclaimed the Gospel of Christ: and we may further suppose that many Christians, who had been converted in other places, afterwards settled at Rome, and were the cause of others embracing the Gospel.

But by whatever means Christianity had been introduced into Rome, it seems to have flourished in great purity; for we learn from the beginning of this Epistle, that the faith of the Roman Christians was at this time much celebrated. To confirm them in that faith, and to guard them against the errours of Judaizing Christians, was the object of this letter, in which St. Paul takes occasion to enlarge upon the nature of the Mosaick institution; to explain the fundamental principles and doctrines of Christianity; and to shew that the whole human race, formerly divided into Jews and Gentiles, were now to be admitted into the religion of Jesus, indiscriminately, and free from every other obligation.

The Apostle, after expressing his affection for the Roman Christians, and asserting that the Gospel is the power of salvation to all who believe, takes a comprehensive view of the conduct and condition of men under the different dispensations of Providence; he shews that all mankind, both Jews and Gentiles, were equally "under sin," and liable to the wrath and punishment of God: that therefore there was a necessity for an universal propitiation and redemption, which were now offered to the whole race of men, without any preference or exception, by the mercy of Him who is God of the Gentiles as well as of the Jews; that faith in Jesus Christ, the universal Redeemer, was the only means of obtaining this salvation, which the deeds of the law were wholly incompetent to procure; that as the sins of the whole world originated from the disobedience of Adam, so the justification from those sins was to be derived from the obedience of Christ; that all distinction between Jew and Gentile was now abolished, and the ceremonial law entirely abrogated; that the unbelieving Jews would be excluded from the benefits of the Gospel, while the believing Gentiles would be partakers of them; and that this rejection of the Jews, and call of the Gentiles, were predicted by the Jewish Prophets Hosea and Isaiah. He then points out the superiority of the Christian over the Jewish religion, and earnestly exhorts the Romans to abandon every species of wickedness, and to practise the duties of righteousness and holiness, which were now enjoined upon higher sanctions, and enforced by more powerful motives. In the latter part of the Epistle, St. Paul gives some practical instructions, and recommends some particular virtues; and he concludes with salutations, and a doxology.

This Epistle is very valuable, on account of the arguments and truths which it contains relative to the necessity, excellence, and universality of the Gospel dispensation. Bp. Tomline.

Before we take into consideration the Epistle to the Romans in particular, it may not be amiss to premise, that the miraculous birth, life, death, resurrection, and ascension of our Lord Jesus Christ, were all events that came to pass within the confines of Judea; and that the ancient writings of the Jewish nations, allowed by the Christians to be of Divine original, were appealed to, as witnessing the truth of His mission and doctrine; whereby it was manifest that the Jews were the depositaries of the proofs of the Christian religion. This could not fail of giving to the Jews, who were owned to be the people of God, even in the days of our Saviour, a great authority among the convert Gentiles, who knew nothing of the Messiah they were to believe in, but what they derived from that nation, out of which He and His doctrine sprung. Nor did the Jews fail to make use of this advantage in several ways, to the disturbance of the Gentiles, that embraced Christianity. The Jews, even those of them that received the Gospel, were, for the most part, so devoted to the law of Moses and their ancient rites, that they could by no means bring themselves to think that they were to be laid aside. They were every where stiff and zealous for them, and contended they were necessary to be observed, even by Christians, by all that pretended to be the people of God, and hoped to be accepted by Him. This gave no small trouble to the newly converted Gentiles, and was a great prejudice to the Gospel, and therefore we find it complained of in more places than one; see Acts xv. 1; 2 Cor. xi. 3; Gal. ii. 4; v. 1, 10, 12; Phil. iii. 2; Col. ii. 4, 8, 16; Tit. i. 10, 11, 14, &c. This remark may serve to give light, not only to this Epistle to the Romans, but to several other of St. Paul's Epistles, written to the churches of converted Gentiles. Locke.

These questions, namely, whether the Gentiles were at all to be admitted into the Church and Kingdom of Christ the Messiah, or at least, whether both they and the Jews ought not to observe the ceremonial law along with the Christian? Whether the true religion were so appropriated and confined to the Jewish nation, and the Jewish land, as that for their obstinacy they could never be cast off and excluded the Church of God? These, I say, are the substance of this Epistle, without attending to which, the very terms and phrases made use of in it, must appear improper, the reasonings hard, intricate, and contradictory; but with this key they are exact, strong, regular, and conclusive. The two first of these questions are handled in the eight first chapters, and some particular branches of them in the 13th, 14th, and 15th. The other is treated on in the 9th, 10th, and 11th. Pyle.

Chap. I. In this chapter St. Paul declares his Apostolical commission from Jesus Christ to preach the religion of the Gospel both to Jews and Gentiles. He salutes the Roman Christians, and expresses his desire of visiting them, to confirm and strengthen them in the faith; especially to satisfy them in this particular point, that both Jew and Gentile were under an absolute necessity and obligation of relying wholly upon the Gospel religion for pardon and salvation. He proves this, first, with respect to the Gentiles, from the consideration that, notwithstanding God had discovered Himself to them by the works of the creation, they did not serve Him, but fell into inexcusable idolatry, and enormous vices and disorders of every kind. Pyle, Ostervald.

Ver. 1. Paul, a servant of Jesus Christ,] Not only a disciple, but a servant in a special manner, that is, a minister of Jesus Christ, and that of the highest rank, being made an Apostle by the immediate call of Christ Himself. Dr. Wells. The word denotes, in a metaphorical sense, one who acts in the name of another; one, whose ministry another uses, as in the case of Moses and the Prophets, Rev. xv. 3; x. 7; and Apostles, Acts xvi. 17; Tit. i. 1. It is a title of distinction, usually conferred on every interpreter of the Divine will and teacher of the Christian religion, but especially on the Apostles; whence it is often interchanged with the word Apostle. See Gal. i. 10, compared with ver. 1; Phil. i. 1; Tit. i. 1; Jam. i. 1; &c. See also 2 Tim. ii. 24; Col. iv. 12. Parkhurst, Schleusner.

—— called to be an apostle,] Constituted and appointed by Christ to that holy function: he did not assume the honour of an Apostle, till he was "called." Burkitt. Rather, "a called," or special "Apostle." "To be" is not in the original. Dr. Hammond.

—— separated unto the gospel of God,] That is, set apart in the purpose and decree of God, "separated from his mother's womb," Gal. i. 15. Immediately and extraordinarily called by Christ Himself to this great work, Acts ix. 15; and mediately by the officers of the Church, Acts xiii. 2, 3, &c. The work of dispensing the mysteries of the Gospel is to be undertaken by none, but those who are solemnly "separated" and set apart for it, and regularly called to it. Burkitt.

—— the gospel of God,] Elsewhere styled "the Gospel of Christ." It is the Gospel of God, as He was the author and contriver of it: it is the Gospel of Christ, as He is also the subject matter and scope of it. Indeed St. Paul sometimes calls it "his Gospel," Rom. ii. 16; because he was the dispenser and promulger of it: it was a Divine treasure committed to his care and trust. Burkitt.

2. (Which he had promised afore by his prophets in the holy scriptures,)] And which therefore contains no new doctrines repugnant to the will of God, made known in the Old Testament, but only a more clear revelation of that will. Dr. Wells. The Gospel, or glad tidings of a Saviour, was first preached to Adam by God Himself, Gen. iii. 15; next to Abraham, Gen. xvii; then it was predicted by all "the Prophets, which have been since the world began." Burkitt.

3. —which was made of the seed of David according to the flesh;] Or, as to His human nature. Dr. Wells, Schleusner. The phrase, "according to the flesh," in this and many other places, properly denotes descent or family-relation of a person. See Rom. iv. 1; ix. 3, 5; 1 Cor. x. 18. Pyle, Parkhurst.

4. And declared to be the Son of God &c.] "Declared," that is, 'determinately marked out.' Parkhurst. As if the Apostle had said, That our Lord Jesus Christ, though, according to the frailty and weakness of His human nature, He was of the seed of David, yet, in respect of that Divine power of the Holy Ghost, which manifested itself in Him, especially in His resurrection from the dead, "was declared to be the Son of God with power," that is, mightily and powerfully demonstrated so to be. Burkitt.

—— the spirit of holiness,] He is probably called the Holy Spirit so frequently in Scripture, and "the Spirit of Holiness" in this one place, not merely as being perfectly holy in Himself, which the Father and the Son are also, but as being the cause of holiness in believers. Abp. Secker, Bp. Pearson.

5. By whom we have received &c.] Who hath afforded me the favour or honour to be sent as Apostle of the Gentiles to all the nations of the world, to reveal to them, and work in them, obedience to the doctrine of the Gospel, (called "the faith," Acts vi. 7;) in His name and to His glory. Dr. Hammond.

—— grace and apostleship,] This is plainly a Hebraism, and signifies the favour, or honour, of the apostleship. Pyle. The Apostolical office, the office of declaring and propagating the Christian religion, the receiving of which office the Apostles referred to the grace of God. Schleusner. But since, wherever the Apostle calls this office "grace," there is always something added of the gifts and powers by which they were enabled to exercise it, (see Rom. xv. 15, 16, 19; Gal. ii. 8, 9; Eph. iii. 2, 7;) it is fit to join both together, and to consider St. Paul as speaking of the office of an Apostle, and the grace belonging to it. Dr. Whitby.

6. —the called of Jesus Christ:] That is, who have been called to the profession of Christianity. Dr. Wells.

7. To all that be in Rome, beloved of God, &c.] To all that be in Rome, professors of Christianity, and so members of that body, to which now belong those titles formerly given to the Jews, such as these, the "beloved of God," the "called," the "saints;" "grace and peace," that is, all blessings spiritual and temporal, be unto you. Dr. Wells.

Christians are very frequently in the New Testament, particularly in St. Paul's Epistles, styled "holy, saints," because they are set apart or separated from the world for sacred purposes, and consecrated to the service of God, and so lie under a necessary obligation to be true and real saints. Parkhurst, Burkitt.

—— Grace to you and peace] The usual salutation in former times was, "Peace be unto you:" but after the new gift of the grace of the Holy Ghost, purchased by our Lord, the new evangelical salutation adds "grace:" "Grace and peace." See 1 Pet. i. 2; 2 John 3. Bp. Fell.

—— from God our Father, and the Lord Jesus Christ.] St. Paul begins or ends most of his Epistles with a salutation in the form of a wish, which is indeed a prayer or benediction, in the name of those who are so invocated; or an invocation of Christ, in conjunction with the Father, for the greatest blessings of favour and mercy. Bp. Burnet.

8 First, I thank my God through Jesus Christ for you all, that your faith is spoken of throughout the whole world.

9 For God is my witness, whom I serve ‖ with my spirit in the gospel of his Son, that without ceasing I make mention of you always in my prayers;

‖ Or, in my spirit.

10 Making request, if by any means now at length I might have a prosperous journey by the will of God to come unto you.

11 For I long to see you, that I may impart unto you some spiritual gift, to the end ye may be established;

12 That is, that I may be comforted together ‖ with you by the mutual faith both of you and me.

‖ Or, in you.

13 Now I would not have you ignorant, brethren, that oftentimes I purposed to come unto you, (but was let hitherto,) that I might have some fruit ‖ among you also, even as among other Gentiles.

Anno DOMINI 60.

‖ Or, in you.

14 I am debtor both to the Greeks, and to the Barbarians; both to the wise, and to the unwise.

15 So, as much as in me is, I am ready to preach the gospel to you that are at Rome also.

16 For I am not ashamed of the gospel of Christ: for it is the power of God unto salvation to every one that believeth; to the Jew first, and also to the Greek.

17 For therein is the righteousness of God revealed from faith to faith: as it is written, [b] The just shall live by faith.

8. — I thank my God through Jesus Christ for you all, &c.] In the beginning of his Epistles, St. Paul generally subjoined to the apostolical benediction a solemn thanksgiving for the faith, charity, patience, and other virtues of the brethren, to whom he wrote, to make them sensible of their happy state, and to lead them to a right improvement of the advantages which they enjoyed as Christians. Dr. Macknight. He adds "through Jesus Christ," because, as no petition is acceptable to the Father, so no thanks, but through Christ: through whom descend all our blessings, by whom are presented all our prayers; the Mediator in all things between God and us. See Eph. v. 20; Heb. xiii. 15. Bp. Fell.

—— throughout the whole world.] Meaning, the whole Roman empire. See Luke ii. 1. Dr. Wells. The faith of the Romans, which occasioned so much discourse, was their turning from idols. An event of this kind could not fail to be spoken of with wonder through the whole empire, as there were multitudes of strangers, continually coming to Rome from the provinces, who, on their return home, would report what they had seen. For this the Apostle thanked God, because the conversion of the Romans encouraged the inhabitants of other cities to forsake the established idolatry. Besides, Rome being the metropolis of the world, the conversion of so many of its inhabitants brought no small credit to the evidences of the Gospel. Dr. Macknight.

11. — that I may impart unto you some spiritual gift, &c.] That I may confirm and strengthen you in your Christian profession, by giving you some seasonable counsels; or rather by imparting some spiritual gifts and endowments of the Holy Ghost to some of you, by the imposition of hands. This the Apostles used to do. Acts viii. 17; xix. 6; 2 Tim. i. 6. Pyle, Dr. Whitby.

12. — that I may be comforted together with you by the mutual faith] "Both of you," through faith receiving, "and me," by faith imparting, these gifts. It being both a comfort and establishment of faith in them, to receive these gifts of the Spirit, and in him, to be able to impart them to them, and to find God so effectually working by him. Dr. Whitby.

In the former verse St. Paul had said, that he desired to come amongst them, to establish them: in these words, "that is," he explains, or, as it were, recalls what he had said, that he might not seem to think them not sufficiently instructed or established in the faith; and therefore turns the end of his coming to them to their mutual rejoicing in one another's faith, when he and they should come to see and know one another. Locke.

13. — (but was let hitherto,)] That is, hindered: probably by the unexpected opposition and hardships which he met with in Asia and Greece, from which latter country this Epistle was written. See Acts xiii. and xiv. &c. Pyle.

14. I am debtor both to the Greeks, and to the Barbarians; &c.] I am in duty bound by my special commission to preach the Gospel, as I have opportunity, to the Gentiles of all kinds, both to the Greeks, and to the rest, to whom the Greeks have given the name of "Barbarians;" both to "the wise" or learned, as the Greeks esteem themselves, and to the rest, esteemed by the Greeks, at least comparatively with themselves, "unwise," or unlearned. Dr. Wells.

16. For I am not ashamed &c.] For though I am sensible that this Gospel of Christ is likely to meet with no little opposition from the vices and prejudices of mankind; though some of its doctrines will bear hard upon the false wisdom and pride of the Gentile philosophers, and others upon the malice and haughtiness of the Jews; though its professors may now seem mean and contemptible; yet it is attended with such evidences of truth, with such demonstrations of Divine power, wisdom, and goodness towards mankind, as will recommend it to all impartial and considering men, as the best and only method of happiness and salvation, both to Jew and Gentile, that will sincerely believe and obey it. Pyle.

—— to the Jew first,] They having the honour that it should be first preached to them, to whom Christ was promised, and from whom He was descended. See Matt. x. 5; Rom. ix. 4; Acts xiii. 46. Bp. Fell.

It cannot be sufficiently admired, how skilfully, to avoid offending those of his own nation, St. Paul here enters into an argument so unpleasing to the Jews, as this of persuading them, that the Gentiles had as good a title to be taken in, to be the people of God under the Messiah, as they themselves, which is the main design of this Epistle. Locke.

17. — therein is the righteousness of God revealed from faith to faith:] That is, it is revealed to beget faith in men, even such a faith as goes from faith to faith, that is, groweth and increaseth from one degree and measure to another. Burkitt. But it is a more natural construction of the passage to connect the words, rendered "from faith," with "the righteousness of God;" and those, rendered "to faith," with "revealed:" and the sense of it seems to be plainly this, "The righteousness of God, which is by faith," that is, God's method of justifying us by faith in Christ, "is revealed in the Gospel to faith," that is, to beget faith in men, or to bring in all, both Jews and Gentiles, to believe and embrace it: for that is the scope of the Apostle's argument. Dr. Whitby, Pyle.

—— the righteousness of God] That righteousness, which is imputed to sinful man through faith in Christ, by which his past sins are forgiven or covered, or he is cleared, acquitted, or absolved from his past sins, and is himself accepted as righteous, to life eternal, is several times called "the righteousness of God;" as being that method, which God hath exhibited in the Gospel, of man's justification, or being made righteous through the merits and death of Christ, whence it is once termed "the righteousness of our God and Saviour Jesus Christ," 2 Pet. i. 1. Parkhurst.

—— as it is written, The Just shall live by faith.] As the pious Jews, in the time of the Babylonian captivity, did live and find comfort in their troubles by faith and affiance in God; in like manner the Apostle shews, that he, who is just or religious according to the Gospel, shall live a life of grace on earth, and glory in heaven, by faith in Christ. Burkitt.

18. For the wrath of God is revealed &c.] The Apostle proceeds to shew the absolute necessity of this faith in Christ being preached to and embraced by all men without exception, from a consideration of that deplorable condition of vice and wickedness, under which both Gentile and Jew were involved. He begins with the Gentiles. Pyle.

The wrath of God was before more expressly revealed against the unrighteousness of the Jews, God in the mean time so far "winking" at the unrighteousness of the Gentiles, as to make no express denunciation of His wrath against them: but now "He commandeth all men every where to repent" of their unrighteousness, "because He hath appointed a day, in the which He will judge the world in righteousness," Acts xvii. 30, 31. Dr. Whitby.

—— against all ungodliness &c.] The "ungodliness of men" signifies their impiety in robbing God of His honour, and giving it to graven images, or to them which "by nature were no gods," ver. 21—26. Their "unrighteousness" is their injustice to one another," ver. 26—30. And they are said to "hold (or retain) the truth in unrighteousness," by acting contrary to the notions of it, which they had, or might have learned, from the law of nature, and by suppressing or corrupting the dictates of their natural conscience. Dr. Whitby.

The Apostle's drift seems especially to aim at the wisest or greatest pretenders to knowledge among the Gentiles: see ver. 22, and chap. ii. 1: who were therefore more guilty also in their pride and contempt of others. Bp. Fell.

19. Because that which may be known of God is manifest in them;] Or, among them: that is, Much of the nature and properties of God may be known by the light of nature; His infinite power, wisdom, and goodness, are manifest in the minds and consciences of all men: "for God hath shewed it unto them," partly by imprinting these notions of Himself upon the hearts of all men, and partly by the book of creation, in which His glorious attributes are written in large and legible characters. Burkitt.

20. For the invisible things of him &c.] For those blessed attributes of God, which are not to be discerned by the sense of man; namely, His eternal power, His infinite goodness, wisdom, justice, mercy, and the truth of His deity, are, ever since the world was created, so clearly seen and made known by the visible and mighty work of His creation and government of all things, as that all those, which will not hereupon acknowledge them, are left without all excuse. Bp. Hall.

The meaning of the Apostle is, that the order, contrivance, and design, displayed in the creation, prove with certainty, that there is more in nature than what we really see; and that amongst the invisible things of the universe there is a Being, the Author and Origin of all this contrivance and design; and by consequence a Being of stupendous power, and of wisdom and knowledge incomparably exalted above any wisdom or knowledge which we see in man; and that He stands in the same relation to us as the maker does to the thing made. Archdeacon Paley.

21. Because that, when they knew God, &c.] The writings of Plato, Xenophon, Plutarch, Cicero, and other philosophers, which still remain, together with the quotations made by Justin Martyr and Clement of Alexandria from those which are lost, prove that the learned heathens, though ignorant of the way of salvation, were acquainted with the unity and spirituality of God, and had, to a certain extent, just notions of His perfections, of the creation and government of the world, and of the duties which men owe to God, and to one another. Dr. Macknight.

A sad account we have here of the state of religion in the heathen world, and a manifest proof how much nature stands in need of assistance. What we learn from St. Paul is plainly this: that notwithstanding the care which God had taken to display the evidences of His own being and Godhead in every work of the creation, so that men could not but have a notion of the Deity; yet, so little did they profit by that knowledge, that it served only to render them inexcusable in their superstition and idolatry. Bp. Sherlock.

From this verse to the end of the chapter we have a large and black catalogue of the sins, of which the old heathens or Gentiles were guilty. Burkitt.

—— they glorified him not as God,] By giving Him the honour due to His Deity; "neither were thankful" to Him, who giveth to all men life, breath, and all things, Acts xvii. 28; and xiv. 17: (Dr. Whitby:) "but became vain in their imaginations," lost themselves in the most irrational conceptions and false reasonings about Him: (Pyle:) "and their foolish heart was darkened," so as not to be sensible of their egregious folly: (Dr. Wells:) but their natural reason became more and more obscured, by rebelling against the light. Burkitt.

The Gentiles used to call the supreme Being 'Best and Greatest.' The expression was just, and conveyed noble and honourable sentiments of God. But these same Gentiles, forgetting or overlooking all that was implied in this expression, worshipped God in the sun, moon, and stars; worshipped Him under images of men, of beasts, and of monsters; added to the supreme God inferiour deities, and paid them equal reverence with Him; ascribed to them all human weaknesses and vices; gave Divine honours to dead men; and worshipped their deities with childish and absurd, sometimes with impure, impious, and cruel rites and ceremonies. Dr. Jortin.

22, 23. Professing themselves to be wise,] And usurping that name, (ver. 14; 1 Cor. i. 20, 21,) "they became" in their actions "fools:" (Dr. Whitby:) "and" for an undeniable proof of their folly, "changed the glory of the uncorruptible God," &c. that is, they debased and dishonoured the all-glorious God, by framing vile images of men and beasts, of birds and creeping things, whereby to represent Him. Dr. Wells, Burkitt.

Though the nations of the heathens generally thought themselves wise in the religion they embraced, yet the Apostle here, having all along in this and the following chapters used "Greeks" for "Gentiles," may be thought to have an eye to the Greeks, among whom the men of study and inquiry had assumed to themselves the name of "wise." Locke.

24. Wherefore God also gave them up to uncleanness] Wherefore God, on the other side, in a just punishment of their gross idolatry, as plaguing one sin with another, gave them over to their own unclean lusts. Bp. Hall. Those grievous immoralities, which

St. Paul here describes as the consequences of idolatry, have been its consequences in all times and places. Abp. Secker.

St. Paul makes idolatry to be the original of all the corruption and immorality that was spread over the Gentile world: which came in, partly as the natural consequence of idolatry, of its debasing the ideas of God, and wounding true religion and virtue in its source and first seeds; and partly as an effect of the just judgments of God upon those who thus dishonoured Him. Bp. Burnet. See note on ver. 28.

He withdrew His Spirit from them, as He did from the antediluvians; the consequence of which was, that their lusts excited them to commit every sort of uncleanness. The truth is, a contempt of religion is the source of all wickedness. Dr. Macknight.

25. Who changed the truth of God into a lie,] The true God for some false god. The word "lie" is plainly taken to denote an idol, Isai. xliv. 20. Dr. Wells. Worshipping as gods them who by nature were no gods, Gal. iv. 8; or only demons, 1 Cor. x. 20. Dr. Whitby.

—— and served the creature] In the twenty-third verse they are charged only with false representations of God; in this also with a false object of their worship, by giving the Divine honours to a creature. Dr. Whitby.

27. And likewise also &c.] The Apostle is not speaking simply of the Greeks committing the uncleanness which he mentions, but of their lawgivers authorizing these vices by their public institutions of religion, by their avowed doctrine, and by their own practice. When therefore the statesmen, the philosophers, and the priests, notwithstanding they enjoyed the light of nature, improved by science, avowedly addicted themselves to the most abominable uncleannesses; nay, when the gods, whom they worshipped, were supposed by them to be guilty of the same enormities; when their temples were brothels, their pictures invitations to sin, their sacred groves places of prostitution, and their sacrifices a horrid mixture of superstition and cruelty; there was certainly the greatest need of the Gospel revelation, to make mankind sensible of their brutality, and to bring them to a more holy practice. Dr. Macknight.

—— receiving in themselves that recompence of their error which was meet.] That is, being given up thus to dishonour their own bodies, and to commit things dishonourable to human nature, for the dishonour which they did by their idolatry to their almighty and blessed Creator. Dr. Whitby, Pyle.

The idolatry, whereby they dishonoured God, naturally led them to dishonour themselves by lascivious practices, in imitation of their gods. Idolatry is named "errour," because it was the greatest and most pernicious of all errours. Dr. Macknight.

28. —as they did not like to retain God in their knowledge,] Or, to have a due acknowledgment of Him. That the Gentiles were not wholly without the knowledge of God in the world, St. Paul tells us in this very chapter, but they did not acknowledge Him as they ought, ver. 21. These two verses seem to express the same thing in different words. Locke.

—— God gave them over to a reprobate mind,] See also verses 24 and 26. These phrases cannot be so understood, as to lay upon the persons, of whom St. Paul speaks, a necessity of being thus unclean and unnatural in their affections, or thus perverse in their minds. For then this would not be their fault, nor would it be blameworthy in them to do all these things. But they were deserted and given up by God, as the just punishment of their iniquities committed against the law of nature, which they had received; because "they held the truth revealed, in unrighteousness," ver. 18; because "when they knew God, they glorified Him not as God, neither were thankful," ver. 21; and because "knowing that they which committed such things were worthy of death, they not only did the same, but had pleasure in them that did them," ver. 32: and so indeed they were delivered up to do these things by their own wickedness, ver. 24, 26. Whence the same Apostle saith, "they gave themselves over unto lasciviousness, to work all uncleanness with greediness," Eph. iv. 19. Dr. Whitby.

—— to a reprobate mind,] The word, rendered "reprobate," is used both in a passive and in an active sense. In the former it is properly applied to metals, and refers to that part of them, which upon refining is thrown away as drossy and worthless. In this sense it means, disapproved, rejected, cast away; and occurs at 1 Cor. ix. 27; Heb. vi. 8. Compare 2 Cor. xiii. 5—7. In an active sense it means undiscerning, undistinguishing, void of judgment; and is so used in this passage, as also at 2 Tim. iii. 8; Tit. i. 16. Parkhurst.

A mind not capable of discovering or approving what is good, either in principle or practice; a mind void of all knowledge and relish of virtue. Dr. Macknight.

The Gentiles not exercising their minds to search out the truth, and form their judgments right, God left them to an unsearching, unjudicious mind. Locke.

—— to do those things which are not convenient;] Things not agreeable to nature or to reason. Dr. Whitby. The most abominable vices, as the following catalogue plainly shews. This way of speaking is very common in the Old Testament: see Prov. xx. 23; xxviii. 21; Jer. vii. 31; xix. 5. See Rev. iii. 2. Pyle.

32. Who, knowing the judgment of God,] His righteous judgment or appointment. Parkhurst.

—— that they which commit such things are worthy of death,] That murder, adultery, and unnatural lusts deserved death, they knew not only by the light of nature and conscience, but by their own laws condemning them, who did such things, to death. That all these sins, being condemned by the law of nature, rendered them obnoxious to the displeasure of that God, who is the governour of the world, and the avenger of all unrighteousness, and so obnoxious to death for violating the laws which He had given them for their government, they might know by the light of nature. Dr. Whitby.

—— have pleasure in them that do them.] This, say the Greek commentators, is much worse than the bare doing of them. For a man may do them through the force of temptation, and by consideration may afterwards become sensible of his folly, and repent of it: but when he is arrived at such a height of wickedness, that he not only approves, but delights in seeing the like things done by others, he demonstrates such a strong affection to them, as is incurable. Dr. Whitby.

We have from nature strong appetites and passions in our corrupted frame, which tempt us so vehemently, and hurry us often so suddenly, into some sins, that perhaps we may not be altogether void of excuse. But there is no original principle within us, that leads us coolly and deliberately to approve them in others. This other can only proceed from a peculiar and wilful depravation of heart, equivalent to what might be produced by many repeated acts of transgression. Abp. Secker.

The description which the Apostle hath given of the national manners of the Greeks, however disgraceful to human nature, being perfectly true, merits attention; because it is a complete confutation of those who contend, that natural reason hath always been sufficient to lead mankind to just notions in religion, and to a proper moral conduct. For after the weakness of human reason, in matters of religion and morality, hath been so clearly demonstrated by experience in the case of the Greeks, who, of all mankind, were the most distinguished for their intellectual endowments, the futile pretence of the sufficiency of the light of nature, set up by modern infidels, for the purpose of rendering revelation needless, should be rejected with the contempt due to so gross a falsehood. And all, who are acquainted with the actual state of the world under the guidance of the light of nature, ought thankfully to embrace the instruction contained in the Gospel, as the most effectual means of training ignorant sinful creatures to virtue; and should humbly submit to the method of salvation by Christ, therein revealed, as of Divine appointment, and as the only method by which sinners can be saved. Dr. Macknight.

Chap. II. I. St. Paul having shewn, in the foregoing chapter, that the Gentiles were sinners, proves in this, that the Jews, who condemned the Gentiles, were sinners also; and by abusing the light they enjoyed, and the goodness of God, they would appear much more guilty before His tribunal than the Gentile, who knew no other law but that of nature and conscience. Whence it follows, that the Jews could not pretend to be justified before God by their works, and that they had no more right to salvation than the Gentiles. II. And because the Jews gloried in having the law of God, and circumcision, which was the token of the covenant, the Apostle declares, that all these external advantages, which distinguished them from the Gentiles, did not render them more acceptable to God, but were useless to them whilst they neglected to keep the law. Ostervald.

Ver. 1. Therefore thou art inexcusable, &c.] Here the illative particle "therefore" is used to introduce a conclusion, not from what goes before, but from something not expressed, the proof of which is to be immediately added. As if the Apostle had said, For this reason, O Jew, thou art without excuse, in judging the Gentiles worthy of death, because by that judgment thou condemnest thyself. Accordingly, to shew that he was thinking of the judgment, which the Jews passed on the Gentiles for their crimes, he immediately adds, "for wherein thou judgest" the Gentiles worthy of death, "thou condemnest thyself, for thou that judgest doest the same things." Josephus assures us, that there was not a nation under heaven more wicked than the Jews in his time; and accuses them of every sin imputed by the Apostle to the Gentiles in the former chapter. Drs. Macknight and Whitby.

By the appellation, "O man," the Apostle with admirable dexterity denotes the Jew, without expressly naming him, so as to avoid exasperating him. Dr. Wells.

Or the conclusion may be understood as drawn from the 32d verse of the first chapter; and the whole of the reasoning, down to ver. 17 of this chapter, as equally addressed to Jew and Gentile, "whoever he is that judgeth," all who are sensible of moral distinctions either from natural light or from revelation. Edit.

2. — according to truth] That is, most impartial and just, without any respect to persons. Dr. Wells. It is equitable that He should, and certain that He will, deal with men according to His word, and reward every man according to his work. Burkitt.

4. Or despisest thou the riches of his goodness] His extraordinary goodness to thee, a Jew, above them, Gentiles, in giving thee the law, the covenants, and the promises, chap. ix. 4. Drs. Wells and Whitby. God's goodness, of which the Jews formed a wrong opinion, consisted in His having made them His Church and people, and in His having bestowed on them a revelation of His will. From these marks of the Divine favour they vainly inferred, that God would punish no descendant of Abraham for his sins. But in this they formed a very wrong judgment of the goodness of God, which was intended, not to make sinning safe to the Jews, but to lead them to repentance. Dr. Macknight.

—— and longsuffering;] The Apostle means God's patiently bearing the ill use, which the Jews made, of the privileges they enjoyed as His Church and people. Dr. Macknight.

The end and design of all the goodness, forbearance, and longsuffering of God towards sinners, is to engage them to love and serve their Benefactor; and thereby to "lead them to repentance:" the undue return, which sinners too often make to God, is to despise the riches of His goodness and longsuffering, by being unthankful for it, by not improving it, by misimproving or sinning against it. Burkitt.

5. — hardness] A callousness, as it were, caused by a long custom of sinning. Bp. Fell.

—— treasurest up unto thyself wrath] The Greek word occurs in a similar sense at Prov. i. 18, 'they treasure up evils to themselves.' Compare Amos iii. 10. Parkhurst.

The sad and fatal consequences of the ungrateful return, made to God by sinners, is here denounced. As if the Apostle had said, The more patience God expends upon thee, if perverted and abused by thee, the greater wrath is treasured up for thee; which, the longer it has been treasured up, will break forth the more violently and fiercely for thy destruction. Burkitt.

—— the day of wrath and revelation of the righteous judgment of God;] The Apostle calls the day of judgment, "the day of wrath," to make the wicked sensible, that as men, greatly enraged, do not suffer their enemies to escape, so God, highly displeased with the wicked, will assuredly punish them at length in the severest manner. Dr. Macknight. The day of judgment will be "the day of revelation of the righteous judgment of God," because the righteousness of God's proceedings, which is not always openly revealed in this life, will be then universally manifested and magnified, to the joyful satisfaction of all good men, and to the dreadful consternation and confusion of the wicked and impenitent world. Burkitt.

6. — according to his deeds:] According to the kind and quality, and to the measures and degrees, of every man's works. Burkitt. And in proportion to the knowledge which he has had of the Divine will. Pyle.

As "truth" is here opposed to "unrighteousness," it must signify, not only the truth discovered by revelation, but those truths likewise respecting religion and morality, which are discoverable by the light of nature, and which among the heathens were the only foundations of a righteous conduct. "Unrighteousness" in this passage denotes all those impious false principles, which atheists, infidels, and scepticks propagate, with a view to destroy the obligations of religion and morality, and to defend their own vicious practices. Dr. Macknight.

—— obey unrighteousness,] Here St. Chrysostom notes, that the Apostle does not say 'who are forced to,' but "who obey unrighteousness;" 'that thou mayest learn, that they offend of choice, and not of necessity, and therefore are unworthy of pardon.' Dr. Whitby.

9. — upon every soul of man that doeth evil, of the Jew first,] That is, principally and especially, because the light and mercy, which the Jew abused and sinned against, was far greater than that bestowed upon the Gentile. The light, under which men sin, puts extraordinary aggravations upon their sins; answerable whereunto will be the degrees of their punishment. The Gentiles will be condemned for disobeying the light of nature, the law of God written on their hearts; but much greater wrath is reserved for the Jews, unto whom were committed the oracles of God: but the greatest of all is reserved for Christians, who obey not the Gospel of our Lord Jesus Christ. Burkitt.

11. For there is no respect of persons with God.] God will impartially dispense recompenses in just proportion, according to the deeds of men. "He that doeth wrong shall receive for the wrong which he hath done," Col. iii. 25. And see 1 Pet. i. 17. Dr. I. Barrow.

If we examine the passages of Scripture where God is said to be no respecter of persons, we shall find that this perfection is ascribed to Him, not directly as He is Creator, but rather as He is Ruler and Judge, and dispenser of rewards and punishments. His giving to His creatures more or less, His placing them here or there when He calls them into being, is a matter of favour, and no account should be asked or expected; and what is called "respect of persons," hath nothing to do with it. But in His behaviour to His creatures, consequent to their behaviour towards Him, in this He acts by the rules of justice and equity; and in this His justice and equity shall be so manifest, as to clear Him from all imputations of partiality. Dr. Jortin.

"Persons," according to Beza, are men as distinguished from one another by their external qualities, their country, kindred, sex, dignity, office, wealth, and profession of religion. This declaration concerning God, as Judge, the Apostle made, to shew the Jews their folly in expecting favour at the judgment, because they had Abraham for their father, and were themselves members of God's Church. Dr. Macknight.

12. For as many as have sinned without law &c.] That is, without the knowledge of a written law, shall receive notwithstanding a just judgment for their sin, as being therein convicted by a law of nature; and as many as have sinned against the written law of God, shall according to that law receive judgment for their sins. Bp. Hall.

13. (For not the hearers of the law are just before God, &c.] That is, not the bare "hearers of the law" shall on that account be "just before God, but the doers of the law shall be justified," that is, accepted of God, as acting suitably to their holy profession. The Jews gloried in, and rested upon, their outward privileges for salvation, because they were Abraham's seed, because they were circumcised, because they were employed in reading and hearing the law; they concluded this sufficient to render them acceptable with God: therefore, says the Apostle, "not the hearers, but doers of the law shall be justified;" that is, shall be the persons, whom God will accept and account righteous for the sake of Christ. Burkitt.

By "the doers of the law" in this place are meant, not those who entirely perform the law of God, which no man can do; but those who are devoted to the law, who meditate upon it, and diligently endeavour that their whole life may be conformed to it. It appears to have been by the special providence of God, that the Apostle here so earnestly recommended good works, as necessary to justification and eternal life: lest from a misconception of his subsequent doctrine, in which he teaches justification by faith without works, the reader should find a stumblingblock, or fall into errour. Bp. Bull.

14. For when the Gentiles, &c.] As if he had said, For if the Gentiles perform the same moral and substantial duties, by their industrious use of the light of reason and nature, that a Jew does by direction of the written law, they are so far a law unto themselves: that is, their own reason and consciences, by which they honestly judge between what is good and evil, lawful and unlawful to be done, is the same moral rule to them, as the written law is to you. Pyle.

best, according to the knowledge vouchsafed them, during the dispensation under which they lived. He, who holds up his hand at the bar of eternal judgment, will not be there tried by a law which he never knew. The Apostle here is express, that the Jews, who have sinned in the law, shall be judged by the law; and the Gentiles, who were without that law, shall be judged by the rule which they had derived in part by tradition from their ancestors, and improved and enlarged by their own reasonings and disquisitions. But then, as the Apostle argues also at large, every man, whether Jew or Gentile, who is tried by a law of works, will in strictness of speaking be cast; because it will be proved against him, that he has broken it. All the world are become guilty before God; and must place their hope in the mercies of that redemption, which is by Christ Jesus. Bp. Horne.

This verse shews, that the Apostle, in what he says of the Gentiles mentioned in the preceding part of this chapter, is speaking of such Gentiles as have not a revealed law. All the ancient Greek commentators interpreted this passage of such Gentiles, as Dr. Whitby hath shewn. Dr. Macknight.

15. — their thoughts the mean while &c.] Rather, their reasonings between, or among, one another. "Between themselves," as in the margin. Parkhurst. Doing those things, whereby they shew the duties of the law to be written in their hearts, their conscience also bearing them witness to it, and their own thoughts or reasonings within themselves at the same time, according to their moral or immoral behaviour, accusing or else excusing, approving or condemning themselves and one another, as their actions are good or bad; according to which they shall be recompensed in the day when God shall judge the secrets of all hearts by Jesus Christ, according to the doctrine of the Gospel, which by the command of God I preach to the world. T. Edwards.

16. In the day when God shall judge &c.] This verse is either to be connected with the twelfth; and so it states, that the rewards and punishments, of which the Apostle has spoken, are to be distributed to Jew and Gentile in the day of judgment. Burkitt, Dr. Whitby. Or it is to be connected with the thirteenth verse, in which connexion it states, that in the day of judgment "not the hearers, but the doers of the law shall be justified." Bp. Bull, Dr. Wells.

—— the secrets of men] That is, of men's hearts, as well as their open actions. Burkitt, Dr. Wells. Their inward moral dispositions and qualifications, in contradistinction to their external and formal profession of religion: agreeably to the 28th and 29th verses. Pyle.

—— according to my gospel.] Or as my Gospel testifies He will: for the heathen are not to be judged according to the tenour of the Gospel, but according to the light of nature, ver. 12. Dr. Whitby. Concerning the phrase "my Gospel," see the note on chap. i. 1.

17. Behold, thou art called a Jew, &c.] The Apostle goes on to prove farther, and illustrate what he said before, as is evident from the words, "Behold, thou" to whom I speak "art called a Jew:" he therefore may be supposed to speak this farther to convince him, that he, doing the same things, shall not escape the judgment of God, and that the hearing of the law, which he doth not practise, will be so far from justifying him before God, that it will add to his condemnation. Dr. Whitby.

19. — of the blind,] The Jewish doctors, in contempt of the Gentiles, always spake of them as persons who were "blind," and "in darkness," and "foolish," and "babes," and boasted of themselves as "guides," to whose direction the Gentiles, in matters of religion, ought implicitly to submit. This boasting of the Jews the Apostle introduced here, to shew that their sins were greatly aggravated by the revelation of which they boasted. Dr. Macknight.

—— which hast the form of knowledge &c.] That is, As having a complete scheme, or draught, of all Divine duties and precepts. Pyle, Dr. Wells.

In these four verses, 17—20, St. Paul makes use of the titles which the Jews assumed to themselves, from the advantages they had of light and knowledge above the Gentiles, to shew them how inexcusable they were in judging the Gentiles, who were even in their own account so much beneath them in knowledge, for doing those things which they themselves were guilty of. Locke.

21. Thou therefore which teachest another, &c.] The Apostle proceeds to the end of this chapter to convince the Jews, that they were in as sinful and wretched a condition as the despised Gentiles, and therefore stood in need of the grace of Jesus Christ to justify them as well as they. And because the Jews were so apt to "rest in" their external privileges, he recounted in the foregoing verses the several privileges which they enjoyed: but here he takes occasion to aggravate their sins committed, because they not only sinned against light and knowledge, against the convictions of their own consciences, and contradicted the dictates of their minds, as the Gentiles did; but besides all this, rebelled against the precepts of the written law, which was all in their hands. Burkitt.

22. — dost thou commit sacrilege?] Thus robbing God of His honour another way. Of all the sins here enumerated the Jewish doctors were notoriously guilty; and of most of them they were accused by our Lord. As first, that "they said and did not," that "they laid heavy burdens upon others which they would not touch with their own fingers," Matt. xxiii. 3, 4. That "they made His Father's house a den of thieves," Matt. xxi. 13; John ii. 16. That they were guilty of adultery by unjust divorces, Matt. xix. 9. And the theft and merchandise, of which they are accused in the above passages, being about holy things, may be well also styled "sacrilege:" though being accused of this sin in the times of the Prophet Malachi, Mal. iii. 8, 9, doubtless they were more guilty of it in these worst of times. Accordingly Josephus pronounces them guilty, not only of "theft, treachery, adultery, sacrilege, but of rapines and murders, and new ways of wickedness invented by them, of all which the temple was made the receptacle." Dr. Whitby.

Agreeably to the passage in Matt. xxiii. 3, 4, the Apostle seems in these expressions to aim particularly at the Scribes and Pharisees: But that the Jewish nation was now generally guilty of the same crimes that the worst of the heathens had been, we learn from Josephus. Pyle.

24. For the name of God is blasphemed &c.] The vices of the Jewish nation are now so scandalous, that you have brought the same contempt upon the Mosaical religion, as was done formerly by David, 2 Sam. xii. 14; and by your forefathers in Ezek. xxxvi. 20, 23. Pyle. See also Isai. lii. 5.

25. For circumcision verily profiteth &c.] Here, as in many other passages, the Apostle speaks to the thoughts of his Jewish readers. Dr. Macknight. The sense is, But ye say, We are circumcised, and have the seal of God's covenant in our flesh. Deceive not yourselves: this is but an idle vaunt: in vain shall ye stand upon the outward ceremony of circumcision, while ye do not regard the truth and substance of that which is signified by it. Did ye live answerably to the law of God, ye might seem to have some reason to boast of your circumcision: but if ye be willing transgressors and violators of the law, your circumcision gives you no privilege above the uncircumcised. Bp. Hall. "Circumcision" is here put for being a Jew, as being one of the chief and most discriminating rites of that people. Locke.

26. Therefore if the uncircumcision &c.] Nay, an honest heathen, that was never received into the Church by circumcision, if he fulfils the moral duties of religion to the best of his natural power, shall be accounted with God as if he were circumcised. Pyle, Bp. Hall.

—— the righteousness of the law,] The word, rendered "righteousness," is in the plural number. It means the precepts or ordinances of the law, whether moral, as in this place; or ceremonial, as in Luke i. 6; Heb. ix. 1, 10. Parkhurst, Dr. Whitby.

27. And shall not uncircumcision which is by nature,] That is, Shall not the Gentile, notwithstanding his natural uncircumcision. Dr. Wells.

—— judge thee,] Rise up in judgment against thee. Bp. Hall. And condemn thee. Dr. Whitby. Be an argument to aggravate thy punishment for transgressing the revealed law of God. Pyle.

—— who by the letter and circumcision dost transgress the law?] Who, notwithstanding the advantage of having the law and circumcision, art a transgressor of the law. Locke.

The sum of these three verses is, that the obedient Gentile shall condemn the disobedient Jew, and be sooner accepted by God, with whom there is no respect of persons, but with respect to their qualifications: that no church privileges, no external prerogatives, nor the highest profession of piety and holiness, without an humble, uniform, and sincere obedience, will be any thing available to salvation. Burkitt.

28. For he is not a Jew, &c.] For in God's account "he is not a Jew," that is, a son of Abraham, to whom the promises appertain, "who is one" only "outwardly;" nor is that "circumcision," in God's account, "which is" only "outward in the flesh." Dr. Wells.

From the institution of the rite of circumcision to the manifestation of the promised Seed, it became to the natural descendants of the patriarch Abraham, what baptism hath been ever since to the spiritual progeny of Him, who is, in a much higher sense, "the Father of us all:" it became the sacrament of initiation into the true Church and faith. Now in a sacrament the outward and visible sign is intended to introduce us to the inward and spiritual grace, figured by it as a sign, conveyed by it as a means, and insured by it as a pledge. What the inward and spiritual grace, signified by circumcision, was, not only St. Paul, but Moses himself will tell us: see Deut. x. 16; and xxx. 6. And could the Jews have read their law without that vail, which infidelity had drawn over the eyes of their understanding, they had then saved an Apostle the trouble of informing them, that "he is not a Jew which is one outwardly," &c. As he is not a Jew, so neither is he a Christian, who is one outwardly; but he is a true Jew, and he is a true Christian, who is so inwardly: from whose heart and members the lust of the flesh, the lust of the eyes, and the pride of life, are cut off; who is dead and buried to sin, and risen again to righteousness. This blessed work, sacramentally shewn forth and begun in baptism, is to be continued through life by the successive renovations of repentance, by daily accessions of knowledge, faith, and charity, carrying on a gradual growth in grace, until it be perfected. Bp. Horne.

Chap. III. In answer to an objection from the Jews, the Apostle shews the advantage of a written and revealed law to the Jewish nation, above the mere law of nature to the Gentiles. But he contends, that by their notorious transgressions of that revealed law, the Jews had rendered themselves equally obnoxious to the Divine wrath with the Gentiles; so that all were upon the same level, and had all one and the same gracious condition of Christ's redemption. Pyle.

Ver. 1. What advantage then hath the Jew?] But you will say, if the uncircumcised person, keeping the righteousness of the law, is to be reckoned as circumcised, chap. ii. 26; and if the inward circumcision be that alone, which is acceptable to God, ver. 28, 29; what advantage then hath the Jew above the Gentile? &c. Dr. Whitby.

2. Much every way: chiefly, &c.] The Apostle in his answer specifies the chief advantage which the Jew enjoyed. Dr. Wells.

—— the oracles of God.] That is, the Holy Scriptures contained in the Old Testament, the sacraments and seals of the covenant, the prophecies and promises of the Messiah, and the whole revelation of the word and will of God. Burkitt.

In Herodotus, Thucydides, Aristophanes, and others of the Greek writers, the word, here rendered "oracles," is used for a Divine speech or answer. Parkhurst.

3. For what if some did not believe? &c.] Here follows a second objection. Some might say, True, the Jews had the oracles of God, but some of them never believed those oracles, nor gave any credit to the promise of the Messiah contained in them: therefore they had no advantage by them. Be it so, saith the Apostle: yet shall the unbelief of some make the faith, or fidelity of God in His promises, of no effect to others? God forbid that such a thought should ever enter into your hearts: but on the contrary let God be acknowledged "true" and faithful to His word, though all men should prove "liars." Burkitt. God is still pleased to stand to His promise made to Abraham: and whatever the perverse behaviour and base returns of mankind may be under the dispensations of Divine mercies or judgments, God is still the same merciful and wise governour. Pyle.

4. God forbid:] In the original, 'May it not be!' It is an emphatical form of deprecating or denying. Parkhurst. See the note on Gal. vi. 14.

—— That thou mightest be justified in thy sayings,] Or mayest appear just and faithful in performing them; "and clear when Thou art judged," that is, when Thou judgest and contendest with any man, or enterest into judgment with him, or accusest him of sin. These words are a confession of David, that how severely soever God should deal with him for his sin, he could not accuse Him of too much rigour, but must justify Him in His proceedings, and clear Him from all imputations of injustice. They are accordingly here brought to shew, that though God should reject the Jews for their infidelity, they would have no reason to complain of His severity, or to charge Him with injustice or unfaithfulness. Dr. Whitby.

5. But if our unrighteousness &c.] A third objection here follows; namely, that if the unrighteousness of men tends so visibly to "commend," that is, to illustrate and recommend, "the righteousness of God," namely, His wisdom, grace, and power, in appointing this way of justification by faith in Christ; how can it be right in God, to punish them for this unrighteousness, which tends so highly to illustrate the glory of the Gospel grace? Burkitt.

—— the righteousness of God,] See the note on chap. i. 17.

—— (I speak as a man)] I, Paul, must be understood to speak what has just been objected, as in the person of an unbelieving Jewish man pleading for himself. Dr. Wells. The phrase "to speak as a man" here means, to speak agreeably to the notions of the persons one is arguing with, and to argue from those notions. Pyle.

6. God forbid: &c.] The Apostle here answers the foregoing objection: God forbid, says he, that we should entertain such a thought, as if God either were, or could be, unrighteous: "for then how shall God judge the world?" Burkitt. The very idea of God's judging the world, implies that it shall be done in righteousness. For, if any person were to have injustice done him on that occasion, it would not be judgment, but a capricious exercise of power, whereby the judge would be dishonoured. In this idea is founded the answer which Abraham made to God, and which the Apostle appears now to have had in his eye. See Gen. xviii. 25. Dr. Macknight.

7, 8. For if the truth of God had more abounded through my lie &c.] The Apostle again speaks in the person of a profane objector. As if he had said, Thus some man may possibly plead for his sin: The truth of God hath gained by my lie; the faithfulness of God is made more manifest by the unfaithfulness of men; therefore why should I be judged and condemned as a sinner, when the glory of God will shine more bright upon the occasion of my sin? The free grace of God discovered in the Gospel will be manifested, say some, and magnified in the pardoning of our sin: let us therefore sin our fill, that the immeasurableness of Divine goodness may appear, and the abundance of pardoning mercy may abound. The Apostle rejects this doctrine and practice, of "doing evil that good may come," with abhorrence and detestation, affirming that "their damnation is just," who either fasten the doctrine upon the Apostles, or advance it themselves. Burkitt.

7. — through my lie] As "truth" signifies also fidelity or faithfulness, so "lie" on the contrary imports also infidelity or unfaithfulness: and it is here used to signify that sin of not making good use of the oracles of God intrusted to the Jews, called their "unbelief," ver. 3, and "unrighteousness," ver. 5. So also ver. 4. "Let God be true, but every man a liar;" that is, the unfaithfulness of men, in neglecting to do their part, doth no way prejudice, but rather commend, the faithfulness of God, in allowing them those mercies, of which they make such ill use. Dr. Hammond.

From Exod. xix. 5—8; as also xxiv. 3—7; Deut. v. 27; and xxvi. 17; it appears that the people solemnly pledged themselves by a vow of obedience, to "do all that the Lord had spoken." Hence the wickedness of the Jews is in several places of the Old Testament, as well as here, denoted by lying; every violation of God's commands being a breach of their promise and covenant, and so a lie. Dr. Wells. The original word is used in no other passage of the New Testament. It signifies every sort of departure from truth, rectitude, and honesty; impiety, wickedness, and crimes of all kinds; and the whole clause appears equivalent to that in the 5th verse, "if our unrighteousness commend the righteousness of God." Schleusner.

8. And not rather, &c.] And why may it not be rather inferred and said, &c. Dr. Wells.

—— whose damnation is just.] For adventuring to do evil that good may come; or for laying these slanders to the Apostle's charge. Burkitt.

Some persons understand this censure of the Apostle with reference to the slanderers; others with reference to that ungodly resolution, "Let us do evil," &c. Both expositions are good. Take it the first way, and the slanderer may read his doom in it: here is his wages, and his portion, and the meed and reward of his slander. Take it in the other sense, with reference to the resolution, "Let us do evil, that good may come;" it teaches us that no pretension of doing it for God's glory, to a good end, or any other colour whatsoever, can excuse those that presume to "do evil;" but that still the evil that they do is damnable, and it is but "just" with God to render "damnation" to them for it. Bp. Sanderson.

9. What then? are we better than they? &c.] To return then to the former objection. If it be asked, What difference is there between Jew and Gentile? I answer, there has been all along a considerable one in respect of the written law: but now under the Gospel, as all are found to be sinners, either against the law of nature, or against that of Moses, all stand equally in need of a Redeemer, all are alike capable of His redemption, and there is no difference at all left. Pyle.

upon the Jews in the second chapter; and upon the Gentiles in the first chapter, ver. 19—32. Dr. Wells.

10. As it is written, &c.] These Scriptures are collected from different parts of the Old Testament; but there are many editions of the Septuagint Greek, in which they all stand together in the fourteenth Psalm. Dr. Doddridge.

It is not necessary, in order to make good the Apostle's words or argument, that this passage should be spoken of the Jews of that age in general, especially seeing that they are there said to have "devoured God's people," and to have "shamed the counsel of the poor." It is enough, that they should generally agree to the Jews of the age, in which the Apostle wrote, as both the Scriptures of the New Testament and the writings of Josephus fully prove they do. And that the law, condemning any for these crimes, doth more especially condemn those under the law, who are at any time guilty of crimes, thus noted and condemned by the law. Dr. Whitby.

19. —what things soever the law saith,] The foregoing quotations, although taken from the Psalms, being called sayings of the law, it is evident that "the law" here denotes the whole body of the Jewish Scriptures. Dr. Macknight.

—— may become guilty before God.] That is, 'subject,' or 'liable, to punishment from God.' Parkhurst. Liable to the Divine justice. Abp. Tillotson.

In the first chapter of this Epistle St. Paul gives a dreadful description of the heathen world, so bent to sin, that they were abandoned to it, given up to vile affections and a reprobate mind. He tells us elsewhere, that "all have sinned; all the world is guilty before God; the Scripture hath concluded all under sin." The writers of the Old Testament give the same account: "There is none that doeth good, no, not one. There is not a just man that doeth good, and sinneth not." The Pagans give the same account. St. Paul's contemporary Seneca complains, that every one has sinned more or less: that there is not a man to be found, who could acquit himself; that the misfortune of human nature is such, that there is a natural love of sinning: and he informs us, not only what men were at that time, but that heretofore they had sinned, and would continue to do so as long as they lived. All history and philosophy attest this truth: all laws, precepts, and government suppose it. But the strongest, unhappiest proof of all is, that every one of us knows it by experience; and "if we say that we have no sin, we deceive ourselves, and the truth is not in us," 1 John i. 8. Was the case otherwise, we should have no occasion for, no interest in, a Saviour: the end of His coming was "to save sinners:" they are the object of His mercy, and all men are the object of His mercy, for "the grace of God that bringeth salvation hath appeared to all men:" and the Gospel, the good tidings of peace and salvation, is commanded to be preached in all the world "to every creature." Dr. Glocester Ridley.

20. Therefore by the deeds of the law &c.] The Apostle here draws his conclusion from what he before premised concerning both Jew and Gentile: namely, that "by the works," whether moral or ceremonial, "of the law," considered in contradistinction to the Gospel, and so exclusive of the grace of God in Christ, "shall no flesh," Jew no more than Gentile, "be justified in the sight of God." Bp. Bull, Dr. Wells.

—— be justified] God's justifying us doth solely, or chiefly, import His acquitting us from guilt, condemnation, and punishment, by free pardon and remission of our sins, accounting us and dealing with us as just persons, upright and innocent in His sight and esteem. Dr. Isaac Barrow.

The original verb, here rendered "shall be justified," is most usually applied to evangelical justification; and signifies to justify, to esteem, pronounce, or declare just or righteous; that is, to acquit or absolve from past offences, and accept, as just, to the reward of righteousness. In this view it is plainly a forensick term, or a term belonging to courts of judicature, answering to the Hebrew word, for which the Seventy have used it in Deut. xxv. 1; 1 Kings viii. 32; 2 Chron. vi. 23; Isai. v. 23: and other places. Compare Prov. xvii. 15. It is in the New Testament applied either to present justification in this life, Acts xiii. 39; Rom. v. 1, 9; viii. 33; 1 Cor. vi. 11; Tit. iii. 7, &c. or to final justification at the last day, Matt. xii. 37; compare Rom. ii. 13. Parkhurst.

That the word is here taken in a forensick or judiciary sense is manifest, both from the phrase with which it is connected, and which signifies, 'in the sight, judgment, or estimation, of God:' and also from Ps. cxliii. 2, evidently alluded to by the Apostle, where David most humbly prays that he may not fall under the strict judgment of God. This passage is particularly to be observed, because it clearly shews what the Apostle meant by justification in the whole of his argument concerning faith and works. Bp. Bull.

—— for by the law] Namely, by the law thus considered in opposition to the Gospel, (Dr. Wells,) "is the knowledge of sin;" its chief efficacy is to discover sin, and condemn us for sinning. By "the law" here we are to understand both the natural and the written law. Burkitt. The term signifies law in general; and comprehends the law written on man's heart, Rom. ii. 15, as well as the law of Moses; for by both "is the knowledge of sin." Dr. Macknight. And, that it comprehends natural as well as revealed law, appears from the conclusion which the apostle draws, and from the whole tenour of his subsequent argument; which would have very little weight, if there were room to object, that although we cannot be justified by our obedience to the law of Moses, yet we may be justified by our obedience to God's natural law. Dr. Doddridge.

Also, by "the law" and "the deeds of the law" are to be understood both ceremonial and moral law, especially the latter; for "by the" moral "law is the knowledge of sin:" it is the moral law that forbids theft, adultery, and the like. Besides it is evident, that the opposition runs all along, not between ceremonial and moral works, but between works in general, and faith, ver. 20, 22; between the law of works, and the law of faith, ver. 27; chap. iv. 2, 6; ix. 32; x. 5, 6. Burkitt, Dr. Whitby.

27 Where is boasting then? It is excluded. By what law? of works? Nay: but by the law of faith.

21. But now the righteousness of God &c.] The Apostle, having proved negatively, that by the works of the law justification is not to be had for any person, whether Jew or Gentile, comes now to prove the affirmative part of his assertion; namely, that God hath manifested another way of justification in the Gospel, that is to say, by faith in Jesus Christ. Burkitt. See the note on chap. i. 17.

—— without the law] That is, without the observance of the law, in the sense above mentioned, as contradistinguished from the grace of God in the Gospel. Dr. Wells, Bp. Bull.

—— being witnessed by the law and the prophets;] The example of Abram's justification by faith, recorded Gen. xv. 6; and the passage, which the Apostle quotes Rom. iv. 6—8, from Ps. xxxii. 1, 2; as well as that from Habakkuk quoted Rom. i. 17; are clear testimonies from the law and the Prophets, that there is a righteousness without law which God accepts; and that the method of justification, revealed in the Gospel, is the method in which men were justified under the law, and before the law; in short, it is the method of justifying sinners established from the very beginning of the world. Dr. Macknight.

22. — by faith of Jesus Christ] The way of justifying men by faith in Christ, or by that course, which is now prescribed us by Christ. Dr. Hammond.

—— for there is no difference:] Between Jew and Gentile, as to their manner of justification. Dr. Whitby.

23. — come short of the glory of God;] That is, come short of meriting by their own works to be partakers of "the glory of God" in heaven. Dr. Wells. Locke explains "the glory of God" to mean, 'that glory, which God hath appointed for the righteous:' and Dr. Whitby understands it of 'the fruition of God in glory.' But from a comparison of this passage with John v. 44, and xii. 43, where the same word is rendered "honour" and "praise," which is here rendered "glory," Dr. Macknight is of opinion, that the phrase in this place might very well be translated 'the praise' or 'approbation of God.' Parkhurst.

24. Being justified freely] Gratuitously, as a free gift. Parkhurst. Not claiming it by any merit or work of ours. Schleusner. Freely as to the motive of it, namely, by God's mere grace or favour; and as to the meritorious cause, through the redemption that is in Jesus Christ. Dr. Wells.

—— through the redemption] Purchased by the death and blood of Christ shed for us: we having "redemption through His blood, the forgiveness of sins," Eph. i. 7; Col. i. 14. Dr. Whitby. The original word denotes that kind of redemption of a captive from death, which is procured by paying a price for his life. Dr. Macknight.

25. — a propitiation] The original word is properly an adjective, signifying 'propitiatory,' and agreeing with the substantive 'lid' or 'cover' understood, which is expressed by the Seventy in their version of Exod. xxv. 17, where the cover of the ark is called 'a propitiatory cover;' because it was the throne on which the glory of the Lord received the atonement, made by the high priest on the day of expiation, and from which God dispensed pardon to the people. In allusion to this ancient worship, the Apostle represents Christ as 'a propitiatory' or "mercy-seat," set forth by God for receiving the worship of men, and dispensing pardon to them. Or if 'a propitiatory' is, by a common figure, put for a propitiatory sacrifice, the Apostle's meaning will be, that, by the appointment of God, Christ died as a sacrifice for sin, and that God pardons sin through the merit of that sacrifice. Hence Christ is called "a propitiation," 1 John ii. 2; iv. 10. Parkhurst, Dr. Macknight.

—— through faith in his blood,] This expression is found no where else in Scripture. But the Apostle's meaning is sufficiently plain, namely, that God dispenses pardon to all who have "faith in Christ's blood," as shed for the remission of sin; who trust to the merit of that sacrifice for the pardon of their sin; who approach God with reverence and confidence through the mediation of Christ; and who, discerning with admiration the virtues which Christ exercised in His sufferings, endeavour to imitate them. This appears to be "faith in His blood." Dr. Macknight.

—— for the remission of sins that are past,] That is, even of those sins which were committed before Christ's coming in the flesh, the expiation whereof could not be made by any legal sacrifices, but only by His oblation and death, which was prefigured thereby. Bp. Hall, Dr. Macknight.

Or rather, as "the righteousness of God" always signifies in these Epistles our justification by faith in Christ; (see the note on chap. i. 17;) "His righteousness," here spoken of, cannot be demonstrated, as some suppose, by winking at the sins committed in former ages, but by proposing by the Gospel the way of remitting men's past sins through faith in Christ. Dr. Whitby. The Apostle speaks of those sins, whereby Jews as well as Gentiles had polluted themselves formerly, that is, before their conversion to the Christian religion. Schleusner.

26. — that he might be just,] That is, might appear to do nothing inconsistent with His own Divine justice in thus remitting or passing over sins, inasmuch as Christ has made satisfaction for them by His blood. Drs. Whitby and Wells.

—— the justifier of him which believeth in Jesus.] Religion, as it stood under the Old Testament, is perpetually styled "the fear of God:" under the New, "faith in Christ." But as that "fear of God" does not signify literally being afraid of Him, but having a good heart, and leading a good life, in consequence of such fear; so this "faith in Christ," does not signify literally believing in Him, in the sense in which that word is used in common language, but becoming His real disciples in consequence of such belief. Bp. Butler.

By the faith, which is said to justify and to save, we are to understand that lively "faith which worketh by love," Gal. v. 6; which purifieth the heart; which keepeth the commandments of God. Bp. Tomline.

27. Where is boasting then?] The boasting, or glorying, here spoken of, is the contempt which the Jews had of the Gentiles; (Locke;) and the self-confidence, wherewith men are naturally prone to glory in any excellence, either real or supposed, belonging to themselves. Burkitt.

As if he had said, And if this be now the general and only condition offered to us all, what becomes of all your insulting triumphs over the Gentile world? Pyle. Nay, what cause of boasting can any of us have in ourselves, whether Jews or Gentiles? if Gentiles, in our civil justice? and if Jews, in our just works? Surely, none at all. All boasting is utterly excluded. But how, or upon what ground, is our boasting excluded? Surely not upon the ground of our works; for, if by our works we could fulfil the law, we should have cause of boasting in ourselves: but upon the ground of faith; for now that we are justified thereby, upon the free acceptation of God, we have no cause to boast in ourselves, but in Him alone. Bp. Hall. The Gospel excludes boasting, because the very constitution of it requires persons to acknowledge themselves sinners; and, as guilty and indigent, to make an humble application to the free mercy of God in Christ for pardon, and every other blessing, which is necessary to their final happiness. Dr. Doddridge. The course, which the Divine wisdom has taken to humble man, and cut off from him all occasion of boasting, is by denying him justification by his own works, and ordaining that the meritorious cause of justification should lie, not in himself, but in another. Burkitt.

—— the law of faith.] The Gospel, or Gospel method of justification, is called "the law of faith," as opposed to "the law of works." Parkhurst. The term "law," as denoting the Christian religion, appears to have been so used by the Apostles for the sake of the Jews, to whom, as being accustomed to that term, it was probable that the Gospel would be thereby more easily recommended. See Rom. viii. 2; ix. 31; Gal. ii. 19; v. 23; Jam. iv. 11; Gal. vi. 2; Jam. i. 25; ii. 12. Schleusner.

28. Therefore we conclude &c.] The sum or result therefore of this discourse is, that by this evangelical way the favour of God is to be had for those, who never had to do with the Judaical law, circumcision, &c. Dr. Hammond. See the concluding note on this chapter, from Bp. Bull.

29. Is he the God of the Jews only? &c.] For otherwise it would follow, that God hath care or consideration for no other part of the world, but only for the Jews, which certainly is not true; for He is the God of the Gentiles also. Dr. Hammond.

30. Seeing it is one God, &c.] The force of St. Paul's reasoning here must be sought from Zech. xiv. 9; where the Prophet, speaking of the time when the Lord shall be King over all the earth, and not barely over the little people shut up in the land of Canaan, says, "in that day there shall be one Lord;" that is, God shall not be, as He now is, the God of the Jews alone, whom only He hath known of all the people of the earth; but He shall be the God of the Gentiles also, the same merciful, reconciled God to the people of all nations. This prophecy the Jews understood of the times of the Messiah, and the Apostle here presses them with it. Locke.

—— by faith, — through faith.] It appears that these two phrases are equivalent; signifying that both Jews and Gentiles have one and the same method of justification. Hardy.

31. Do we then make void the law through faith?] Do we contradict it, or say it is an useless thing, or against the promises? Gal. iii. 19, 21. Dr. Whitby.

—— yea, we establish the law.] Forasmuch as we shew, that this our doctrine is witnessed by the law itself, ver. 21; and that the law is our schoolmaster to bring us to Christ, who is the end of the law, Gal. iii. 24; Rom. x. 4. Moreover our doctrine differs from the law, rightly understood, only as the substance does from its shadow: we preach Christ, the true propitiatory mercy-seat, ver. 25, typified by that under the law: we preach spiritual circumcision, or purity of heart, chap. ii. 29, typified by the circumcision of the flesh. And as the legal types were fulfilled by the coming of Christ the Antitype, so the moral part of the law was raised to the highest degree of perfection and obligation by Christ, and incorporated into His own law: and consequently what our Saviour says, Matt. v. 17, is most true, namely, that He "came not to destroy the law, but to fulfil it;" and also, as is here said, to "establish" the moral and spiritual part of it, by making it of perpetual obligation. Dr. Wells.

St. Peter hath long ago observed, that in the Epistles of his brother Apostle St. Paul, there are "some things hard to be understood," which the ignorant and unlearned did in his time, as indeed there are some such that still do so in our time, "wrest to their own destruction," 2 Pet. iii. 16. And he seems in that place to have a special reference to St. Paul's Epistle to the Romans, which indeed hath more of those difficult passages, than any other of his Epistles. Such is his discourse of justification by faith without works, which runs through the Epistle: which was abused even in the apostolical age to a dangerous kind of Solifidianism by the Gnostick hereticks, against whose perverse interpretation St. James afterwards wrote his Epistle as an antidote. And indeed St. Paul himself expounds his meaning in another Epistle very plainly to the same purpose: "In Jesus Christ neither circumcision availeth any thing, nor uncircumcision; but faith which worketh by love," Gal. v. 6. From whence it is evident, that by the faith, to which he attributes justification, he means not an idle faith, but a working faith, attended with works of love, both towards God and our neighbour; and consequently, that the works which he excludes from justification are not evangelical works, or such as are done in and proceed from faith in Christ; but only, 1st, works of perfect obedience or sinless works, there being none such to be found among the sons of fallen man; or, 2dly, works done in the strength of the Mosaick law, without the grace of the Gospel; or, 3dly, the works of the ceremonial law, such as circumcision, sacrifice, and the like; or, 4thly, and lastly, all manner of works whatsoever, as far as they are relied on as meritorious causes of our justification or salvation; there being but one only cause of that kind, namely, the meritorious obedience and sufferings of our dear Redeemer and Saviour Jesus Christ. Bp. Bull.

Chap. IV. In the close of the foregoing chapter, the Apostle laid down a positive and peremptory conclusion, that "a man is justified by faith without the deeds of the law." In this chapter he undertakes to confirm and establish the truth of that conclusion, by instancing in the patriarch Abraham, "the father of the faithful." Burkitt.

Ver. 1. What shall we then say &c.] As if the Apostle had said, What shall we say? Shall any one affirm, that Abraham our father found or obtained righteousness, by, or according to, the flesh? that is, by being circumcised in the flesh, or by any works of righteousness which he had done? Surely no. Burkitt. This affirmative interrogation is in effect a negation; and so the meaning is, This cannot with any reason be affirmed by any. Dr. Hammond.

—— as pertaining to the flesh, hath found?] Rather, 'hath found according to the flesh.' This is the proper order of the words, and so they stand in the original. Dr. Hammond.

The word "flesh" is frequently opposed in the New Testament to the Divine revelation, grace, or spirit; see Matt. xvi. 17; Gal. i. 16: and the phrase 'according to the flesh,' in this place means works done by a man's own natural strength, unassisted by Divine grace. Bp. Bull. Or blameless and meritorious performances, abstracted from the mercy and gracious acceptance of God. Thus it is equivalent to "works" in the next verse. Possibly however the phrase 'according to the flesh,' refers also to circumcision, which the Apostle proceeds to notice in the ninth verse. Dr. Hammond.

2. For if Abraham &c.] The case of Abraham is here considered, 1st, as to his natural state or life before his call, ver. 2—8; and 2dly, as to his circumcision after his call, 9th and following verses. Dr. Wells.

These words contain the reason of the negative in the preceding verse. If Abraham had been justified by any thing in himself, or by any innocence or performances of his own, he might then be said to have somewhat to glory of, his justification being an effect of his performances, and not of the free grace of God: see chap. iii. 27. But it is certain that Abraham, whatever praise he may have merited before men, had nothing whereof to glory before God. Therefore he was not justified by his works. Bp. Bull, Dr. Hammond.

Not as if Abraham's faith had no good works; or that these works, flowing from faith, were not acceptable to God: but his faith here is opposed to legal works, such as are done before or without faith, and without the covenant of grace; as appears from what goes before, chap. iii. 28; and from what follows in this chapter, ver. 10, 13—15. But yet his faith in some sense may be opposed to works also flowing from faith, if we consider their imperfection: they being not so continually and perfectly righteous, as entirely without sinning at any time to keep the law, and claim a meritorious justification by it. See Jam. iii. 2. But so neither are we justified by faith meritoriously. But these works of the faithful, as they follow faith, so they follow the first justification which is here spoken of by the Apostle. Bp. Fell.

3. For what saith the scripture? Abraham believed God,] He believed what God told him, Gen. xv. 5, that he should have a seed as numerous as the stars. The Apostle mentions only this one instance of Abraham's faith, because Moses had said of it in particular, that the Lord "counted it to him for righteousness." But we must not on that account think it the only act of faith that was so counted to him. His faith consisted in an habitual disposition to believe and obey God, founded on just conceptions of His being and attributes. And he began to exercise it, when God first called him to leave his native country. "For by faith he went out, not knowing whither he went," Heb. xi. 8. The same faith he exercised through the whole course of his life, acting on every occasion as one will do, whose mind is filled with a present sense of Deity. Of this, the instance mentioned by the Apostle is a great example. For in the eightieth year of his age, and when Sarah was seventy years old, he believed what God told him concerning the numerousness of his seed, though it was at that time contrary to the ordinary course of nature. Nay, he continued to believe it from that time forth, for the space of twenty years, during which no child was given him. At length, in the hundredth year of his age, the son so long promised was born. But mark what happened! when this son, to whom all the promises were limited, became fourteen years old, God commanded Abraham to offer him up as a burnt offering; and he, without hesitation, obeyed; firmly believing, that after he was burnt to ashes on the altar, God could raise him from the dead, Heb. xi. 19. By this, and other instances, Abraham became so remarkable for his faith, that God, by a covenant, constituted him the father of all believers, and promised to him, as their federal head, that their faith in like manner should be counted to them for righteousness. Dr. Macknight.

It is especially to be noticed in this place, that the Apostle opposes the faith of Abraham, not to all his works whatsoever, even such as proceeded from faith, for those are comprehended in his faith, as the fruit in its seed; but only to those works, which he performed "according to the flesh," that is, by his natural strength, before the grace of God was imparted to him. Bp. Bull.

4. Now to him that worketh &c.] That is, who by his own strength, without the grace of God, obeys God and fulfils righteousness. Bp. Bull. Or, who by his perfect innocence and blamelessness can call upon God to reward and crown his virtues. Dr. Hammond.

5. But to him that worketh not, but believeth] The phrase is not to be understood absolutely, but with some qualification: for he that believeth worketh. Burkitt. It means him who seeks to obtain justification, not by his own original innocence and blamelessness, but by believing that pardon will be granted to sinners upon their repentance, and by thereupon reforming and giving himself up to do whatsoever God would now have him do; whereupon God accepts him of His mere mercy. Dr. Hammond. Him, who worketh, not of himself, but by faith in the gracious revelation of God. Bp. Bull.

—— that justifieth the ungodly,] Justification being only the pardon of their past sins, on account of that faith, which laid the highest obligation upon all believers to die unto sin for the future, there is no absurdity in saying, that God thus "justifieth the ungodly," when they repent, and engage to cease from, their ungodliness. Dr. Whitby.

—— his faith is counted for righteousness.] His faith is accepted of God's mere mercy, and he is absolved from his past sins, and is himself accepted as righteous to life eternal. Dr. Hammond, Parkhurst.

6. Even as David also &c.] Agreeable to which is that description of blessedness in David, Ps. xxxii.: that they are blessed whom the Lord, out of His free grace and pardon of sin, accepteth and accounteth as righteous; and not for any merit of their own performances. Dr. Hammond. The Apostle mentions David, probably as the other great person, to whom God promised a blessing to all nations through his seed. See Isai. xi. 10; Acts ii. 30; xiii. 23. Dr. Whitby. Hereby appears the conformity between God's manner of pardoning or justifying men under the Gospel, and that which was understood to prevail while the law was in force. Pyle, Dean Stanhope.

7. — Blessed are they whose iniquities are forgiven, &c.] Blessed are they, not who never sinned at all, who were never in a wicked or wrong course; but who, having been sinners, have reformed, and found place of repentance and of mercy upon reformation, merely by the forgiveness and pardon of God. Dr. Hammond.

8. Blessed is the man to whom the Lord will not impute sin.] It immediately follows, "and in whose spirit there is no guile." So in the 5th verse, "I acknowledged my sin unto Thee, and mine iniquity have I not hid. I said I will confess my transgressions unto the Lord; and Thou forgavest the iniquity of my sin." Whence it is plain, that sincerity of heart and confession of sins are expressly required in order to that "blessedness" and "forgiveness of sins," of which the Psalmist speaks; and consequently that they are not meant to be excluded, by what the Apostle says of the justification of "him that worketh not." To practise with God's assistance repentance, and the works which belong to it, is necessary to the justification of a sinner. Dr. Grabe.

9 Cometh this blessedness then upon the circumcision only, or upon the uncircumcision also? for we say that faith was reckoned to Abraham for righteousness.

10 How was it then reckoned? when he was in circumcision, or in uncircumcision? Not in circumcision, but in uncircumcision.

11 And he received the sign of circumcision, a seal of the righteousness of the faith which he had yet being uncircumcised: that he might be the father of all them that believe, though they be not circumcised; that righteousness might be imputed unto them also:

17 (As it is written, [a] I have made thee [a] Gen. 17. 5.

9. Cometh this blessedness then upon the circumcision &c.] Here the Apostle moves the question, whether the forementioned "blessedness" of pardon of sin and justification by faith belongs to the circumcised Jews only, or to the uncircumcised Gentiles also? The question carries with it the force of a strong affirmation, that, seeing faith was imputed to Abraham for righteousness many years before he was circumcised; therefore the uncircumcised Gentiles, as well as the circumcised Jews, should by faith be made partakers of the same blessedness. Burkitt.

10. — Not in circumcision, but in uncircumcision.] Abraham was not circumcised till he was ninety-nine years old, Gen. xvii. 24. At that time Ishmael was thirteen years old, ver. 25. But before Ishmael was born, Abraham's faith was counted to him for righteousness, Gen. xv. 6; compared with chap. xvi. 16. It is evident therefore, that Abraham was justified in uncircumcision, more than thirteen years before he and his family were made the visible Church and people of God by circumcision. Dr. Macknight.

11, 12. And he received the sign of circumcision, &c.] Nevertheless circumcision had its uses, particularly these two. 1st, It was a sign of the faith and obedience, which was the righteousness on Abraham's part, figured by it. 2dly, It was a visible testimony and assurance of Abraham's being in covenant with God: a covenant grounded, not on this rite, but in God's acceptance of that faith, which was antecedent to this rite. And thus Abraham was qualified to be the father, the common pattern of all the faithful: of the Gentiles, or those who were never circumcised, as he had not been himself, when accepted for his faith; and of the Jews, who are his children, not by virtue of the mere sign, but by imitation of that faith and obedience, signified by it. Dean Stanhope.

11. — a seal] Circumcision is so called, because seals were used for confirmation or attestation. See 1 Cor. ix. 2. Parkhurst.

—— of the righteousness of the faith] God ordered Abraham to put the sign or mark of circumcision on his own body, as God's seal, whereby the counting his faith for righteousness, and the constituting him the father of all believers, were confirmed to him. Hence, Gal. iii. 14, faith counted for righteousness, is called "the blessing of Abraham," and is said to "come on the Gentiles through Christ." For the same purpose, God ordered all Abraham's male descendants to be circumcised on the eighth day after their birth. The Israelitish children being thus early initiated into God's covenant, their parents were thereby assured, that if, when grown up, they followed Abraham in his faith and obedience, they were, like him, to have their faith counted to them for righteousness, and be entitled to all the blessings of the covenant: or, if they died in infancy, that God would raise them from the dead, to enjoy the heavenly country, of which the earthly was the type. Dr. Macknight.

13.—the heir of the world,] Of those privileges and blisses, which he, and they after him, should inherit. Dean Stanhope. Of the blessings pertaining both to this world and that which is to come: see 1 Cor. iii. 21; 1 Tim. iv. 8. Dr. Wells. Specifically, of the eternal world, of that better and heavenly country, which Abraham and his seed were to inherit, and which was typified by the earthly Canaan. See Heb. xi. 14, 16. Dr. Hammond, Bp. Bull, Burkitt, Parkhurst, Dr. Macknight.

—— to Abraham, or to his seed,] To Abraham and his posterity. Dr. Hammond. The disjunctive particle has here the sense of the copulative, and is so translated in the Syriack version. Dr. Macknight.

—— but through the righteousness of faith.] Or grace of the Gospel. Dr. Wells, Bp. Bull. By this other evangelical way of new obedience, without having observed the law of Moses, without being circumcised. Dr. Hammond.

14. For if they which are of the law be heirs, &c.] For if that inheritance were made over to the Jews upon their being circumcised and observing the Mosaical law; then, as faith, or this evangelical way of justifying sinners, is vanished on one side, so the promise itself, which belongs not to the Jews only, but to all Abraham's seed, ver. 12, is vanished also. Dr. Hammond.

15. Because the law worketh wrath: &c.] Here the Apostle gives the reason, why no justification can be expected by the law; namely, because it condemns rather than justifies. Burkitt. As if he had said, For the law is so far from tending to justify us, that on the contrary it only gives us the knowledge of sin, without grace or power to avoid it, and so only "worketh wrath:" instead of justifying us, it renders us more obnoxious to the Divine wrath, than we should have been without it: "for where no law is, there is no transgression," and consequently no provocation of the wrath of God. Dr. Wells.

16. Therefore it is of faith,] Whence it necessarily follows, that it, namely, the promise of reward, (ver. 13,) justification, &c. must have been made in respect of faith, and not founded upon the merit of any performances. Dr. Hammond.

—— that it might be by grace;] So as to be a purely gracious dispensation. Pyle.

The Apostle here assigns a double cause, why the wisdom of God has appointed justification and salvation to be obtained in the way of faith: 1st, That it might be of free and undeserved grace and favour; for to be justified by faith and by grace are with the Apostle the same thing: and 2dly, that "the promise might be sure to all the seed;" that is, that God's promise might stand sure to all the believing seed of Abraham, not only to all the children of the flesh, to whom the law was given, but to the children of his faith, even Gentiles as well as Jews, he being the father of all that believe, whether Jews or Gentiles. Burkitt.

as in the margin, means the several nations of the world; and accordingly those texts are to be understood of Abraham in a spiritual sense, as he was regarded by God in the light of the common father of all believers, whether Jews or Gentiles. As for the numerousness of Abraham's natural posterity, that is particularly and distinctly promised in the following verse, "And I will make thee exceeding fruitful, and I will make," not the multitude of nations, but only "nations of thee," which was verified by the nations of the Ishmaelites, Midianites, Edomites, and Israelites, and others. It is of this last promise that the Apostle is to be understood, ver. 18—22. For it was in respect of Abraham's natural posterity, that it was said, "So shall thy seed be," as appears from Gen. xv. 2—5; as also in this respect it is related in the following verse, that "he believed, and the Lord counted it to him for righteousness." Dr. Wells.

——before him whom he believed,] That is, in the presence or sight of Him. Parkhurst. The construction seems plainly to be this: 'The father of us all, in God's esteem, in whom he believed.' Pyle.

——even God, who quickeneth the dead,] This being an instance of the faith of Abraham, it seems most reasonable to refer it to the object of his faith, namely, that he should have a numerous seed, yea, that he should have the promised seed from Sarah, though her womb was dead. Dr. Whitby.

——and calleth those things which be not] That is, the Gentiles, which were not then a people, "as though they were." "Things which be not," in the language both of the Old Testament, and of the Jews, and of the primitive Christians, signify the Gentiles. Burkitt, Dr. Whitby. Or, "those things which be not" may be understood of Isaac, who was called by name before he had a being. T. Edwards.

18. Who against hope believed in hope,] When by the course of nature he saw no hope of his having children, he had nevertheless a strong hope, a firm faith and trust in the promise and power of God. Pyle, Burkitt.

19. And being not weak in faith,] That is, being strong in faith: for the Hebrews, when they meant to assert a thing strongly, did it by the denial of its contrary. Dr. Macknight. The Divine promise, made by the God of nature, induced him justly to lay aside all objections arising from natural impossibilities, and to pay the utmost honour to his Creator by a rational and full confidence in His infinite power and absolute veracity. Pyle.

22. And therefore] Namely, because of such its strength or greatness, "it," that is, his faith, "was imputed to him for righteousness." Dr. Wells.

23. Now it was not written for his sake alone, &c.] The Apostle, having in the former part of the chapter declared the manner of our justification from the instance of Abraham; lest we should think that it was Abraham's personal privilege, and did not concern us, applies the example in the following verses. Burkitt. As if he had said, This is recorded for our instruction, to teach us how God will reward us, if we, like Abraham, believe on Him, without doubt or dispute, in other things of the like or greater difficulty, such as the raising of Christ from the dead. This was wrought by God for us and all mankind, Gentiles as well as Jews; and our belief of it is now absolutely required, to fit us to receive and obey Him, who is thus wonderfully testified to be the Saviour of the world. And that receiving and obeying of Him will now be sufficient to justify us, without the observation of the Mosaical law, as Abraham's faith was sufficient to justify him, before he was circumcised. Dr. Hammond.

25. Who was delivered for our offences, and was raised again for our justification.] For to this end was both the death and resurrection of Christ designed. He died as our surety, to obtain for us release and pardon, to make expiation for our sins past, and to deliver us from the punishment due to them. He rose again from the dead, to open to us the gates of a celestial life, and insure us the like glorious resurrection, 1 Cor. xv. 16, 17, 20. And in order to our receiving this joyful benefit of His resurrection, other special advantages result from His rising again; which was effected, partly to convince the unbelieving world, and so to bring them to the faith; partly to withdraw us from our sins; to bring us to new life by the example of His resurrection and by the mission of His Spirit; and so to help us to actual justification, which is had, not upon the death of Christ, but upon our coming in to the faith and performing the condition required of us, sincere obedience to Christ's commandments.

So that as the faith of Abraham, which was here said to be imputed to him for righteousness, was the believing of God's promise, and the relying without scruple on His all-sufficient power and infallible veracity and fidelity, for the performance of what He promised; containing in it also by analogy a belief of all other His Divine attributes, and affirmations, and promises, and a practice agreeable to this belief: so the faith, that shall be imputed to our justification, is the believing on God in the same latitude that he did; the walking uprightly before Him; the acknowledging of His power, His veracity, and all other His attributes; the believing of whatsoever He hath affirmed, or promised, or revealed to us concerning Himself; particularly His raising of Jesus from the dead, whom by that means He hath set forth to us to be our Lord, to be obeyed in all His commands with a faith, which sinks down into our hearts, and brings forth in our lives, as it did in that of Abraham, actions agreeable and proportionable to our faith. Dr. Hammond.

Chap. V. The Apostle begins this chapter with declaring the blessed effects and advantages which flow from justification by faith in our Lord Jesus Christ. He thence proceeds to shew more particularly, that this gracious and merciful condition of salvation by the Gospel is offered to the Gentiles as well as the Jews. He argues that Christ's death redeemed all sinners, therefore all have eternal life in Him. He states the analogy between Adam and Christ; and contends that the merits of the one must be as extensive to save, as the sin of the other was to condemn: nay, that they are intrinsecally more available to salvation. Burkitt, Pyle.

Ver. 1. Therefore being justified by faith, &c.] By this faith therefore it is, that as many as sincerely embrace the Gospel are freely pardoned and accepted by God in Christ; and, being so, they are reconciled unto God through our Lord Jesus Christ, and, though they have formerly been Gentiles, need not the performances of the law of Moses to give them admission to the Church of Christ. Dr. Hammond.

2. By whom also we have access &c.] Rather, we have had introduction or admittance, &c. Drs. Wells and Macknight. Nay, by Him we have already received, by faith only, not by virtue of those performances, admission to these privileges, to this evangelical estate, wherein now we stand, and have done for some time; having a confident assurance that God, who hath dealt thus graciously with us, will, if we be not wanting on our part, make us hereafter partakers of His glory: and this is matter of present rejoicing to us. Dr. Hammond.

3. — we glory in tribulations also:] That is, such trials and persecutions, as befell them for the profession of the Gospel. Burkitt. The Jews might object to the persecuted condition of Christians, as we know they did to that of their Master, as inconsistent with what they concluded would be the state of the people of the Messiah. It is therefore with great propriety, that the Apostle so often discourses on the benefit arising from the sufferings of true believers, by which he advances the strongest answer to any such insinuation. This delicacy of address is very apparent in many passages of the Epistles. Dr. Doddridge.

—— knowing &c.] St. Paul having said that the true Christian "glories in tribulation," proceeds immediately to shew, that he does so not without good reason: and the illustration of this reason carries him to take notice of the great love of God, and the ardent hope which the true Christian thereby has of salvation: after which he returns in the eleventh verse to the point which he had in hand, namely, that in which the true Christian glories. And as, having said ver. 2, "we rejoice in hope of the glory of God," he adds, ver. 3, "and not only so, but we glory in tribulations also;" so he adds again in the last place, ver. 11, "And not only so, but we also joy in God." Hence it appears, that all from "knowing" in the third verse, to the end of the tenth, is to be understood best as a parenthesis. It is the same verb, which is rendered "rejoice" in the second verse; "glory" in the third; and "joy" in the eleventh. Dr. Wells.

4. And patience, experience;] "Experience" both of our own sincerity towards God, and of His power and protection over us. Patient suffering gives full proof of us. Pyle. The word, rendered "experience," means 'proof,' 'trial;' properly of metals by fire, to examine their purity; figuratively, of men's faith, by afflictions and patience. Parkhurst.

—— and experience, hope:] As without patience we could have no way of exploring or trying ourselves touching our sincerity; so, without this trial and approbation of our sincerity, we could have no safe ground of hope, which is only grounded on God's promises, and those made only to the faithful, sincere, constant Christians. Dr. Hammond.

5. And hope maketh not ashamed;] Which hope, being thus grounded, will never fail us. It is impossible we should ever be ashamed or repent of having thus hoped, and adhered to Christ. Dr. Hammond.

—— because the love of God is shed abroad in our hearts &c.] That is, the sense and comfortable assurance of that love, wherewith God embraceth us. Bp. Hall.

—— is shed abroad] Or "poured out" on our hearts. Dr. Hammond. The original word is commonly used in the New Testament, when speaking of the effusion of the Holy Ghost, Acts ii. 17; x. 45; Tit. iii. 6; and it is taken from Joel ii. 28, 29. Wherefore as the Apostle in this passage had in his eye the gifts of the Spirit, bestowed on the Gentiles, as proofs of God's love to them, he elegantly tells them, that "the love of God was poured out" into their hearts, along with the spiritual gifts. Drs. Whitby and Macknight.

—— by the Holy Ghost which is given unto us.] The spiritual gifts, bestowed on the first Christians, were clear proofs, especially in the case of the Gentiles, of the love which God bare to them, and of His purpose of saving them. And therefore, when the Jewish believers, who reproved St. Peter for preaching the Gospel to Cornelius and his friends, heard that they had received the Holy Ghost, "they held their peace, and glorified God, saying, Then hath God also to the Gentiles granted repentance unto life," Acts xi. 18. Farther, the ordinary influence of the Spirit, bestowed on believers, by renovating their nature, affords them the fullest assurance of pardon and salvation through faith: hence they are said to be "sealed with the Spirit of promise." And the Spirit Himself is called, "the earnest of their inheritance," Eph. i. 13, 14; iv. 30: and is said, Rom. viii. 16, to "bear witness with their spirit, that they are the children of God." Dr. Macknight.

6. For when we were yet without strength,] As if he had said, Of which love to us, even before we believed, the Gospel gives us the highest demonstrations. "For when we were without strength," &c. Dr. Whitby.

—— without strength,] 'Weak;' the original word signifies weak through sickness: and is used here to shew the pernicious influence of sin, in weakening all the faculties of the soul. Isaiah has used the same metaphor, chap. i. 5. Dr. Macknight. When we were all in a sick, yea a mortal, that is, a sinful and damnable state. Dr. Hammond.

—— in due time] In God's appointed time. Dr. Wells. "The fulness of time," the time foretold by the Prophets, Gal. iv. 4. Pyle, Burkitt.

—— for the ungodly.] That is, for the whole race of mankind, whom he found buried in the ruins of their fallen state, and having no righteousness of their own. Burkitt, Dr. Whitby.

object to move Him to it, when we were so far from being good or just men, from being merciful or pious in the highest degree, that we were profane customary sinners, He then sent His Son Christ to die for us, to obtain, by the shedding of His own blood, pardon of sins for us upon our reformation and amendment. Dr. Hammond.

9. Much more then, being now justified by his blood,] Being thus far restored to His favour, and, by that ransom of His paid for us, redeemed from certain ruin, we shall be actually delivered through Him from all effects of the Divine displeasure in another world, if we be not wanting to ourselves in performing the conditions required on our parts. Dr. Hammond.

10. — by his life.] Since "He ever liveth to make intercession for us, and so is able to save us to the uttermost, that come unto God by Him," Heb. vii. 25; forasmuch as the Father hath "given Him power over all flesh, that He should give eternal life to as many as He has given Him," John xvii. 2. Drs. Whitby and Wells.

11. And not only so, &c.] From what has been alleged it appears, that we by faith in Christ have good reason to glory, "not only in the hope of the glory of God, but also in tribulation," as working and confirming that hope: to which I must add in the last place, "And not only so, but we" Christians "also joy," and that on better grounds than the Jews, "in God, through our Lord Jesus Christ, by whom," whatever may have been our former idolatry and other impieties, "we have now received reconciliation" with God. Dr. Wells. See the second note on ver. 3.

—— the atonement.] "Reconciliation." Drs. Hammond and Whitby. The alteration of the word makes no difference in the signification of the passage. For "the reconciliation" obtained by Christ's death is the consequence of the atonement and expiation made by Him, as is obvious from various passages of Scripture. In Heb. ii. 17, Christ is said to "make reconciliation for the sins of the people:" that is, according to a more exact translation of the original, to 'expiate,' to 'atone for,' to 'procure the pardon of,' their sins. "God reconciled the world unto Himself by Christ," 2 Cor. v. 18, 19, that is, by the death of Christ; and the consequence of His death and expiation was the remission of our sins: "not imputing their trespasses unto them." He who knew no sin was accepted as a sinner, and died on the cross as a sinner, for us, on our account, and in our stead, that we might be justified and pardoned by God through Christ, 2 Cor. v. 21. Our sins are expiated, that is, put away and not imputed to us, through the death of Christ. "Now hath He once appeared to put away sin by the sacrifice of Himself," Heb. ix. 26. Bp. Burgess.

12. Wherefore, as by one man sin entered into the world, &c.] From the foregoing premises the Apostle here infers his conclusion, which he farther confirms and illustrates in the remainder of the chapter, by comparing the justification by Christ with the condemnation by Adam; namely, that the mercy of God under the Gospel belongs without limitation to all sorts of men, the Gentiles as well as the Jews. In order to discern his meaning, it is necessary to lay an emphasis on the universal forms of speech; "the world" and "all men," ver. 12; "in the world," ver. 13; "many," and "unto many," ver. 15; and again, "upon all men," twice in ver. 18; and "many," twice in ver. 19. By all and each of which are meant in the widest latitude, without exclusion of any, all mankind, to whom, both Jews and Gentiles, the mercy and life introduced by Christ belong, only on condition of new life required of them; as the condemnation or death in Adam belonged to all his posterity. Dr. Hammond.

—— sin;] That is, original sin, with which all mankind, descended from fallen Adam by natural generation, are universally infected from their conception and birth. Parkhurst.

—— death] Or mortality. Dr. Hammond. See the note on Gen. ii. 17.

—— for that all have sinned:] That is, because all were sinners, being born after the image and likeness of Adam. Dr. Hammond. The meaning is, not that death hath come on all, because all have sinned actually; for infants, who have not sinned actually, die: but that they have sinned in Adam; that is, are involved in the consequences of his sin. Dr. Macknight. The whole force of St. Paul's argument, drawn from the comparison between Adam and Christ, lies in this; that all men died for Adam's sin, not for their own sin: and therefore it is necessary to understand the verb "sinned" here in a figurative sense; and the word so taken makes up a proposition certainly true, as being what is expressly asserted by St. Paul elsewhere, that "in Adam all died," that is, became mortal. In a literal sense it cannot be true. Drs. Wells and Whitby.

13. (For until the law &c.] In the first part of the comparison between Adam and Christ, the Apostle, having intimated that all became mortal in Adam, does not complete the intended comparison, but proceeds immediately to shew in the 13th and 14th verses, that all, who lived between Adam and Moses, died for the sin of Adam: and then, having observed in the latter part of the 14th verse, that Adam was a "figure" of Christ, he immediately observes, verses 15—17, that this was to be understood with some limitations. After which, in the 18th and 19th verses he resumes the first part of the comparison begun in the 12th verse, and completes the comparison by adding the remaining part. Hence verses 13—17 are to be best understood as a parenthesis. Dr. Wells.

— (For until the law sin was in the world:] And so appeared to be, by the continual execution of its punishment, that is, death. Dr. Doddridge.

For though all the time before the delivery of the Law of God by Moses, sin was universally committed in the world by men's transgressions of the law of nature; yet these transgressions (whatever other punishment they subjected them to) could not be the cause of their natural mortality, for there is no such thing as transgressing a law which is not in being; and therefore the posterity of Adam, who never had that positive Law of God, to the breach of which only the threatening of natural death or mortality was annexed, could not be made subject to the penalty thereof by their own actual transgressions, whatever other punishment they might incur thereby. T. Edwards.

14. — who is the figure of him that was to come.] That is, of Christ, the second Adam: in that the first Adam was the original of our natural and earthly being, the second Adam of our spiritual and heavenly: and, as by the first sin came into the world, so by the second came righteousness. *Bp. human race, through the precious blood of Christ, the Apostle here represents Adam as "the figure of Him that was to come;" that is, a type of Christ. He then describes the analogy between the first and second Adam, by declaring that the former brought death upon all men, and the latter restored all to life; that universal sin and condemnation were the consequence of Adam's disobedience, and universal righteousness and pardon the effect of Christ's obedience. See ver. 18, 19. Bp. Tomline.

15. But not as the offence, so also is the free gift.] He means, that the gift, communicated by Christ to believers, is far greater than the punishment communicated from Adam to his posterity. Dr. Hammond.

—— many] Rather, according to the import of the original, 'the many;' that is, the multitude, or whole bulk of mankind. The expression is plainly equivalent to "all men" in the 12th and 18th verses. Compare Matt. xxvi. 28; 1 Cor. x. 17. Parkhurst.

—— much more the grace of God, &c.] One particular, in which the grace in Christ exceeded the condemnation in Adam, appears to be here intimated; that, whereas the posterity of Adam were begotten after his similitude, and so were all sinners as well as he, and probably in as great degrees though in other kinds; those on the contrary, to whom the mercy in Christ belongs, are not righteous as Christ is, but are exempted from punishment only by virtue of the death of Christ. Drs. Hammond and Whitby.

Grace abounded, in the remission not only of that sin which Adam brought on us, but also of all our own: not only in remission of sins, but in infusing righteousness and sanctification of life; not only in freedom from death, but in admission to life eternal. Bp. Fell.

16. —for the judgment was by one] That is, by one sin, to condemnation. This is the second advantageous difference: namely, that whereas we became obnoxious to death for one sin of Adam, we are justified by faith in Christ, and so delivered not only from the condemnation, which came upon us for that sin, but also from the condemnation due to us for all our offences against God. Dr. Whitby.

17. —they which receive abundance of grace] They, who receive and make use of that most rich grace and righteousness of Christ; that is, who are holy, gracious, and righteous too, though not in the same degree as He is; and so are, according to this evangelical way, capable of this justification, shall by the resurrection of Christ, and by His living and interceding for them for ever, be sure to reign with Him. Dr. Hammond.

By the phrase "shall reign in life," the Apostle appears to mean, that they shall have infinitely greater happiness in their new life, than they had miseries and sorrows in the state into which they were brought through Adam's disobedience, expressed by "the reigning of death" in this verse, and in verse 14. Dr. Macknight.

18. Therefore as by the offence of one &c.] The Apostle here reverts to the comparison, which he began in the 12th verse, and which he now completes by affirming, that the benefit accruing to mankind by Christ's death is as universal as the damage which accrued to them by Adam's fall: for that, as all men were condemned to a state of mortality by the offence of Adam, so, through the free mercy of God in Christ, all men are to be justified or absolved from continuing under death, the punishment of Adam's sin, by partaking of the resurrection of the body; and also all men are put into a capacity of being justified unto eternal life, which they shall certainly inherit, if they are not wanting in the performance of their part of the Gospel covenant. Dr. Wells.

19. —many were made sinners, —shall many be made righteous.] According to the original it is, 'the many were constituted sinners,—the many shall be constituted righteous.' Dr. Hammond.

'To be constituted sinners,' is to be treated as such by becoming subject to death: 'to be constituted righteous,' is to be admitted to a reward, as righteous. Parkhurst. The verse means, that as all men (see the note on ver. 15.) were subjected to death by the disobedience of Adam, so all men, who shall come to Christ, and perform sincere and faithful obedience to Him, shall be justified, and accepted by Him, though they be not perfectly just. Dr. Hammond.

The sin of Adam, and the merits of Christ, are here pronounced to be co-extensive: the words applied to both are precisely the same: "judgment came upon all men," "the free gift came upon all men;" "many were made sinners," "many were made righteous." Whatever the words "all men" and "many" signify, when applied to Adam, they must signify the same, when applied to Christ. It is admitted, that in the former case the whole human race is meant: and consequently in the latter case, the whole human race is meant also. The force of the argument is destroyed, and the most acknowledged rules of language are violated, by so interpreting this passage as to contend, that all men are liable to punishment on account of the sin of Adam, and that a few only are enabled to avoid that punishment through the death of Christ. Nay, we are even told, that, "where sin abounded, grace did much more abound," ver. 20: but how can this be, if sin extends to all, and grace is confined to a part only of mankind? Bp. Tomline.

The following is the testimony which God hath given of His Son, concerning the extent of the satisfaction provided by His death. 1st, That He came to seek and to save that which was lost, Matt. xviii. 11; Luke xix. 10: that the Lord laid on Him the iniquity of us all, Isai. liii. 6: that He died for the ungodly, Rom. v. 6; for sinners, ver. 8; for His enemies, ver. 10; for all, 1 Tim. ii. 5, 6; iv. 10; for every man, Heb. ii. 9; for the world, John iii. 16; i. 29; vi. 33, 51; for the whole world, 1 John ii. 2; for the unjust, 1 Pet. iii. 18; and finally disobedient, ver. 20. Secondly, that He died for as many as are dead in Adam, Rom. v. 12, 18; 1 Cor. xv. 22; 2 Cor. v. 14. Thirdly, that He died for as many as are bound to believe in Him, 1 Pet. i. 18—20. Fourthly, that He died for as many as are bound to adore and serve Him, 1 Cor. vi. 20; 2 Cor. v. 14, 15, with Rom. xiv. 9. Fifthly, that He died for as many as we are obliged to pray for in Christ's name, 1 Tim. ii. 1, with verses 5, 6. Sixthly, that He died for such as do deny Him, and crucify Him to themselves afresh, and finally perish, Heb. vi. 4—6; x. 29; 2 Pet. ii. 12. See also Rom. xiv. 15; 1 Cor. viii. 11. Bp. Womack.

The use of the foregoing comparison, in its application to the Apostle's argument, is this: that since the benefit of Christ's obedience is designed by God to be of an universal extent, as well as is the mischief of Adam's disobedience; it will thence follow, that, as the Gentiles, no less than the Jews, were subjected to mortality by the fall of Adam, so the Gentiles, no less than the Jews, are intended by God to be restored by Christ to a state of life: such a state denoting, not only a partaking of the resurrection from the dead, but also a partaking, or at least a capacity of partaking, of eternal happiness. Dr. Wells.

—— But where sin abounded, grace did much more abound:] In forgiving the Jews their numerous sins, and making them, though liable to death even on more accounts than the Gentiles, yet no less capable of justification unto life. Dr. Wells.

21. That as sin hath reigned unto death, &c.] That, as sin had prevailed over all mankind, to bring upon them a double death, both spiritual and bodily; so might the grace of God, through the righteousness of His Son Jesus Christ, be effectual to restore man to eternal life. Bp. Hall.

Adored, for ever adored, be the wisdom and goodness of Almighty God, in providing a remedy, which bears proportion to the cause of our ruin; that, as we fell in Adam our representative, so we are raised by Christ the head of our recovery! As the carnal Adam, having lost original righteousness, derives a corrupt nature to all that descend from him; so the spiritual Adam, having by His obedience purchased grace for us, conveys to us a vital efficacy. The same Spirit of Holiness, who anointed our Redeemer, doth quicken all His race, that, as they have borne the image of the earthly, they may also bear the image of the heavenly Adam. May God enable us to see the exceeding sinfulness of sin, and His abundant grace: and may our faith, both in life and death, triumph in the assurance of this blessed truth, that "where sin abounded, grace did much more abound; and, as sin hath reigned unto death, even so hath grace reigned through righteousness unto eternal life, by Jesus Christ our Lord;" who lives for ever in heaven, to apply by His prevailing intercession, what He obtained for us here on earth by His meritorious satisfaction! Burkitt.

To many persons there has appeared to be an inconsistency or incompatibility between the death of Christ, and the necessity of sincere endeavours after obedience. When the subject is properly examined, there is no such incompatibility. The graciousness of an offer does not diminish the necessity of a condition. Suppose a prince to promise to one of his subjects, upon compliance with certain terms, and the performance of certain duties, a reward, in magnitude and value, out of all competition beyond the merit of the compliance, the desert of the performance; to what shall such a subject ascribe the happiness held out to him? He is an ungrateful man, if he attributes it to any cause whatever, but to the bounty and goodness of his prince in making him the offer; or if he suffer any consideration, be it what it will, to interfere with or diminish his sense of that bounty and goodness. Still it is true, that he will not obtain what is offered, unless he comply with the terms. So far his compliance is a condition of his happiness. But the grand thing is the offer being made at all. That is the ground and origin of the whole. That is the cause; and is ascribable to favour, grace, and goodness, on the part of the prince, and to nothing else. It would therefore be the last degree of ingratitude in such a subject, to forget his prince while he thought of himself; to forget the cause, whilst he thought of the condition; to regard every thing promised as merited. The generosity, the kindness, the voluntariness, the bounty of the original offer, come by this means to be neglected in his mind entirely. This, in my opinion, describes our situation with respect to God. The love, goodness, and grace of God, in making us a tender of salvation, and the effects of the death of Christ, do not diminish the necessity or the obligation of the condition of the tender, which is sincere endeavours after holiness; nor are they in any wise inconsistent with such obligation. Archdeacon Paley.

Chap. VI. The Apostle in this chapter notices the inference, which some persons were perverse enough to draw from his doctrine of grace; namely, that the worse men are, the more they contribute to illustrate God's mercy, and that so the freedom of God's grace takes off the necessity of a holy life. This inference he first rejects with indignation and abhorrence; and then proceeds to prove it most unreasonable in itself, and altogether inconsistent with the profession and design of the Christian religion. His first argument is drawn from the sacrament of baptism; wherein we solemnly take that profession upon ourselves. He then proceeds to another topick, and accommodates himself more immediately to the circumstances of those converts, to whom he wrote; illustrating the obligation to Christian virtue and purity, by a metaphor taken from Roman freedom and slavery. Dean Stanhope, Pyle.

Ver. 1. What shall we say then? &c.] The Apostle had before noticed the absurd and dangerous consequence, which some men were apt to draw from his expressions concerning the Divine mercy in our redemption. He now enters upon a more ample vindication of himself from such an unjust imputation. Pyle. The passage might be better rendered, 'What do we say then? (do we say this?) let us continue in sin,' &c. Drs. Whitby and Macknight.

The same Scriptures, which represent the death of Christ, as having that which belongs to the death of no other person, namely, an efficacy in procuring the salvation of man, are also constant and uniform in representing the necessity of our own endeavours, of our own good works, for the same purpose. They go further. The writers foresaw that in stating, and still more when they went about to extol and magnify the death of Christ, as instrumental to salvation, they were laying a foundation for the opinion, that men's own works, their own virtue, their personal endeavours, were superseded and dispensed with. In proportion as the sacrifice of the death of Christ was effectual, in the same proportion were these less necessary: if the death of Christ was sufficient, if redemption was complete, then were these not necessary at all. They foresaw that some would draw this consequence from their doctrine, and they provided against it. The clearest passage to the purpose is that before us. St. Paul, after expatiating largely upon the "grace," that is, the favour, kindness, and mercy of God, the extent, the greatness, the comprehensiveness of that mercy, as manifested in the Christian dispensation, puts this question to his reader, "What shall we say then? shall we continue in sin, that grace may abound?" Which he answers by a strong negative, "God forbid!" What the Apostle here designed, is sufficiently evident. He knew in what manner some might be apt to construe his expressions; and he anticipates their mistake. He is beforehand with them, by protesting against any such use being made of his doctrine, which yet, he was aware, might by possibility be made. From this therefore, and from other similar passages, it may be assumed as a proved point, that whatever was said by the Apostles concerning the efficacy of the death of Christ, was said by them under an apprehension, that they did not thereby in any manner relax the motives, the obligation, or the necessity of good works. Archdeacon Paley.

2.—How shall we, that are dead] Or, according to the original, 'have died to sin,' by our baptism or entrance into the Christian covenant, "live any longer therein?" Dr. Whitby.

To "live in sin" is, not to commit any one act of sin, for so all do live in sin, 1 John i. 8; Jam. iii. 2: but to have a habit and custom of sinning. Bp. Fell.

To continue in sin is altogether inconsistent with renouncing sin, which we profess to do at our baptism. Dr. Wells.

3. Know ye not, &c.] Know ye not, that so many of us, as were baptized into Jesus Christ, have the full efficacy of Christ's death sealed up unto us, and by virtue thereof die unto our sins? Bp. Hall. "To be baptized into Christ," is to be baptized into the profession of Christ's laws and doctrine. Bp. Pearce.

4. Therefore we are buried with him by baptism into death: &c.] Yea, our baptism doth not only represent unto us our death to sin by the power of His death, but our burial also; and the continuance of that state of the death of sin in us, and our rising again to newness of life: that, like as Christ was raised up from the dead by the omnipotent power of God, even so we should by the power of His Spirit be raised from the grave of our sins, to walk before Him in the new life of holy obedience. Bp. Hall.

——we are buried with him &c.] The ceremony of immerging the body of the baptized in water represents the burial of a dead person under ground. The pouring of water upon the party, in cases where the former cannot conveniently be done, answers to covering and throwing earth upon a person so dead. But both agree in figuring a death and burial, as the emerging again figureth a new life. And this it is plain can only mean the mortification of some old, and the quickening of some contrary principle, in a spiritual sense. Dean Stanhope.

The practice of baptizing, by plunging the person under water, thereby burying him, as it were, in the water, and raising him out of it again, was anciently the more usual method: on which account St. Paul speaks of baptism, as representing both the death, and burial, and resurrection of Christ, and what is grounded upon them, our being "dead and buried to sin," renouncing it, and being acquitted of it; and our rising again, to "walk in newness of life;" being both obliged and enabled to practise, for the future, every duty of piety and virtue. The other manner of baptizing, by pouring or sprinkling water, sufficiently expresses the same two things: our being by this ordinance purified from the guilt of sin, and bound and qualified to keep ourselves pure from the defilement of it. Abp. Secker.

——even so we also should walk in newness of life.] Not only "mortifying all our evil and corrupt affections," but, as our baptismal service expresses it, "daily proceeding in all virtue and godliness of living." The "newness" here spoken of, is a newness of notions, dispositions, desires, and conversation: which, when heavenly and virtuous, are deservedly styled new; because corrective of, contrary to, and superinduced after, those vicious and worldly ones, wherewith in this corrupt state of nature every man is born. This change is made by the grace of God's Holy Spirit; which gives a fresh turn to our thoughts and affections, imprints a true sense of good and evil, puts a quite different bent upon the will, disposes it to walk by faith rather than by sight, to prefer pure and intellectual, before sensual and polluted pleasures, to overbalance present and mean with eternal, though future and invisible, advantages: and so by these, and many other like operations, renders us "new;" that is, quite other men from what it found us either actually being, or in a disposition to be. Of this change the resurrection of our Lord is very elegantly proposed for a pattern. Dean Stanhope.

5. For if we have been planted together] That is, have by baptism been so grafted into Christ, that we are become, as it were, the same tree with Him, partaking of the same juice with that root. Dr. Hammond. The sense of this and the following verse is, If we be so grafted in Him, that the power of His death works the like effect in us, that it did in Him; so also shall the same ingrafting convey unto us the same virtue of His resurrection, that we should also rise by and with Him from the grave of our sins, ver. 6. Knowing this, that this corrupt nature of ours, our unregenerate part, is crucified and dead together with Him, and by the power of His death; that the whole bulk of our maliciousness and depravation might be so far destroyed, that, however we may be drawn to sin, yet we should not serve sin any more. Bp. Hall. As the benefits of Christ's real death are accomplished and assured to us by His real resurrection; so are those of our figurative death, by our resembling Him in the latter as well as in the former. Dean Stanhope.

6.—is crucified] Rather, 'was crucified.' Drs. Hammond, Whitby, and Macknight.

——the body of sin] That is, those irregular appetites of the body, which subject us to sin. Drs. Wells and Whitby.

——we should not serve sin.] It will conduce much to the understanding of St. Paul in this and the two following chapters, if it be observed that these phrases, "to serve sin, to be servants to sin, sin to reign in our mortal bodies, to obey sin in the lusts of our bodies, to yield our members instruments of unrighteousness unto sin, or servants of uncleanness, and to iniquity unto iniquity, to be freed from righteousness, to walk, live, or be after the flesh, to be carnally minded;" all signify one and the same thing, namely, the giving of ourselves up to the conduct of our sinful, carnal appetites, to allow any of them the command over us, and the conduct and prevalency in determining us. On the contrary, that "walking after the Spirit, or in newness of life, the crucifixion of the old man, the destruction of the body of sin, the deliverance from the body of death, to be freed from sin, to be dead to sin, alive unto God, to yield ourselves unto God as those who are alive from the dead, to yield our members servants of righteousness unto holiness, or instruments of righteousness unto God, to be servants of obedience unto righteousness, made free from sin, servants of righteousness, to be after the Spirit, to be spiritually minded, to mortify the deeds of the body," do all signify a constant and steady purpose, and sincere endeavour to obey the law and will of God in every thing, these several expressions being used in several places, as best serves the occasion, and illustrates the sense. Locke.

7. For he that is dead is freed from sin.] For, as a man truly dead is freed from the authority of all those that in his lifetime had power over him; so he, that is thus figuratively dead, is freed from the power of sin, which formerly acted in him. Dr. Hammond.

dead with Christ to sin, we believe, or are assured, that we shall also by His grace be enabled to live with Him; that is, to live, in some degree like Him, an holy life for the future. Dr. Wells. "We shall live with Him," as having that Spirit, which is the Giver of life, and the pledge and earnest of it, imparted to us. Dr. Whitby.

9—11. Knowing &c.] Knowing therefore that Christ, being raised from the dead, and triumphing over death in that His resurrection, yieldeth not to death any more, nor suffereth death, thus by Him vanquished, to have any more power over Him. 10. For, in that He died, He died but once for the destroying of sin; but, in that He liveth, He liveth with God for ever, a life immortal and glorious. 11. Likewise ye that are regenerate, must make account that ye are, by virtue of His death, dead unto sin, but alive unto God, through Jesus Christ our Lord; who hath raised us up to the life of new obedience, by the power of His resurrection. Bp. Hall. The resemblance of Christ, to which baptism brings us, implies a constant perseverance in our duty. St. Paul argues, "Christ being raised from the dead dieth no more," &c. ver. 8, 9: and then follows in the 10th verse, "Likewise reckon ye yourselves also to be dead indeed unto sin," &c. The inference is strong, and the parallel close. Our Lord could die but once, because there could never be occasion to require it a second time. For the design of His death was to take away sin; and, because this was accomplished to the uttermost at once, therefore He died once for all. This argued the perfection of His sacrifice: this argues too the life, to which He rose, to be endless. Now if baptism represent His resurrection as well as His death, it must be such a "rising to a life of righteousness," as never dies to sin any more. Accordingly herein the spiritual and natural life agree, that, as we can be born but once, so we are baptized but once. And as the vital principle in each case is then imparted for a man's whole term, so is it in each case left to the man's own care to preserve and cherish it. Dean Stanhope.

It must be observed, that in some sense and degree the Scripture expressions and privileges of a new birth and creation belong to all who are admitted by baptism into the Christian covenant, though none are entitled to future happiness by them, but such as complete their right to them, if God allows them time for it, by performing, from a spirit of inward piety, the several obligations of the Gospel. When that is preached to Jews or heathens, every one, who believes and is baptized, is "buried with Christ" in that sacred ordinance, "raised up to newness of life," ver. 4, and adopted of God for His child. When the infants of believers are baptized, they are, by the solemnity which Heaven hath appointed, "born again of water and the Spirit," John iii. 5, into a better state than that of nature. And till either sort of persons forfeit their claim by wilful wickedness, which it may be hoped some never do, though "in many things we offend all," Jam. iii. 2, they continue heirs of everlasting life. And even when they fall under the dominion of sin; though, were they to die in that condition, future misery would be their portion; and therefore, in respect of any present title to their heavenly Father's inheritance, they are no longer children of God: as earthly sons or subjects, when they rebel, are no longer such, in respect of any right to the favour of their parents or princes: yet as, in other regards, these latter continue sons and subjects still; so the covenant with the former, by which they were made the children of God, subsist, notwithstanding their failure of duty, thus far, that not only by the terms of it, if they persist, they will be condemned, but by the terms of it also, if they repent, they will be pardoned. And neither the penitence, nor the forgiveness, of those, who before were initiated into Christianity, and have not since rejected it, is ever expressed in the word of God by the phrase of the new birth or new creature, but these are appropriated almost, if not altogether, to our original admission into the Gospel state; into which we enter once for all, by one baptism, "the laver of regeneration," Tit. iii. 5. Nicodemus, to whom our Saviour in St. John gives instructions on that head, was not then become a Christian. Nor is there the least appearance in the New Testament of telling any professed believer, though he had sinned ever so grievously, that he must be born again; (otherwise the same person would be born again as often as he falls into any great wickedness, and recovers from it;) but that he must "repent, and do the first works," Rev. ii. 5, and "be renewed in the spirit of his mind," Eph. iv. 23; which belongs, in its degree, to the best of good Christians. And therefore, though inculcating perpetually, that "without holiness no man shall see the Lord," Heb. xii. 14, is indispensably needful; yet preaching the necessity of being regenerated, as a thing still absolutely wanting to a great part of those who call themselves disciples of Christ, is using a language, not conformable to that of Scripture, nor indeed of the primitive Fathers, or of the offices of our own Liturgy: which declares every person, who is baptized, to be, by that very act, "regenerate and grafted into the body of Christ's Church." It is true, a different manner of speaking may be capable of a good interpretation, and should be interpreted as favourably as there is room. But it is neither accurate, nor prudent, to depart from the authorized sense of the words of "sound doctrine;" and much less is it allowable to blame others for adhering to them. Abp. Secker.

11. — sin,] "Sin" is here spoken of as a person, and so through this and the following chapter, which must be observed in order to a right understanding of them. Locke.

—— alive unto God] All men being, through the disobedience of our first parents, subject to death; the rite of baptism, by which we are admitted into the religion of Jesus, "who hath abolished death, and brought life and immortality to light," 2 Tim. i. 10, is with great propriety called in the twenty-seventh Article of our Church "a sign of regeneration." The original corruption of our nature is thus washed away, and we are born again to new hopes and new prospects, as is represented in the fourth verse, in which the Apostle says, that we are "buried with Christ by baptism into death, that like as Christ was raised up from the dead by the glory of the Father, even so we also should walk in newness of life." The same is asserted in Tit. iii. 5; as also in the present verse. Thus is the inward effect of baptism constantly affirmed in Scripture. We are said to be "born again of water and the Spirit," which are frequently mentioned together, the one applied externally, and the other operating internally. Baptism therefore is not a mere external badge or token of our being Christians: it is a new birth from the death of sin, and a regeneration to a new life in Christ: it is a change and renovation of nature by the Spirit and grace of God: it is an infusion of spiritual life into the soul, by which it is made capable of performing spiritual actions, and of living unto God. Bp. Tomline.

12. Let not sin therefore] Which is thus dead in you, or at least hath received his death's wound, rule and reign as a tyrant in these mortal bodies of yours. Bp. Hall. The Apostle here states the natural consequence of what he had been previously alleging; namely, that, however his doctrine was calumniated, Christians are by their very profession of Christianity required not to obey sin, by satisfying the lusts or prohibited desires of their bodies. Drs. Wells and Hammond.

—— it in the lusts thereof.] The word "it" refers to sin; "thereof" to the body. Dr. Wells.

15 What then? shall we sin, because we are not under the law, but under grace? God forbid.

16 Know ye not, that to whom ye yield yourselves servants to obey, his servants ye are to whom ye obey; whether of sin unto death, or of obedience unto righteousness?

to have this double sense; and consequently it signifies every thing in us, which is employed as "an instrument" in performing the works of the flesh, enumerated Gal. v. 19—21. For some of these do not require the members of the body to their being performed, but are wholly confined in their operation to the mind. Hence in Col. iii. 5, "evil concupiscence" (desire) and "covetousness" are mentioned among our "members upon the earth," which we are to mortify. Dr. Macknight.

—— unto sin:] To be employed in the service of sin: "unto God," in the end of the verse, to be employed in the service of God. Dr. Wells.

—— alive from the dead,] 'From among the dead.' The Gentile world were dead in sins, Eph. ii. 1, 5; Col. ii. 13. Those, who were converted to the Gospel, were raised to life from amongst those dead. Locke.

14. For sin shall not have dominion over you:] That is, if ye are not wanting to yourselves in making use of the means of grace, ye shall be able to overcome sin for the future: "for ye are not under the law," which gives only the knowledge of sin, and not sufficient strength to withstand it; "but under grace," that is, the gracious covenant of the Gospel, which gives you strength to withstand sin; so that it is now left to your own choice, inasmuch as it is left in your own power, whether ye will yield yourselves servants to God or sin. Wherein consists the strength, to which the Apostle here alludes, he teaches us in the eighth chapter, ver. 2; namely, in the assistance of the Holy Spirit. Dr. Wells.

It must be remembered, that St. Paul here and in the following chapter personifies "sin," as striving with men for mastery to destroy them. Locke.

15. What then? shall we sin, &c.] I have sufficiently shewn you already that the mercy of God in the Gospel is so far from encouraging sin, that it is the strongest engagement against it. Pyle.

16. Know ye not, &c.] Remember also, there is no dividing and halving your service between God and Satan: to whomsoever you engage yourselves, his slaves you must entirely be, like men sold to bondage, or taken in war. If sin be your master, your pay is nothing but death and misery; if Christ, your reward is then no less than pardon and eternal salvation. Pyle. "Obedience" here signifies the Gospel: called "the obedience of faith," chap. i. 5; xvi. 26; and "the obedience of Christ," 2 Cor. x. 5; and here "obedience" simply. Dr. Macknight.

17. But God be thanked, &c.] The Apostle thanks God, not because they had been servants to sin, but because they, who had been servants to it, were become obedient to the precepts of Christianity. Compare Matt. xi. 25. As if he had said, God be thanked, that, although formerly ye were the servants of sin, yet since your conversion ye are become obedient to the Gospel. Dr. Whitby, Burkitt.

—— that form of doctrine] That summary of Christian doctrine. Dr. Hammond. The Christian religion. Schleusner.

—— which was delivered you.] Or, according to the margin, to the belief and practice of which ye were delivered up, and solemnly consecrated at your baptism. Dr. Hammond.

18. Being then made free] The original word signifies the act of giving a slave his liberty; called by the Romans emancipation. Dr. Macknight. Having received a dismission from that evil master, ye have given yourselves up to a more ingenuous service, obliging yourselves to live righteously for ever after. Dr. Hammond.

19. I speak after the manner of men &c.] I have thus represented the case to you by a comparison of slaves and masters, things very well known by you Romans; and I have made choice of this metaphor, the more easily to make you sensible, who are yet but little skilled in the notions of Christianity, and of spiritual matters. And the sum of what I intend by it is this: That as you, in your unregenerate state, both Jews and Gentiles were the slaves of sin and death; so now under the Gospel, you are bound to a new master, and obliged to such a course of piety and virtue, as cannot fail to justify and save you. Pyle, Dr. Wells.

The metaphors in this chapter are extremely bold: yet being taken from matters well known, they were used with great advantage. For the influence of sinful passions, in constraining wicked men to commit evil actions, could not be better represented to those who were acquainted with the condition of slaves, and with the customs by which their lives and services were regulated, than by the power which a tyrannical lord exercised over his slaves. Neither could any thing more affecting be devised, to shew this miserable condition of a person habitually governed by his lusts, than to liken it to the state of a slave under a severe unprincipled master, who rigorously requires him to spend the whole of his time and strength in his work, who exacts from him things both painful and ignominious, and who, by the severity of the services which he imposes, miserably puts an end to the life of his slaves. On the other hand, the right which a lawful and humane lord has to the services of his slave, and the nature of the services in which he employs him, and the rewards which he bestows upon him for his faithful services, convey a clear and affecting idea of the obligation which the Gospel lays on men, to employ themselves wholly in works of righteousness, and of the happy consequences of such a course of life. Dr. Macknight.

20. —ye were free from righteousness.] Not so as to be under no obligation to it, but estranged from it by contrary habits. Pyle. You did not obey its precepts. The inference is, that they should now serve their new master with the same diligence and undivided affection, with which they served their old one. Dean Stanhope.

21. What fruit had ye then, &c.] The Apostle here presses the argument against sin, by a consideration of the little benefit or satisfaction, which it furnishes at the time; of the shame, which ensues on the remembrance of it; and of its inevitable termination in death. Dr. Hammond. Death of the body, even when renounced and repented of; but otherwise death, that is, infinite and irreversible misery, of body and soul both. Dean Stanhope.

For the unprofitableness of sin, even at present, the Apostle appeals to the hearts and consciences of those with whom he argues, "What fruit had ye then in those things?" well knowing they must own, that upon trial they had found none: a confession, which very few have ever failed to make, when after a life, spent whereof ye are now ashamed? for the end of those things is death.

22 But now being made free from sin, and become servants to God, ye have your fruit unto holiness, and the end everlasting life.

CHAP. VII.

1 No law hath power over a man longer than he liveth. 4 But we are dead to the law. 7 Yet is not the law sin, 12 but holy, just, good, 16 as I acknowledge, who am grieved because I cannot keep it.

KNOW ye not, brethren, (for I speak to them that know the law,) how that the law hath dominion over a man as long as he liveth?

2 For the woman which hath an husband is bound by the law to her husband so long as he liveth; but if the husband be dead, she is loosed from the law of her husband.

Anno DOMINI 60.

3 So then if, while her husband liveth, she be married to another man, she shall be called an adulteress: but if her husband be dead, she is free from that law; so that she is no adulteress, though she be married to another man.

4 Wherefore, my brethren, ye also are become dead to the law by the body of Christ; that ye should be married to another, even to him who is raised from the dead, that we should bring forth fruit unto God.

in wickedness, they came to reflect coolly what real advantage they had gained by it on the upshot. The language of those, who will be prevailed on to balance that great account, is almost universally the same, which Elihu in Job ascribes to the penitent, "I have sinned, and perverted that which was right, and it profited me not," Job xxxiii. 27. Abp. Secker.

22. —ye have your fruit unto holiness, &c.] Ye have abundance of contentment thereby; accompanied with present sanctification and holiness of life, and the promise of everlasting happiness. Bp. Hall, Dr. Hammond.

23. For the wages of sin is death; &c.] That is, the wages which are paid by sin, considered as a person, and so are opposed to what is "given" by God. Parkhurst.

"The wages of sin is death:" It is what God hath expressly threatened and given men sufficient warning of: and therefore what they, who know beforehand upon what terms they enslave themselves, and who have put into their hands so many assistances and opportunities of being free and happy, do by their obstinacy deserve. But the "eternal life" awarded to good men, is what the very best of them neither do, nor ever can deserve. We may indeed deserve our punishment, because sin is our own, entirely our own act. But we cannot reasonably be said to deserve a recompense for acts, not entirely, not originally, our own: and that at His hands too, whose free grace and good Spirit it is, that works in us both the will and the deed. Most justly therefore doth the Apostle put the difference here between "wages" and "gift." The former is the effect of justice; the latter of bounty: a bounty, not inclined by any consideration moving it on our part; but redounding to and descending upon us for the sake of a Person, who hath, it must be confessed, merited it to the uttermost: even Jesus Christ, whose servants we are, who condescended to purchase it at the price of His own blood. And therefore not unto us be the praise, or any part of it; but unto Him be honour, and glory, and thanks, "for this His unspeakable gift." Dean Stanhope.

Chap. VII. The Apostle, having in the former chapter declared how believers are freed from the power and dominion of sin, proceeds to shew that they are also free from the yoke of the Mosaick law, by an instance taken from the law of marriage. Then to convince the Jewish Christians, both of the absolute necessity and great happiness of relying upon the Gospel religion, for the pardon of sin and eternal salvation, and the better to recommend his argument to them, he supposes himself a Jew under the same condition of habitual sin and guilt, which he had shewn them all to be in, chapters ii. and iii. And by thus personating the habitual transgressor of the moral law of God, shews the Mosaical law utterly unable, either to cure the habits, or atone for the guilt, of his sin. The merits of Christ therefore and His religion, are necessary for pardon and salvation. Burkitt, Pyle.

Ver. 1. —I speak to them that know the law,)] He addresses himself to his brethren of the stock of Abraham, whom he supposes, by their frequent hearing and reading of the law of Moses, to be well instructed in the nature of those laws, which give one person interest in, or power over another. Dr. Hammond.

——as long as he liveth?] Rather, "as it," that is, the law, "liveth." The meaning is, Know ye not, that the Mosaical law hath dominion over any man, that is subject to it, so long as the said law is in force? Bp. Hall.

2. For the woman &c.] Take the instance of a husband and wife: let the husband be the law; let us converts to Christianity be the wife; so then, the woman, which hath a husband, is bound by the law to live with her husband and to be subject unto him, so long as he liveth; but if her husband be once dead, she is loosed from any further bond to her husband or observance of him. Bp. Hall.

Forsaking the law of God, and going over to another religion, is frequently in scripture styled "fornication," or "adultery." And the Jews seem to have used some such argument for not quitting the law of Moses, and embracing the Gospel. Wherefore by this comparison the Apostle very appositely shews the Jews, that they could not be guilty of spiritual adultery in quitting the law. Dr. Wells.

4. —ye also are become dead to the law] The ceremonial law, to which God at first joined you, is now dead to you, and you to it. Pyle.

——by the body of Christ;] By the crucified body, the death of Christ. Dr. Hammond.

——that we should bring forth fruit unto God.] The Apostle says, "that we should bring forth," &c. to shew that he was in the same circumstances with the Jews. Dr. Macknight, Locke.

5. —in the flesh,] That is, in a comparatively carnal state, and without the grace of the Spirit, which was our condition, whilst we were under the law, and rested on the carnal ordinances of it. Dr. Wells.

——the motions of sins, which were by the law,] Those sinful desires and affections, which were forbidden by the law, and so were rendered more criminal by being prohibited. Dr. Hammond. Or the phrase, "which were by the law," may be rendered, 'which we had under the law.' Dr. Wells, Pyle, Dr. Macknight.

——did work in our members] "Members" here do not signify barely the fleshly parts of the body, in a restrained sense, but the animal faculties and powers, all in us that is employed as an instrument in the works of the flesh, which are reckoned up, Gal. v. 19—21; some of which do not require the members of our body, taken in a strict sense for the outward gross parts, but only the faculties of our minds, for their performance. Locke. See the note on chap. vi. 13.

6. But now we are delivered from the law,] As far as regards, not its moral precepts, but its carnal external performances. Dr. Hammond.

—— in newness of spirit, and not in the oldness of the letter.] That is, in leading entirely new, and inwardly as well as outwardly righteous lives, by the grace of the Spirit vouchsafed unto us by the Gospel; and not in contenting ourselves, as we have of old or formerly done, to observe only the letter of the law, and so acquiescing in an outward righteousness only. Dr. Wells.

7. What shall we say then? &c.] Rather, 'What do we say?' The Apostle proceeds to meet an objection, that by thus arguing he charged the law with being sin, or the cause of sin, contenting itself with an external performance of the ceremony, and not exacting inward purity. Dr. Hammond.

—— Nay, I had not known sin, but by the law:] I should not have known in some cases what was to be avoided as sin, but by the law. Dr. Wells. The Apostle here changes the person, and speaks as of himself. This he does elsewhere, Rom. iii. 6; 1 Cor. x. 30; iv. 6; when he is only personating another character. And the character here assumed is that of a man, first ignorant of the law, then under it, and sincerely desiring to please God; but finding to his sorrow the weakness of the motives it suggested, and the sad discouragement under which it left him: and last of all, with transport discovering the Gospel, and gaining by it pardon and strength, peace and joy. Dr. Doddridge.

The miserable condition of a man under the law, is modestly represented by the Apostle, as usual, see 1 Cor. iv. 6, in his own person. Bp. Fell.

—— for I had not known lust,] That is, I had not known the lustings, or covetous desires of the heart, to be things worthy of death, except the law had said, "thou shalt not covet," and so made him that coveteth obnoxious to death, as being a transgressor of the law. The law therefore hath done its part, in giving us knowledge that the very desires of the heart are sins. Drs. Whitby and Hammond.

The Apostle does not speak particularly of himself, but in the person of a Jew, or man in general; and then it is true, not only of this, but of all the other commandments, that the knowledge of sin is by the promulgation of the law which forbids it. But there was a particular reason why the Apostle instanced in this commandment. The Jews about our Saviour's time, seeing no punishment judicially appointed for unclean or dishonest thoughts or desires, had resolved this to be no sin. So that St. Paul might well say of any Jew, so instructed, that he had not believed coveting to be a sin, unless the more exact consideration of the direct words of the law had assured him that it was so. Dr. Hammond.

8. But sin, taking occasion by the commandment,] That is, taking advantage to slay me by the said commandment against coveting, wrought effectually in me the strongest desire of things forbidden, and so subjected me to death. Compare ver. 11. Drs. Wells and Macknight.

—— For without the law sin was dead.] That is, had not power to render me guilty of death. Dr. Wells. Sin, which the Apostle still considers as a person, would have had no being, or at least no strength to kill men, unless law existed. For the essence of sin consists in its being a violation of law. Dr. Macknight.

9. For I was alive &c.] To my appearance; being neither wounded by my conscience, nor so much solicited by sin. Bp. Fell.

10. — which was ordained to life,] Or, given for life, as teaching those things, which if a man do, he shall live in them, Lev. xviii. 5. The word "ordained" is not in the original: the verse may be paraphrased, The commandment, which was given for life, that is, with the promise, 'Do this, and live,' was found to be unto death. Dr. Whitby.

11. For sin, taking occasion by the commandment,] See above, ver. 8. "Deceived," or enticed me to the transgression of the commandment, and so rendered me guilty of death. Dr. Wells. There is an allusion here to the excuse which Eve made for eating the forbidden fruit; "The serpent beguiled me," by assuring me that I should not die. Dr. Macknight.

12. Wherefore the law is holy, &c.] The Apostle here infers the groundlessness of the objection urged in the 7th verse. Dr. Hammond. Wherefore it appears, that the law is by no means in itself the cause of sin, but on the contrary it is "holy," or a rule directing us to holiness: and consequently "the commandment," or whatever the law commands, is in itself "holy;" and not only so, but "just," or fit to be commanded; "and good," or beneficial to be observed. Dr. Wells.

13. Was then that which is good made death unto me? &c.] Shall I then charge my ruin on this holy and good law of God? By no means. But I must rather charge it upon sin, which by means of so holy an instrument undid me. Dr. Doddridge.

—— that it might appear sin,] That is, malignant, pernicious, and detestable. Dr. Wells.

—— that sin by the commandment might become exceeding sinful.] As being done against an express positive commandment, which plainly denounced death to the sinner; and so carrying with it a far greater degree of aggravation, and consequently of malignity, perniciousness, and detestableness than before. Dr. Wells.

14. For we know that the law is spiritual: &c.] The Apostle here argues, that it will not seem strange that sin should prevail over us in a state of lapsed nature, to transgress the law, and to become obnoxious to death by it, if we consider the contrariety which exists between every natural man and the law: "for we know, that the law is spiritual," and requires spiritual things; "but," every natural man hath cause to say of himself, "I am carnal, sold under sin," that is, enslaved by my corrupt affections: such is the meaning of the last phrase in the Old Testament. See 1 Kings xxi. 20, 25. Dr. Whitby.

15. For that which I do I allow not: &c.] The meaning is,

16 If then I do that which I would not, I consent unto the law that it is good.

17 Now then it is no more I that do it, but sin that dwelleth in me.

18 For I know that in me (that is, in my flesh,) dwelleth no good thing: for to will is present with me; but how to perform that which is good I find not.

19 For the good that I would I do not: but the evil which I would not, that I do.

that carnal men, though they are taught their duty by the law, do not such things as their understanding or conscience, thus instructed and directed, approves; but such as it disapproves and condemns. Dr. Hammond.

16. If then I do that which I would not, &c.] The conscience of such men, which smites them for thus acting in disobedience to the law, is an acknowledgment that the law itself is good. Dr. Hammond.

17. Now then it is no more I that do it, &c.] "I," according to the better part, from which I am denominated; "but sin that dwelleth in me," that is, in my flesh, ver. 23; and captivates me to the obedience of it. Dr. Whitby.

By distinguishing his real self, that is, his spiritual part, from the self, or flesh in which sin dwelt, and by observing that the evil actions which he committed were done, not by him, but by sin dwelling in him; the Apostle did not mean to teach that wicked men are not accountable for their sins, but to make them sensible of the evil of their sins, by shewing them, that they are all committed in direct opposition to reason and conscience, the superiour part of their nature, at the instigation of passion and lust, the lower part. Farther, by appealing to the opposition which reason and conscience make to evil actions, he hath overturned the grand argument, by which the wicked justify themselves in indulging their lusts. Say they, Since God has given us passions and appetites, He certainly meant that we should gratify them. True, says the Apostle: but God hath also given you reason and conscience, which oppose the excesses of lust, and condemn its gratification. And as reason and conscience are the superiour part of men's nature, a more certain indication of the will of God may be gathered from their operation, than from the impulses of the other. Dr. Macknight.

20. —it is no more I that do it, but sin that dwelleth in me.] The objection against the law in the 7th verse, is thus fully answered by shewing, that the law is far from being guilty of men's sin; and that it is not they, by the conduct and dictate of the law, or by their own conscience guided by the law, that do evil; but their carnal inclinations, or the custom of sin, which hath gained such power over them. Dr. Hammond.

21. I find then a law, &c.] By calling our sinful inclinations "a law," the Apostle teaches, that they are a principle of action as steady and constant in impelling us to evil, as the law of God is, in directing us to what is good. Dr. Macknight.

22. —after the inward man:] That is, in the mind or judgment, as the Apostle interprets himself, ver. 25. Drs. Whitby and Wells.

It is not true, that, in strictness of speech, fallen man hath originally no principle of what is right left in him. If the whole was lost by the fall, somewhat hath by the general grace of God been restored since. For, though St. Paul saith, "In me, that is, in my flesh, dwelleth no good thing," ver. 18, yet he saith of the same person quicklyafter, "I delight in the law of God after the inward man." And he supposes even the Gentiles to "do," in some cases and to some degree, "the things contained in the law," chap. ii. 14. Indeed experience proves, that notorious sinners have often a considerable mixture of worthy dispositions. We are not therefore to look on those dreadful pictures, which the sacred writers draw, of the most depraved of the heathens, as being just representations, without abatement, of the natural state of all mankind. But, however, that state is undoubtedly a bad one; destitute of sufficient strength, unentitled to pardon of sin, to supplies of grace, to reward of obedience; till God, in the covenant of baptism, affords us relief in all these respects; and so "delivers us from the power of darkness, and translates us into the kingdom of His dear Son," Col. i. 13. Abp. Secker.

23. —in my members.] See the note on chap. vi. 13.

24. O wretched man that I am! &c.] This is a sad condition, the very state of a carnal man under the law; and out of which the law cannot rescue any man, nor from the destruction that attends it. Dr. Hammond. This mass of inward corruption, which dwells in this mortal and sinful flesh of mine. Bp. Hall. Or, "The body of this death" appears to be an emphatical Hebraism, signifying "the body," that is, the lusts of the body, which cause "this death," the death threatened in the curse of the law. Dr. Macknight.

25. I thank God through Jesus Christ our Lord.] Yet blessed be God, by the grace and strength of Jesus Christ, chap. vi. 23, there is a way to escape from this sad condition: 1st, pardon to every penitent sinner, which may encourage any to break off their sins; and 2dly, grace and strength in Christ, to perform what God in Christ will accept, namely, a sincere though imperfect obedience. Dr. Hammond.

—— So then with the mind I myself serve the law of God; &c.] So then the conclusion of this digression from ver. 7, is, that the bare knowledge of the law of Moses only directs the understanding, what is our duty; notwithstanding which, the carnal man, accustomed to the ways of sin, may still persevere in them contrary to the suggestions of his conscience, and so be justly rewarded with death. The phrase, "I myself," which may be rendered literally, 'The same I,' means one and the same person, namely, him, whom the Apostle has hitherto personated, and whom he here describes as consisting of two parts, and so doing two things at once; with his understanding serving the law of God, and yet at the same time with his flesh submitting to the dictates of sin. Dr. Hammond. See the notes on ver. 17.

As if he had said, Thanks be to God, His gracious mercy and goodness through Jesus Christ delivers us by the powerful and effectual motives and helps of the Gospel. So then, to shut up this discourse, the sum and substance thereof is this: antecedently to the consideration of Gospel-grace this is the condition of man; by a diversity of inclinations he is drawn by different motives at one and the same time towards opposite objects; by reason and conscience in the spirit of his own mind he is of necessity obliged to approve the law of God, and strongly invited to act in conformity to that obligation, but his bodily appetites and desires, importunate to be gratified, often draw him into forbidden actions, and so bring him under subjection to sin and death eternal; from which miserable estate he is and can be delivered only by the mercy of the Gospel. T. Edwards.

Chap. VIII. The Christian religion is here shewn to be fully able both to cure the habits, and to atone for the guilt, of sins against the moral law: the merits of Christ's death being a sufficient satisfaction for past offences; and the spiritual nature of His laws, with the assistance of the Divine Spirit, enabling us to attain such habits of righteous living, as will qualify us for, and assure us of, a resurrection to eternal life and happiness. This spiritual life is the great obligation, and the only mark and character of a true Christian. It will entitle the Gentile, as well as the Jewish converts, to the future glory and happiness of God's true Church and children. Pyle.

St. Paul, in the foregoing chapter, having shewn the Jewish converts the necessity and obligation they were under of quitting the observance of the law on the one hand, which affording men neither possibility of escaping sin wholly, nor sufficient means of recovering from the guilt of it, left them unavoidably subject to the final wrath of God, the necessary consequence of every transgression by the terms of the Law; but that the Gospel on the other hand, having delivered men from the body of death and from the bondage of corruption, into the glorious liberty of the sons of God, enabled them to prevail not only over the temptations of sin within themselves, but also over all the persecutions and all the powers of the world, and also enabled them to bring forth unto God the fruits of obedience acceptable unto eternal life—he proceeds in this chapter to confirm the latter part of his argument by shewing how Christians are free from the sentence of condemnation, being delivered both from the guilt and dominion of sin by the sacrifice of the death of Christ, and the merciful terms of the Gospel established thereupon, whereby they are enabled to serve God acceptably unto justification and salvation, if they be careful so to do; that is, to perform the conditions of this gracious covenant on their part, by mortifying the deeds of the body, utterly forsaking all manner of vicious practices, and faithfully obeying the spiritual precepts of the Gospel, in the constant course of an holy and virtuous life, to which he therefore earnestly exhorts them. And then, from persuading them to continuance in well doing, he goes on to encourage them to perseverance in suffering patiently, by representing the greatness and the glory of the heavenly reward, the blessed privilege of conformity to the example of Christ, the Divine assistance of the Holy Spirit helping the infirmity of their prayers, enabling them to pray to God acceptably, and joining His own effectual intercession to God for those things in general which He saw best and most convenient for them, whereby they were assured that, if it pleased God to continue their afflictions, they would turn to their great advantage in this world as well as in that which is to come. And lastly, by representing the joyous sense and assurance which patience under their sufferings would afford them of God's present love and favour, the inestimable value of which blessing he continues to set forth in a most exalted and triumphant manner to the end of this chapter. T. Edwards.

Ver. 1. — to them which are in Christ Jesus, &c.] That is, to Christians; provided they forsake sin, and perform that evangelical obedience, and preserve that inward true purity, required by Christ under the Gospel. Dr. Hammond. Faith in Christ, joined with repentance and a sincere endeavour to obey His commands, will, through the merits of His death, avert the punishment due to our sins, and procure us admission into the kingdom of heaven. Bp. Tomline. "To walk after the flesh," is to be governed by those inordinate appetites, which have their seat in the flesh: "to walk after the Spirit," is to be habitually governed by reason and conscience, enlightened and strengthened by the Spirit of God. Hence such are said to be "led by the Spirit," ver. 14. Dr. Macknight.

2. For the law of the Spirit of life] That is, the Gospel, which commands spiritual inward purity, and quickens those who embrace it to new life by the grace of the Holy Spirit. Drs. Hammond and Wells.

—— hath made me free from the law of sin and death.] Hath freed us Christians from the power and captivity of sin, chap. vii. 23; and so also from death, the wages of sin. Dr. Hammond. It is observable, that the person who speaks in the foregoing chapter is introduced here as continuing the discourse, and shewing the method in which his deliverance from "the body of death," mentioned chap. vii. 24, was accomplished. Dr. Macknight.

3. For what the law could not do,] Or, 'as to that which was impossible to the law.' Dr. Hammond.

—— in that it was weak through the flesh,] The fleshly desires of men carrying them headlong into all sin, in despite of the prohibitions of the law, the law of Moses was by this means weak. Dr. Hammond. The weakness of the law is here attributed to the prevalence of that sensual and carnal principle, which, by betraying men into sin, rendered them still more obnoxious to death, in proportion as the precepts of the law were multiplied. Dean Stanhope.

—— in the likeness of sinful flesh,] That is, in a mortal body, which was like sinful flesh, and differed from it in nothing but in innocence. Dr. Hammond.

—— and for sin,] Namely, that He might be a sacrifice for sin. Dr. Hammond. The phrase "for sin," in the Old Testament, is the usual phrase for a sin-offering: the constant effect of which was, to make an atonement for the sin committed, that it might be forgiven, and the guilt of it might be done away. The effect of the sacrifice, delivered in these words, "and for sin condemned sin in the flesh," should be interpreted agreeably to the constant design of all sacrifices for sin: and so the words signify that He took away the condemning power of sin; He condemned that, which before condemned us, enabling us to say, "who is He that condemns us? it is Christ that died;" ver. 34. He killed sin, or made it dead by that death, which caused it not to be imputed to us to death, 2 Cor. v. 19. And this is the thing which the law could not do; it could not give life to a person condemned to death, Gal. iii. 21: it could not justify or free us from condemnation. Dr. Whitby.

The Apostle in the two preceding chapters having represented "sin" as a person, he expresses himself very appositely here, when he tells us, Christ put sin to death in the flesh, that is, in our body, where he (sin) had introduced himself at the fall. Dr. Macknight.

4. That the righteousness of the law might be fulfilled in us,] That is, the inward purity and righteousness which the law required. The phrase occurs only here and chap. ii. 26; where it plainly signifies the righteousness contained in the moral law, or those internal principles of holiness, justice, and goodness, which are comprised in it, these being "the weightier matters of the law," Matt. xxiii. 23; and the only things in which the uncircumcision, or the Gentiles, could keep the "righteousness of the law." Here therefore the phrase appears to bear the same sense, and so confutes the vain imaginations of the Antinomians. Dr. Whitby.

8 So then they that are in the flesh cannot please God.

9 But ye are not in the flesh, but in the Spirit, if so be that the Spirit of God dwell in you. Now if any man have not the Spirit of Christ, he is none of his.

10 And if Christ be in you, the body is

The first benefit obtained for us by Christ's death is justification, or a release from the guilt and punishment of sin. The second is sanctification, which is effected by the assistance and influence of God's Holy Spirit, enabling us to correct the corrupt principle called "flesh." Dean Stanhope.

"Fulfilled" here does not signify a complete exact obedience, but such an unblamable life, by sincere endeavours after righteousness, as shews us to be the faithful subjects of Christ, exempt from the dominion of sin: see chap. xiii. 8; Gal. vi. 2. A description of such, who thus fulfilled "the righteousness of the law," we have in St. Luke, chap. i. 6. As Christ in the flesh was wholly exempt from all taint of sin, so we, by that Spirit which was in Him, shall be exempt from the dominion of our carnal lusts, if we make it our choice and endeavour to live after the Spirit, ver. 9—11. For that which we are to perform by that Spirit, is the mortification of the deeds of the body, ver. 13. Locke.

—— who walk not after the flesh, but after the Spirit.] The terms of Scripture represent the Spirit of God as an assisting, not a forcing power; as not suspending our own powers, but enabling them; as imparting strength and faculty for our religious work, if we will use them: but whether we will use them or not, still depending upon ourselves. Agreeably hereunto St. Paul asserts, that "there is no condemnation to them who walk not after the flesh, but after the Spirit." The promise is, not to them who have the Spirit, but to them who walk after the Spirit. "To walk after the flesh" is to follow wherever the impulses of sensuality and selfishness lead us, which is a voluntary act. "To walk after the Spirit" is steadily and resolutely to obey good motions within us, whatever they cost us: which also is a voluntary act. All the language of this remarkable chapter proceeds in the same strain: namely, that after the Spirit of God is given, it remains and rests with ourselves whether we avail ourselves of it or not. "If ye through the Spirit do mortify the deeds of the body, ye shall live," ver. 13. It is through the Spirit that we are enabled to mortify the deeds of the body. But still, whether we mortify them or not, is our act; because it is made a subject of precept and exhortation to mortify them. Health is God's gift: but what use we will make of it, is our choice. Bodily strength is God's gift: but of what advantage it shall be to us, depends upon ourselves. Even so, the higher gift of the Spirit remains a gift, the value of which will be exceedingly great, will be little, will be none, will be even an increase of guilt and condemnation, according as it is applied and obeyed, or neglected and withstood. The fourth chapter of Ephesians, ver. 30, is a warning voice upon the subject: "Grieve not the Holy Spirit of God:" therefore He may be grieved: being given, He may be rejected: rejected, He may be withdrawn. Archdeacon Paley.

5. — do mind the things of the flesh;] The original verb signifies, to set one's affection on an object, and to use great pains in obtaining it, Col. iii. 2. Dr. Macknight. They that are carried by their own carnal inclinations, or by customs and habits of sin, do generally mind and meditate on carnal things. Dr. Hammond.

—— but they that are after the Spirit &c.] They that are led by the Spirit of Christ, the conduct of the Gospel, study and mind those things, wherein inward purity and sanctity consists. Dr. Hammond.

6. For to be carnally minded is death; &c.] As if he had said, And so one pursues the things which tend to death, and the other those things which tend to life. "For to be carnally minded is" the way which tends to "death," &c. Dr. Whitby.

7. Because the carnal mind is enmity against God: &c.] The carnal man can look for no better issue than "death," ver. 6; for his affections and desires are no better than mere enmity against God, utterly rebelling against the law of God; as those which neither are subject unto it, neither indeed, while they so continue, can be. Bp. Hall.

Here the Apostle gives the reason, why even those, that are in Christ Jesus, have received the Gospel, and are Christians, for to such he is here speaking, are not saved, unless they cease to walk after the flesh, because that runs directly counter to the law of God, and can never be brought into conformity and subjection to His commands. Such a settled contravention to His precepts cannot be suffered by the supreme Lord and Governour of the world in any of His creatures, without foregoing His sovereignty, and giving up the eternal immutable rule of right, to the overturning of the very foundations of all order and moral rectitude in the intellectual world. This, even in the judgment of men themselves, will be always thought a necessary piece of justice, for the keeping out of anarchy, disorder, and confusion, that those refractory subjects, who set up their own inclinations for their rule, against the law which was made to restrain those very inclinations, should feel the severity of the law, without which the authority of the law and law-maker cannot be preserved. Locke.

8. — they that are in the flesh] That is, they who live a worldly carnal life. Dr. Whitby. They who are not purified by the spiritual religion of Christ. Bp. Tomline.

9. But ye are not in the flesh, &c.] As if he had said, "But" it is not so with you Christians, that you cannot please God, for "ye are not in the flesh," &c. Dr. Whitby.

—— if so be that the Spirit of God dwell in you.] Enlightening your understandings, renewing your wills and affections, and inspiring your souls with an earnest desire after the favour and grace of God. The phrase "dwell," imports intimate fellowship, active operation, and constancy of abode. Burkitt.

—— Now if any man have not the Spirit of Christ, he is none of his.] Hence it is evident, that none are truly said to be in Christ, see ver. 1, by a profession of faith, unless they live in a manner answerable to that profession, and be renewed in mind, will, affections, and conversation. Dr. Whitby.

—— the Spirit of Christ,] Called, in the former part of the verse, "the Spirit of God," to teach us that He is "the Spirit of Christ," as Christ is God, and that Christ is truly God, one with the Father: otherwise the same Spirit could not be the Spirit of Christ and of God too. And as He is thus usually in Holy Scripture called, sometimes "the Spirit of God," and sometimes "the Spirit of Christ;" so, at other times, He is called absolutely "the Holy Spirit," or, which is the same thing, "the Holy Ghost," especially where the three Divine Persons are all named together, as Matt. xxviii. 19; 2 Cor. xiii. 14; 1 John v. 7; to shew, that, although He be the Spirit both of the Father and of the Son, yet He is so in such a manner as to be a distinct Person from both, as each of the other Persons also is. Bp. Beveridge.

10. And if Christ be in you,] If ye be Christians indeed, your lives corresponding to the purity of the Gospel of Christ. Dr. Hammond. Christ, or His Spirit, being in us; His Spirit, or God's Spirit, being in us, are expressions of the same import. Bp. Fell.

—— the body is dead because of sin; &c.] That is, Though your bodies indeed be liable to present death, like those of other men, by the unavoidable effect of Adam's transgression; yet will the power of the Divine Spirit raise them up again to an 11 But if the Spirit of him that raised up Jesus from the dead dwell in you, he that raised up Christ from the dead shall also quicken your mortal bodies ‖ by his Spirit that dwelleth in you.

immortal life, as the happy effect of our justification by Christ's death and sufferings. Pyle.

11. — by his Spirit that dwelleth in you.] It was the opinion of the Jews, derived from Ezek. xxxvii. 9, 10, that the resurrection shall be effected by virtue of the Holy Spirit. Thus was our Lord raised from the dead, 1 Pet. iii. 18. Thus, saith this verse, shall we be raised, who are "the temple of the Holy Ghost." The promise of being raised by "the Spirit of Christ" belongs only to them, whose bodies shall be raised to the resurrection of life eternal. As for others, they being only Christians in name, and not in truth and sincerity, and persons, to whom Christ will then say, "I never knew you;" they shall be raised by the power of Christ, but not by virtue of any union with the Spirit of Christ. Dr. Whitby.

The Apostle here contends, that happiness and immortality are, by means both of justification and of sanctification, privileges, which give a just preference to the Christian religion over any other religion whatsoever. He does not attempt the absurdity of denying that Christians die in common with other men: but he places their privilege in being restored to life, and such a future life, as far excels any advantages possible to be reaped from their continuance in the present life by never dying at all. This he alleges to be a benefit entirely derived from Christ. Dean Stanhope.

12. Therefore, brethren, we are debtors, &c.] That is, seeing the Holy Spirit dwelleth in us, quickening our souls for the present, in order that He may raise our bodies in time to come; furnishing the one with grace here, and fitting the other for glory hereafter; therefore we ought to live unto God, and not unto the flesh. Burkitt.

13. — the deeds of the body,] It means all sin, relating both to the inward and outward man: all evil dispositions, depraved habits, corrupt affections, as well as irregular actions; though "the body" only is mentioned, because there sin especially shews itself. Burkitt.

14. For as many as are led by the Spirit of God,] Living after Christ's example, and doing what He commands and enables us to do. Dr. Hammond.

—— they are the sons of God.] The strength of the argument will be clear from these considerations: 1st, That the adopted "sons of God" are "heirs of God, and joint-heirs with Christ," and so must reign with Him, ver. 17, which till they live again, and be raised from the dead, they cannot do; and that their adoption is "the redemption of their bodies" from corruption, ver. 23: 2dly, That we are then completely "the sons of God," when we are "children of the resurrection," Luke xx. 36; when we have "overcome," according to those words in Rev. xxi. 7, "He that overcometh shall inherit all things, and I will be his God, and he shall be My son." Dr. Whitby.

15. For ye have not received the spirit of bondage &c.] The Gospel does not load us, like bondslaves, with the intolerable yoke of numerous rites and ceremonies; nor does it only tell us our moral duties, without affording us grace or strength to perform them, and so render us only more guilty of death, and consequently subject us to fear. Dr. Wells.

—— the Spirit of adoption,] The Holy Spirit, who is so called, because He endues believers with a filial loving confidence in God, as their reconciled Father in Christ. He is here opposed to "the spirit of bondage," or 'of servitude;' or that slavish fear of God, which the Mosaick law, considered merely as the law of a carnal commandment, had a tendency to produce. Compare Gal. iv. 4—7; 2 Tim. i. 7. Parkhurst.

—— whereby we cry, Abba, Father.] Whereby we are emboldened to speak to God under the title of a loving Father. Bp. Hall.

The word "Abba" signifies Father in the Jewish language, that is, the Syro-Chaldaick. Dr. Doddridge.

This was a phrase, in which the Jewish bond-servants might not presume to address their masters. It intimates our being authorized to claim the rank of God's children. Abp. Secker.

16. The Spirit itself beareth witness with our spirit,] Or with our consciences, "that we," being thus led by the Spirit of God dwelling in us, "are the children of God." Dr. Wells.

This testimony with our spirits is the sanctification of them, the subjecting of our wills and affections to His influences, acting upon us by the mediation of our own thoughts, yet discoverable to be from Him, by their opposition to our natural corruption. It is by the sanctifying grace of this Spirit dwelling in us, that we are enabled to "mortify the deeds of the body:" they that do so are "led by Him:" and as many as are so led have thereby a testimony, that they are the children of God. Our wills and affections had contracted by their corruption an enmity against God, and a love of the world and vanity: the Holy Ghost unbends this perverseness, and directs them towards heaven. Dr. Glocester Ridley.

The Spirit of God doth not bear witness with the spirits of the faithful, that they are the children of God by an immediate oracle, voice, or whisper within them, in express words pronouncing their pardon and acceptation with God, or saying that they are the sons of God. This is a vain imagination, and as dangerous as it is vain: it being apt to lead some good men into despair, as not finding any such whisper within them, and to expose others to presumption and the delusion of the evil spirit. Such a vocal testimony of the Spirit is no where promised in Scripture, and therefore not to be expected by us. And that St. Paul means not here any such vocal testimony of the Spirit, is evident from hence, that this vocal testimony would be the immediate testimony of the Spirit alone, whereas the Apostle speaks of a testimony of the Spirit concurring and adjoining with the testimony of our spirits, that is, our minds and consciences. This testimony the Spirit bears, 1st, by those gracious fruits and effects, which He hath wrought in us; which when we discern and perceive, we do or may from thence conclude that we are the sons of God, those fruits and effects being the sure badge and livery of His children: 2dly, by enlightening our understandings, and assisting the faculties of our souls, as need requires, to discern those gracious fruits and effects which He hath wrought in us. In this way of explanation, and in no other, it is easy to understand the concurrence of God's Spirit and our spirit in this witness or testimony, that "we are the sons of God," and so heirs of salvation: and what part each of them hath therein. The Spirit of God hath the main and principal part; for it is that Spirit, which produces those graces in us which are the evidence of our adoption: it is He, who, as occasion requires, illuminates our understandings, and assists our memories, in discerning and recollecting those arguments of hope and comfort within ourselves. But then our spirits or understandings have their share in this testimony too. For God's Spirit doth witness, not without, but with, our spirits and understandings, so that our spirits concur and co-operate, and act their part in this matter too; we making use of our reason and understanding, in considering and reflecting upon those grounds of comfort, which the Spirit of God hath wrought in us, and from them drawing this comfortable conclusion to ourselves, that "we are the sons of God." Bp. Bull.

The Holy Spirit moves upon the minds of men in a most familiar way, so that His motions are not discernible by us from the natural operations of our minds. We feel them no otherwise than we do our thoughts and meditations; we cannot distinguish them by the manner of their affecting us from our natural reasonings, and the operations of truth upon our souls: so that if God had only designed to give the Holy Spirit to us, without making any mention of it in His word, we could never have known, unless it had been communicated to us by some private revelation, that our souls are moved by a Divine power, when we "love God and keep His commandments." This imperceptibleness of the impressions made upon our souls by the Divine Spirit, was that which our Saviour signified to Nicodemus by the similitude of the wind, "which bloweth where it listeth, and we hear the sound thereof, but cannot tell whence it cometh, nor whither it goeth." Dr. Stebbing.

—— if so be that we suffer with him, &c.] That is, in conformity to Him, when called out to it for the honour of God, and for the testimony of a good conscience. Dr. Doddridge.

In this excellent passage the Apostle opens a source of consolation to the children of God in every age; by having recourse to which they may not only refresh themselves under the severest sufferings, but derive new strength to bear them with fortitude. Dr. Macknight.

18. For I reckon &c.] The course of the Apostle's argument appears to be, that we have reason cheerfully to suffer with Christ, to the end that we may be glorified with Him, "forasmuch," says he, 'as I justly reckon,' &c. Dr. Wells.

—— are not worthy to be compared] St. Paul here pronounces the glorious reward of a future world so vastly superiour to the sufferings in the present, that it is an indignity offered to the former, so much as to name them together, or to suppose a proportion between them, fit to be made the ground of a comparison. Dean Stanhope.

19. For the earnest expectation of the creature] Or, the rational creation. Parkhurst. Every human creature, mankind in general, Jews as well as Gentiles. This seems to be the meaning of the word rendered "creature," in this and the two following verses; and of the phrase, "the whole creation," in the 22d verse. Dr. Macknight.

—— waiteth for the manifestation of the sons of God.] Mankind in general eagerly expect that glorious reward, which shall one day prove us to be the sons of an immortal God. The Apostle here proceeds to make good his estimate of the glory to be revealed in us, by the common sense and wants of mankind in general. Such seems to be the meaning of this and the three following verses. For "the manifestation of the sons of God," denotes that resurrection of the body, and immortality of the whole man, which is a privilege entirely owing to Christ, and an operation effected by the power of that Almighty Spirit, which raised Him from the dead. And though it cannot be affirmed, that all mankind have constantly, and every where, entertained a firm and positive persuasion of such an immortality; yet have some dark and indistinct presages of, and wishes for, it been very general. Dean Stanhope.

20. For the creature was made subject to vanity,] That is, the whole race of men became liable to corruption. Dr. Whitby, Dean Stanhope. The state of man, in this frail short life, subject to inconveniences, sufferings, and death, may very well be called "vanity," compared to the impassable estate of eternal life, the inheritance of the sons of God. Locke.

—— not willingly,] Not by the personal misbehaviour of those, who are now most deeply affected with it. Dr. Doddridge. Not by their own act. Dr. Macknight.

—— but by reason of him &c.] But through the just dispensation of God, who, for the disobedience of the first man, hath inflicted death upon them: yet this not without end or hope. Dean Stanhope, Dr. Macknight.

21. — the creature itself also] Even the heathens themselves. Dr. Macknight.

—— from the bondage of corruption] "Corruption" here signifies the destruction of the body by death: and "the bondage of corruption," the continuation of the destroyed body in the grave. Dr. Macknight. The meaning of the verse is, that a time is coming, when death shall be succeeded by immortality, and this effect of Adam's sin be taken off from his posterity. Dean Stanhope.

22. For we know that the whole creation groaneth &c.] That is, that the whole Gentile world has all along been deeply sensible of the miseries and frail state of human life; full of longings and eager wishes after a better and more durable condition. Pyle. The ancient heathens rightly observed, that the soul of man gave many indications of a principle, nobler than matter. They considered the unsatisfactory nature of its present enjoyments. They felt a continual inclination to look beyond the narrow limits of this life. They lamented the very unequal mixture of bitter cast into every man's cup. And hence they were apt to conclude, that God had some better things in store for so excellent a creature; and that His wisdom and goodness would never have endued man with qualifications for happiness peculiar to a rational being, without some provision for his attainment of it. By these considerations they supported themselves under temporal evils, with the thought of some amends to be made for their virtue and patience. These seem to be the "earnest expectation," the melancholy sense of their "bondage to corruption," the "hopes of liberty," the "groaning and travailing in pain," meant by St. Paul in this passage. Dean Stanhope.

23. — which have the firstfruits of the Spirit,] Namely, those gifts of the Holy Spirit, which believers obtain in this life, as a foretaste and earnest of their eternal inheritance. Compare Eph. i. 14; Heb. vi. 5. Parkhurst.

—— even we ourselves groan within ourselves, &c.] That is, we long with great earnestness for the evidence and completion of our sonship; even the final rescuing of these mortal and now afflicted bodies from death and corruption, and their admission into our eternal inheritance with Christ, in the kingdom of the Father. Dean Stanhope. See the note from Dr. Whitby on ver. 14.

—— the redemption of our body.] This phrase is probably used, because the resurrection of the children of God to eternal life is obtained by the merit of the blood of Christ, agreeably to the meaning of the original word. See the note on chap. iii. 24. Dr. Macknight.

24. For we are saved by hope:] Of this resurrection and redemption of the body, "being begotten to a lively hope," &c. See 1 Pet. i. 3; see also Rom. v. 2; and Gal. v. 5. Dr. Whitby.

—— but hope that is seen is not hope:] "Hope," by an usual figure, is put for the object of hope. Dr. Macknight.

In this and the following verse the Apostle remarks, that our Christian life is as yet but a life of hope: that we live upon expectation, not enjoyment. But this hope, as a duty and condition of our future glory, obliges us to go through the sufferings of life with all patience and constancy. Pyle.

26. Likewise the Spirit also helpeth our infirmities:] Succoureth and relieveth them. Bp. Hall.

—— but the Spirit itself maketh intercession for us] Namely, the Spirit of God, who is said to intercede for us, not as an advocate or mediator betwixt God and us, that being the office of our great High Priest; but as an exciter or director of us in our addresses to God, to render them, for matter according to the will of God, and for manner fervent and effectual; and to make our very sighs and groanings prevalent. See Exod. ii. 24; vi. 5; Judg. ii. 18; Ps. xxxviii. 9; cii. 20; Acts vii. 34. Thus when our Lord had "groaned in the Spirit," John xi. 33, He said, "Father, I thank Thee that Thou hast heard Me." Dr. Whitby.

—— with groanings which cannot be uttered.] Guiding and inspiring us with such good notions and desires, as we cannot oftentimes in words express. Pyle.

The Spirit maketh intercession for us, not as Christ doth in heaven; but, as it is explained in the beginning of the verse, by "helping our infirmities:" that is, by directing our intentions, by strengthening our faith, by exciting our desires, by supplying us, not, as some vainly imagine, with words, but "with groanings which cannot be uttered," with such fervent and earnest affections, which no words are able to express, and none can know, but He that "searcheth the hearts, and knoweth what is the mind of the Spirit," ver. 27. Bp. Beveridge.

27. — knoweth what is the mind of the Spirit,] That is, His desire and intention, without any need of its being articulately formed in words. Dr. Hammond.

—— because he maketh intercession &c.] Rather, as in the margin, 'that He maketh intercession,' &c.: the meaning is, that He assists the minds of all distressed Christians, so that they do nothing but what is consistent with God's holy will and religion. Pyle.

28. —to them who are the called according to his purpose.] That is, those that according to God's counsels revealed in the Gospel are the men to whom God's favour and so His promises belong. Dr. Hammond. The proper way to ascertain the meaning of the Apostle in this and the two following verses, seems to be by settling the true import of the "purpose" mentioned in this, and of "foreknow" in the next. By the "purpose" then, mentioned here and in other places of St. Paul's Epistle, in reference to eternal salvation, is meant God's purpose to save by Christ, all that upon the preaching of the Gospel should embrace it, and live according to it. And as God is said to "know," that is, to approve, "the way of the righteous," Ps. i. 6; and as in this very Epistle, chap. vii. 15, the Jew without the grace of God is said not to know, that is, not to approve or "allow," that, which he does through the strength of his carnal appetites, so by God's "foreknowing" here is to be understood, His foreapproving such as should embrace the Gospel, and live accordingly: and such indeed, and such only, did He "predestinate," that is, foredetermine to be "conformed to the image of His Son." In order thereunto He "called them," that is, made known to them the Gospel: and being so "called," and answering the end of their calling, by believing and living up to the rules of the Gospel, and so becoming "the called according to His purpose," He also "justified them," &c. Compare also Matt. vii. 23. Dr. Wells.

God is represented in Scripture as having preordained the redemption of mankind through Christ, before the foundation of the world. This redemption was to be in the nature of a covenant between God and man; and the salvation of every individual was to depend upon his observance of the proposed conditions. Men, in consequence of their free agency, would have it in their power to accept or reject this offered salvation: and God by His prescience foresaw who would accept, and who would reject it. Those, who He foresaw would perform the conditions of the Gospel covenant, may be said to be predestinated to life; "for whom He did foreknow, He also did predestinate." This appears to me the only sense, in which predestination is reconcileable with the attributes of God, and the free agency of man. Bp. Tomline.

All the Greek Fathers always, and all the Latin Fathers, who lived before St. Austin, were wont to say, that they were predestinated to life, of whom God foresaw that they would live piously and righteously; or, as others say, of whom He foresaw that they would believe and persevere. Vossius, Dr. Whitby.

29. —to be conformed to the image of his Son,] Both in holiness; see 2 Cor. iii. 18; Eph. i. 3—7, 11, 12: and in glory; see 1 Cor. xv. 49; Phil. iii. 21. Parkhurst.

some of the things mentioned in this verse are future, they may, according to the usage of Scripture, be represented as past, to shew the certainty of their happening. Thus before His death, Christ spoke of His body, as already given, and broken, Luke xxii. 19; 1 Cor. xi. 24. Dr. Macknight.

31. What shall we then say] Or, 'What say we then to these things?' That is, what further ground of assurance, and so of patient waiting for these things, can we want? Dr. Whitby.

—— If God be for us,] That is, 'Since God is for us, who can be against us?' Can Satan, or the world, or the unbelieving Jews, with any success oppose our enjoying the inheritance of the children of God, with the other blessings promised to the seed of Abraham? Dr. Macknight.

32. He that spared not his own Son,] The original word, rendered "his own," is highly emphatical, as it is likewise in John v. 18. Christ is called God's own Son, to distinguish Him from others who are sons of God by creation, or by adoption, that is, by some temporal dignity conferred upon them. No argument, equal to this, was ever addressed to creatures, capable of being persuaded and obliged. For while it convinces the understanding, it raises every tender and devout feeling of the heart, and is a continual source both of hope and gratitude. Dr. Macknight.

—— all things?] Namely, all that are profitable for us, and conducive to our eternal happiness. Dr. Wells.

33. Who shall lay any thing to the charge of God's elect?] See Isaiah i. 8, 9. Who shall produce any accusation against those, whom God approves of? This the Jews did most bitterly against the Christians, and especially against St. Paul the Apostle of the Gentiles, judging them for breakers of the law, &c. chap. ii. 1. Dr. Hammond. It appears from the context, that the "elect" here are those who are approved and accepted by God. See 28th and following verses. Parkhurst.

34. —who also maketh intercession for us.] Presenting there His obedience, His sufferings, His prayers, and our prayers sanctified through Him. Bp. Fell.

35. Who shall separate us from the love of Christ?] Namely, that love which He hath showed in procuring this redemption for us, ver. 37. Dr. Whitby. It is not in the power of any persecutor upon earth to put us out of the favour of God, or to deprive us of the benefits of His love to us, when Christ hath thus fortified us, and ordered even afflictions themselves to tend to our good. We may now challenge all present or possible evils to do their worst. Dr. Hammond. See below note on ver. 38.

36. As it is written, For thy sake we are killed &c.] The Apostle here quotes a passage, spoken by the Psalmist of himself, Ps. xliv. 22; but punctually applicable to the Christians at that time. Dr. Hammond.

37. —we are more than conquerors] For we not only bear, but "glory in tribulations," chap. v. 3. Dr. Whitby.

—— through him that loved us.] Through the assistance of the grace of Christ. Dr. Hammond.

38. —that neither death, nor life, &c.] That neither fear of death, nor hope of life, nor evil angels, nor persecuting princes or potentates, nor the pressures that are already upon us, nor those that are now ready to come, nor sublimity of honours, nor depth of ignominy, nor any thing else, (that is, whatever else can be named, as having any influence to separate believers from the love of God, exercised towards us through Christ, Dr. Macknight:) shall be able to annul or make vain the promises of the Gospel, or deprive us of those advantages which belong to Christians, according to God's faithful promises, immutably, irreversibly. Dr. Hammond.

The Apostle here observes, that they who truly love God, and testify that love by their obedience to His commands, John xv. 10, and by their patient sufferings for His sake, shall not be separated from his affections towards them: and he accordingly intimates, that such persons, continuing in the love of God, shall be preserved by Him from the temptations here mentioned, or enabled by His grace and Holy Spirit to overcome them. Dr. Whitby.

The latter part of this chapter, beginning at ver. 31, contains a description, in most forcible and glowing expressions, of the privileges, the hopes, and the temper of a true Christian, and shews what magnanimity, and what greatness of sentiment the Gospel is able to infuse into them who understand and believe its doctrines. It is therefore a most proper conclusion of a discourse, in which, by the strongest reasoning, practices are recommended, which ennoble the human mind, yield the greatest and the most permanent joys, and prepare men for becoming the companions of angels, and for dwelling with God Himself through all eternity. Dr. Macknight.

Christ, by the merit of those very sufferings which He proposes to our imitation, has purchased for us all such extraordinary aids and assistances, as are requisite to support us under them. By what He underwent for our sakes in His life and at His death, He obtained of God, not only a release from the punishment of our sins, but new powers to qualify us for a further increase in virtue; not only the pardoning, but sanctifying grace of His Spirit; by the means of which we can now "crucify the flesh with the affections and lusts," Gal. v. 24; mortify and subdue all our irregular passions; undervalue pleasures; rejoice in afflictions; and "walk even as He walked," in humility and patience, in purity and holiness. Weak and impotent we are, but "His grace is sufficient for us," 2 Cor. xii. 9: we can do nothing of ourselves, but "we can do all things through Christ which strengtheneth us," Phil. iv. 13: and, in confidence of this assistance we may venture to take to ourselves the words of His fervent Apostle, and say "Who shall separate us from the love of Christ?" Who or what shall hinder us from obeying His precepts, and from transcribing His practice? "Shall tribulation, or distress, or persecution, or famine, or nakedness, or peril, or sword? Nay, in all these things we are more than conquerors, through Him that loved us." Bp. Atterbury.

Chap. IX. The Apostle in this chapter discourses concerning the rejection of the Jewish nation from being any longer God's Church and people upon their infidelity; and concerning the admission of the believing Gentiles in their room. He handles this melancholy argument with great tenderness and concern for his nation. He shews that national mercies and privileges are at God's free disposal and arbitrary limitation: it was so in the case of Abraham's covenant, and the promise made to him: in the instances of Isaac and Ishmael, Jacob and Esau. He argues that the sins and ingratitude of any church or people may be pardoned or punished, more or less, sooner or later, as Divine wisdom and justice shall see fit; as in the instances of Moses and the Israelites, and of Pharaoh and the Egyptians. He then reproves the infidel Jews for a stubborn objection against the Divine punishments. And he shews their rejection for refusing the Gospel religion, and the reception of the Gentiles into the Christian covenant in their stead, to be agreeable to Divine truth, justice, and wisdom, and to the Scriptures of the Old Testament. Pyle.

Ver. 1. I say the truth in Christ, &c.] The Apostle seems to be extremely sensible of the unhappy bias the Jews lay under, and expresses the deepest concern on that account. He tells them that their rejection from being any longer the people of God is a subject he would not have touched upon, did not truth, and a deep regard for their own eternal happiness, extort it from him. He begins the chapter accordingly with a solemn protestation of the great love he bore them, and of the affliction he suffered on account of their continued obstinacy and unbelief. Dean Tucker.

The Apostle protests in the most solemn manner, that he was so far from being influenced by any prejudice or aversion against the Jews since his conversion to Christianity, that on the contrary, his grief and trouble of mind for their impenitency and infidelity, and for their consequent rejection, and the judgments which God would send upon them, were much greater and more uneasy to him than all the other afflictions and calamities he met with in the world. T. Edwards.

—— in Christ,—in the Holy Ghost,] This verse not only shews, that in cases of great moment a Christian may establish his saying by an oath, but also that he may swear by Christ and the Holy Ghost, and call them to be witnesses of the sincerity of his own conscience. Hereby the Apostle performed an act of religious worship to them; he acknowledged their divinity; see Deut. vi. 13; and ascribed to them the knowledge of the secrets of men's hearts, which is the property of God alone. Dr. Whitby. The Apostle here appealing to Christ and the Holy Ghost, as judges of his conscience, is a demonstration that they are Persons, and that they are God. Leslie.

3.—I could wish that myself were accursed from Christ] That is, as the ancients interpret it, If it were proper to make such wish, if it could avail to make so great a multitude happy, I could even wish so great a blessing to my brethren, though at the loss of my own happiness. Dr. Whitby.

Or, 'I could wish to be made an anathema,' a person separated to destruction: he would have been content to have devoted himself to death, as a voluntary offering, or expiatory sacrifice, if by that means he could have prevented the ruin and rejection of his countrymen. This was a way of speaking well understood both by Jews and Gentiles in those times; and signified the highest degree of patriotism or publick spirit; namely, so far as for any one to offer to lay down his life, and devote himself to death, to avert any publick judgment or calamity. The original word "anathema" is so used in the old Greek writers. Dean Tucker, Parkhurst. Compare Exod. xxxii. 32; and see the note there.

For a man, upon any account whatsoever, to be content to become subject to the curse of Christ, and to His final displeasure, is so far beyond the utmost bounds even of Christian charity itself, that it is utterly inconsistent with the nature of a rational creature, either to desire, or so much as to be capable of being prevailed with even to submit to. It is certain therefore the meaning of the Apostle has been misunderstood, and that his intent in this passage was not to wish himself subject to the eternal wrath of God, (which is utterly impossible and absurd,) but the wishing himself accursed from Christ for the sake of his own nation and people, is to wish that (if it was possible) he by bearing himself the temporal judgments which he saw coming upon them upon account of their being accursed from Christ through their own obstinacy and incredulity, might restore them again to the favour of God. The persons, for whom St. Paul could find in his heart to suffer thus, are the Jewish nation. Now nations can be punished, as such, only in this world, and therefore as the curse here spoken of is national it must be temporal. T. Edwards.

4. Who are Israelites;] That is, persons descended from one whose faith and virtue were so eminent, that as a prince he prevailed with God, and so was denominated Israel, as a mark of God's affection, Gen. xxxii. 28. Dr. Whitby.

—— to whom pertaineth the adoption,] God having owned them as His sons and firstborn, Exod. iv. 22, 23; Hos. xi. 1. Dr. Whitby.

—— and the covenants,] Made with Abraham, Gal. iii. 17; and with Moses, Exod. xxiv. 8: the two covenants, Gal. iv. 24: the old and new covenant, Jer. xxxi. 33; xxxii. 40. Dr. Whitby.

—— and the service of God,] The prescribed manner of worship appointed by God Himself. Dr. Hammond.

5. Whose are the fathers,] Who are descended of the patriarchs, Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob. Dr. Wells.

—— and of whom as concerning the flesh Christ came,] He being born of one of their nation, and so according to the flesh their offspring, even He, "who" according to His divine nature "is over all, God blessed for ever. Amen." Dr. Whitby. These words are so clear a proof of the divinity of Christ, that they confute all heresies upon that subject. Dr. Hammond.

It is evident that Christ is here called God, even He who came of the Jews, though not as He came from them, that is, according to the flesh, which is here distinguished from His Godhead. Secondly, He is so called God, as not to be one of the many gods, but the one supreme or most high God; for He is "God over all." Thirdly, He hath also added the title of "blessed," which of itself elsewhere signifieth the supreme God, and was always used by the Jews to express that one God of Israel. Wherefore it cannot be conceived that St. Paul should write to the Christians, most of whom then were converted Jews or proselytes, and give unto our Saviour not only the name of God, but also add that title which they always gave unto the one God of Israel, and to none but Him; except he did intend they should believe Him to be the same God, whom they always in that manner and under that notion had adored. As therefore the Apostle speaketh of "the God and Father of our Lord Jesus Christ, which is blessed for evermore," 2 Cor. xi. 31; of "the Creator, who is blessed for ever, Amen," Rom. i. 25; and thereby doth signify the supreme Deity, which was so glorified by the Israelites; and doth also testify that we worship the same God under the Gospel, which they did under the Law: so doth he speak of Christ in as sublime a style, "who is over all, God blessed for ever, Amen;" and thereby doth testify the equality, or rather identity, of His Deity. Bp. Pearson.

The Apostle here closes the illustrious catalogue of the many glorious privileges the Jews were formerly endowed with, with the sum total and substance of all. All this seems to be introduced in order to put them upon reflecting on their melancholy situation, and the greatness of their downfall, if they continued still to spurn at the method of salvation, now proposed to their acceptance. Dean Tucker.

6. Not as though the word of God hath taken none effect.] The Apostle here foresaw another objection ready to arise. For to this the Jews would reply, that they could not be cast off, because of the promise made unto their fathers. But to this he answers, that Almighty God had already sufficiently fulfilled these promises, or might take some other method in the course of His providence for their accomplishment; so that this could be no bar against their present rejection. "Not," says he, "as though the word of God hath taken none effect:" that is, it hath taken sufficient effect to justify the divine veracity in making the promise of an everlasting covenant to your father Abraham. "For they are not all Israel, which are of Israel: neither because they are the seed of Abraham, are they all children." As if he had said, It is not the being a mere natural descendant from Israel, which constitutes a true Israelite, intended by this covenant. To be a true son of Abraham implies a great deal more than to be barely of the seed of Abraham. This was designed to intimate to them, though in an indirect manner, for fear of giving offence, that the faithful Gentiles were more properly the seed of Abraham than themselves. So that the promise even thus might receive its completion. Dean Tucker.

7.—but, In Isaac shall thy seed be called. &c.] The Apostle here takes occasion, from the consideration of the nature of the promise made unto their fathers, to reason with them somewhat to the following effect. If you, my countrymen, will but attend to the nature of that covenant, and consider on what terms it was originally founded, you of all people will have the least reason to complain. For you should consider, that it was originally founded in the mere good pleasure, and owing to the sovereign disposal of Almighty God. The promise was first made to Abraham freely, that his posterity should be the Church and peculiar people of God, and enjoy the land of Canaan for their possession. And Abraham was desirous that these privileges should be fixed in the line of Ishmael: but God denied his request, and gave them to his son Isaac. Again, you have another remarkable instance of the sovereign will and pleasure of Almighty God, in the donation of such kind of national privileges, specified in the case of Esau and Jacob. These two children were both the descendants of Abraham, of Sarah, and of Isaac; persons to whom the promise had been expressly limited: Rebecca was the mother of them both; and consequently there could be no preference in that respect. The infants were yet unborn; neither of them having done good or evil: yet it was predicted of Rebecca, "Two nations are in thy womb, and two manner of people shall be separated from thy bowels; and the one people shall be stronger than the other people, and the elder shall serve the younger." Thus was the posterity of Jacob, though the younger branch, "loved" and preferred, but that of Esau "hated," that is, slighted in comparison of the other, not equally favoured and advanced. Dean Tucker.

11.—the purpose of God according to election] That is, the purpose of God in choosing or preferring one nation rather than another to certain privileges and blessings. Drs. Hammond and Whitby, Parkhurst. That "the purpose" here mentioned relates not to the eternal state of the persons, but to the national privileges of their descendants, see Gen. xxv. 23, and the notes there.

13. As it is written, &c.] See Mal. i. 2, and the note there.

——Jacob have I loved,] See Deut. vii. 6—8. Hosea uses the word "beloved," to express God's restoring the Jews to the honour of being His Church and people, after having cast them off for a time. See ver. 25. Dr. Macknight.

——but Esau have I hated.] "Loving" and "hating" in the Hebrew language often signify no more than choosing one thing or person, and leaving another; or preferring one before another. Our Saviour uses this Hebraism in the same manner, John xii. 25, and Matt. x. 39; see also Gen. xxix. 31. Pyle.

"Hated," as also "hardeneth," ver. 18, is taken negatively, for not loving, not having mercy. So "blinded," Rom. xi. 7; John xii. 40. For positive hardening, &c. presupposes, not only God's will, but man's sin also. Bp. Fell.

14. What shall we say then? Is there unrighteousness with God? God forbid.] As if he had said, Consider again: if it was no act of injustice at first to choose you preferably to your elder brethren the Edomites, to be so long His peculiar Church and people, what wrong can be done to you, if the Gentiles are now called in? And what reason have you of all people to complain, who are now rejected, not as the posterity of Esau were, through an act of sovereign will and pleasure; but on account of your own personal crimes and infidelity? Dean Tucker.

15. For he saith to Moses, &c.] Nor is it any wrong done you, that even the idolatrous Gentiles should now be preferred, and you cast out. For when whole nations have forfeited their charter-covenant by their rebellion and disobedience, surely Almighty God may forgive and receive which of them He pleases into His future favour and protection. Take an example of this from your own history in the matter of the golden calf, when God pardoned your national revolt and idolatry, saying unto Moses, "I will have mercy on whom I will have mercy," &c. So then in short, as to the great point of national privileges, the sum is this: it is "not of him that willeth," because Abraham willed for Ishmael, and Isaac willed for Esau; "nor of him that runneth;" but of God that sheweth mercy." These are acts mercy on whom I will have mercy, and I will have compassion on whom I will have compassion.

16 So then it is not of him that willeth, nor of him that runneth, but of God that sheweth mercy.

of mere favour and bounty, which none can challenge or have a right to expect, and consequently none can complain of injustice, when the preference is given to others. Dean Tucker.

16. — him that willeth,] Abraham willed that Ishmael might be partaker of the blessings promised to his seed, when he said, "O that Ishmael might live before Thee!" Gen. xvii. 18: and when he was grieved at the saying of Sarah, "The son of this bondwoman shall not be heir with my son, even with Isaac," Gen. xxi. 10. Dr. Whitby. Also Isaac willed to bestow his blessing on Esau, Gen. xxvii. 4. Dr. Hammond.

——him that runneth,] Alluding to Esau, when he ran to fetch venison, and came back running and crying, "Hast thou but one blessing," &c. Gen. xxvii. 5, 38. Drs. Whitby and Hammond.

17. For the scripture saith unto Pharaoh, &c.] The Apostle continues his argument in this manner: And as you have thus seen, how consonant it is to His usual practice, that God should now extend His favours to the Gentiles, I will in the next place set forth how His present rejection of you Jews is agreeable to His known method of proceeding with respect to punishments. For you know, Pharaoh had justly deserved to be made an example of God's vengeance, before it was so visibly executed upon him. But yet "the Scripture saith, For this same purpose have I raised thee up," that is, I have made thee to stand, preserving thee, suspending to punish thee, when I sent all My other plagues, "that I might shew My power" more illustriously "in thee, and that My name might" thereby "be declared throughout all the earth." And thus it is as to the rejection of you Jews. Almighty God might very justly have deprived your nation of those privileges which ye were so unworthy of, long before ye had committed this last and finishing act of impiety in crucifying the Lord of glory, and despising the subsequent offers of His pardon and forgiveness through the Gospel. But in order to make a more signal example of your disobedience, He continued your state and nation in being, that your rejection and the call of the Gentiles might appear to all the world to be the immediate effect of His overruling providence. And thus "hath He mercy on whom He will have mercy, and whom He will He hardeneth;" that is, He sometimes spares offenders, and remits these national judgments; but at other times, when they do not amend on these warnings, but grow more incorrigible, He gives them up to a judicial blindness, reserving and continuing them in that hardness of heart which they had before contracted, till such a season as will be most proper for displaying His judgments against them. Dean Tucker. See the notes on Exod. ix. 16; iv. 21.

No authority or example can be produced to prove that God did actually harden, or had a will to harden, any but such as had formerly rebelled against the light, abused His patience, and despised His gracious dispensations. See chap. i. 21, 26; Ps. lxxxi. 11, 12. Bp. Womack.

19. Thou wilt say then &c.] St. Paul here anticipates an objection of the Jews: If God hath determined to reject us from being any longer His Church and people, "Why doth He yet find fault?" Why is this rejection laid to our charge as a crime, which He Himself hath decreed to be done? If "His will" be so, "who hath resisted it?" Dean Tucker.

20. Nay but, O man, who art thou that repliest against God?] Will you reply, and charge upon Him the fault which is absolutely in yourselves? Is not His decree of rejecting you the consequence of your own impenitence and unbelief? If His will be at present to cast you off, it is because you will not listen to the proposals of reconciliation which have been often made you; nay, if it had so pleased the Divine Being, you might have been originally rejected, and the Gentiles have been preferred. And if it had been so, what could you have objected? "Shall the thing formed say to Him that formed it, Why hast Thou made me thus? Hath not the potter power over the clay, of the same lump to make one vessel unto honour, and another unto dishonour?" Are not these national privileges matters of mere favour and bounty, which therefore depend upon the absolute pleasure and appointment of God? just as it depends upon the will of the potter, what use he shall fit his vessel to, while it is on the wheel, whether to a superiour or inferiour end. But as for your part, you have still less reason to complain, if you are now cast off. For Almighty God, with respect to you, is not only as a potter, who might at first have made you to be vessels to dishonour; that is, might have denied you these national honours; but He is as a judge, who, "willing to shew His wrath, and to make His power known, endured with much long-suffering the vessels of wrath fitted to destruction;" that is, He will now execute upon you those judgments, which you had long deserved, but which were hitherto respited: and on the other hand "He will make known the riches of His glory on the vessels of mercy, which He had afore prepared unto glory; even us, whom He hath called, not of the Jews only, but also of the Gentiles:" that is, He will at last extend His favours to the Gentiles, as well as Jews, having prepared them by this rejection of you, and other providential circumstances, to listen to the calls of the Gospel. Dean Tucker.

—— Shall the thing formed &c.] The Apostle alludes to Isai. xlv. 9; where in answer to the Jews, who seem to have taken it amiss that their deliverance was to be accomplished by Cyrus, a heathen prince, the Prophet says, "Woe unto him that striveth with his Maker! Let the potsherd strive with the potsherds of the earth. Shall the clay say to him that fashioneth it, What makest thou? or thy work, He hath no hands?" Questions implying, that nations, which derive their existence and continuance merely from the power and goodness of God, have no right to find fault with Him, because He hath denied them this or that advantage, or because He bears with the wickedness of some nations for a long time, while He instantly punishes others. Dr. Macknight.

22. —fitted to destruction:] Either by themselves, or by their wickedness. In the following verse a different phraseology is used concerning "the vessels of mercy;" for it is said of them, "which He had afore prepared unto glory:" namely, the glory of being made the Church and people of God. Dr. Macknight.

CHAP. X.

5 The scripture sheweth the difference betwixt the righteousness of the law, and this of faith, 11 and that all, both Jew and Gentile, that believe, shall not be confounded, 18 and that the Gentiles shall receive the word and believe. 19 Israel was not ignorant of these things.

St Paul in a parallel place, Col. i, has so fully explained these words, that he who will read ver. 27 of that chapter, with the context there, can be in no manner of doubt what St. Paul means here. Locke.

25. As he saith also in Osee,] The Apostle here, in proof of his preceding proposition, cites the prophecies of Hosea. First he alleges two clauses, but in an inverted order, from the 23d verse of the second chapter, which seem to relate more immediately to the call of the Gentiles: "I will call them My people, &c. and her beloved," &c. And to these he subjoins, as relating solely to the restoration of the Jews, that part of the prophecy of the first chapter, which affirms, that "in the place where it was said unto them, Ye are not My people, there shall they be called the children of the living God." From these detached passages, thus connected, he derives the confirmation of his proposition concerning the joint call of Jew and Gentile to the mercy of God. Bp. Horsley.

27. Esaias also crieth concerning Israel, &c.] And when I say, but a few of your nation can be saved, while the infidelity is so general, I have your Prophet's own words to justify me, Isai. x. 22, 23. 'Though the number of the Israelites be as the sand of the sea, yet but a remnant of them will so behave themselves as to be saved. For, says he, when the Lord comes to cast up the numbers of good and bad, He will find but a short balance of true Israelites, and the destruction of the unbelievers will be very large and great.' Pyle.

29. And as Esaias said before, &c.] Which is agreeable to another account he gives of them, at a time when their sins were at a high pitch, Isai. i. 9: Surely, except the Lord of Sabaoth had been merciful to a seed, that is, a few righteous persons among us, we had been as Sodom, and like unto Gomorrah; that is, utterly and finally destroyed. Pyle.

——the Lord of Sabaoth] Or "of hosts," Isai. vi. 3. The phrase signifies, that God is the sovereign Lord of the "innumerable company of angels," Heb. xii. 22; of the host of heaven, which the heathen worshipped, the sun, moon, and stars; of the hosts and armies of all nations on earth; particularly the Jewish people, whom He led forth to battle; and lastly, of the Christian Church, which the Old Testament foretold should be "terrible, as an army with banners," (Cant. vi. 4, 10,) and the New describes, as furnished with "weapons of warfare," &c. see 2 Cor. x. 4, 5. The word "Sabaoth," which is the Hebrew word for "hosts," is preserved also in Jam. v. 4, and in that hymn of singular excellence, the 'Te Deum.' Abp. Secker.

30. What shall we say then?] Rather, 'What do we say then?' That is, What therefore is the substance of what I have intended in this discourse? It is even this, "That the Gentiles," &c. Dr. Whitby.

——That the Gentiles, which followed not after righteousness, &c.] Who had formerly no notions of Christ, nor expected pardon and salvation by Him, have now obtained it, and are made members of God's Church, by embracing the Gospel religion. Pyle.

31.—Which followed after the law of righteousness,] Or, who were solicitous and zealous as to the law of Moses, which, considered in opposition to the Gospel, was a law only of external righteousness, hath not attained to, or embraced, the Gospel, which is the law of true spiritual righteousness. Dr. Wells.

From this recapitulation of the whole dispute of the Apostle in this chapter, and his declaration that the design of it was to justify God in this proceeding and dealing with both Jews and Gentiles, it is very evident, that it was not at all designed to determine any thing, touching God's absolute decrees of dealing with mankind in general in any certain way as to their final and eternal state; but only to justify His dealings, according to what He had actually done with the unbelieving Jews, rejecting them upon their stubborn infidelity, and the hardness of their hearts; and with the believing Gentiles, admitting them to be His Church and people, and the spiritual seed of Abraham, upon their faith and submission to the terms which He had proposed for their justification and acceptance. Dr. Whitby.

32, 33.—For they stumbled at that stumblingstone; As it is written, &c.] God had pointed out to the Jews the way of salvation by faith, by saying, Behold, I lay in Zion a corner stone, elect, precious, and whosoever believeth in Him shall not be ashamed, Isai. xxviii. 16. But this corner stone became to them of Israel, according to the words of the same Prophet in another place, "a stone of stumbling, and a rock of offence," chap. viii. 14. They were offended at Him because of His poverty, humility, and outward meanness, and the spirituality of His kingdom; and so they stumbled and fell off from being God's people, and excluded themselves from the blessings offered them by the promised Messiah; see 1 Pet. ii. 6—8. Dr. Whitby.

Chap. X. The Apostle expresses his earnest desire that the Jewish nation might yet believe the Gospel: he allows their zeal for God and religion, but shows how mistaken it is: he compares the severe terms of justification under the law with the gracious condition of the Gospel covenant: he contends that this covenant is offered both to Gentile and Jew, according to the ancient prophecies; that the Apostles therefore must needs preach to the Gentiles, in order to convert them to Christianity; and that the success of their preaching upon both people is agreeable to the Scripture predictions. Pyle.

Ver. 1. — my heart's desire and prayer — for Israel &c.] Had Israel been under an absolute decree of rejection and reprobation, this prayer of the Apostle must have been not only a vain prayer, but also an opposing of his desire to the good pleasure of Almighty God revealed to him. Dr. Whitby.

—— that they might be saved.] That they might believe and turn to Christ in good time, and so be delivered from the fatal destruction which attends them, and withal be saved eternally. Dr. Hammond.

2. — a zeal of God, but not according to knowledge.] Their religious zeal is very great, but then it is an ignorant and erroneous zeal; aiming indeed at a good end, but placed upon wrong means for attaining it. Pyle.

3. — of God's righteousness,] Of God's way of justifying men under the Gospel. Dr. Hammond.

4. For Christ is the end of the law &c.] That is, the law was not designed to justify men without Christ; but on the contrary it was designed to bring men to Christ, in order to be justified through faith in Him. Dr. Wells. See Gal. iii. 24. Dr. Whitby. The types of the law were intended to preserve among the Jews the expectation of that atonement for sin, which Christ was to make by His death; and its curse, to make them sensible that they could not be justified by obeying the law, but must come to Christ for righteousness; that is, to the Gospel concerning Christ, which was preached to Abraham in the covenant made with him, Gal. iii. 8. Dr. Macknight.

5. — which doeth those things] Namely, the several branches of the Jewish law. The difference of the Law and Gospel consists in this; the Law promised life only on condition of doing all that was required, and pronounced a curse on them that did not continue in all; the Gospel, whilst it requires not many things which the law required, allows place for repentance, and sure mercy and pardon to the sinner upon his return to new life, provided he sincerely obeys Christ, and lays hold on His sacrifice for expiation. Thus faith is said to be the condition of our justification, and not 'the doing of these things:' the law of faith, not of works, is that by which the Christian must live. Dr. Hammond.

6. But the righteousness which is of faith speaketh on this wise,] Here the Apostle personifies the righteousness by faith, and makes it say of its doctrines and precepts, what Moses said concerning his commandment, (Deut. xxx. 11—14,) though in a sense somewhat different. Dr. Macknight.

—— Say not in thine heart, Who shall ascend into heaven? &c.] The two phrases here used, of "ascending into heaven," and "descending into the deep," are proverbial expressions to signify doing, or attempting to do, some hard impossible thing. They had been used by Moses in this sense, Deut. xxx. 12, to express the readiness with which the Jews might know their moral duty: and they are here accommodated by the Apostle, to express the easiness of the Gospel condition above that of the Mosaical law. Dr. Hammond.

6, 7. — to bring Christ down from above:)—to bring up Christ again from the dead.)] The coming down of Christ from heaven, and the resurrection of Christ from the dead, are two of the most important articles in the Christian religion, on which our salvation depends. It would have been impossible for us to contribute towards their being performed: the Apostle teaches us, that we are not required to contribute; but Christ Himself having wrought these things for us, our belief of them is the great fundamental act of faith required of us, and that is not a very difficult task. Dr. Hammond.

7. — into the deep?] The words in Deut. xxx. 13, are, "Who shall go over the sea?" That is, say some Jewish interpreters, the great sea, or the deep sea; and the Jerusalem Targum renders the words thus, 'O that there were one like Jonas the Prophet who would descend into the depth of the great sea!' Now we know that Jonas' descending into the deep was a type of Christ; and this might give occasion to the Apostle to allude to their traditional interpretation or paraphrase of the words of Moses. Dr. Whitby.

8. But what saith it? The word is nigh thee, &c.] But thus the evangelical justification is described: That, which is required of us towards it, is within the reach of any ordinary understanding to conceive, being proclaimed by us to all that will believe; and within the compass of a Christian to perform, through Christ that strengthens him. Dr. Hammond.

This was spoken literally by Moses of the law then written, and by God's descent on Sinai revealed to all: but especially meant of, and verified in, the revelation of Christ and the Gospel, and the Spirit in our hearts enabling us to obey the word. Bp. Fell.

—— nigh thee,] Things obscure and difficult were said by the Hebrews to be "far off:" but things easily understood and easily attained, were said to be "nigh," or "present," Rom. vii. 18—21. Of this latter character was the duty of faith. Drs. Hammond and Macknight.

9. — if thou shalt confess with thy mouth the Lord Jesus,] That is, in all times, particularly in a time of persecution, own Christ Jesus to be our Lord, and declare that we will serve Him, and adhere to Him, be ruled of Him, and expect to be saved only by Him. Burkitt.

—— and shalt believe in thine heart &c.] As the principle of Christian practice; conforming thy practice to that belief in forsaking sin and arising to new life, in imitation of Christ's rising from the grave. Dr. Hammond.

The true saving faith, at the same time that it informs the understanding, influences the will and affections. The Christian man believeth with the heart, whilst infidelity proceeds from an averseness of our affections, from "an evil heart of unbelief." Heb. iii. 12. Dr. Glocester Ridley.

18 But I say, Have they not heard? Yes verily, [h] their sound went into all the earth, and their words unto the ends of the world.

[h] Ps. 19. 4.

—— that God hath raised him from the dead,] It seems to have been mentioned as the principal article to be believed in order to salvation, because by that miracle God demonstrated Jesus to be His Son, established His authority as a lawgiver, and rendered all the things which He had taught and promised indubitable. Dr. Macknight.

10 For with the heart man believeth unto righteousness;] That is, by Christian faith he becomes acceptable to God, and gradually improves in all piety and virtue. Every one of our actions derives its value from the belief or persuasion, with which it is performed. Were we to do ever so good a work, without being moved to it by a good principle, we might be more useful, but we should scarce be better, than if we had not done it at all. But when we act from conviction of an inward obligation, if it be of morals, then we act virtuously; if of religion, piously. Therefore without faith of one sort, we can do neither; and in proportion as our faith is perfect, we shall do both. A mere sense of the fitness of moral virtue is no inconsiderable antidote against many sins. But religious faith hath unspeakable advantages beyond that which is moral only. For the serious persuasion of a witness, "who seeth in secret," of an omnipotent Sovereign, equally benevolent, wise, just, and holy, must inconceivably animate to every thing good, and deter from every thing evil. Abp. Secker.

To "believe with the heart," is to believe in such a manner as to engage the affections, and to influence the actions. This sincere faith, carrying the believer to obey God and Christ, as far as he is able, is called "the obedience of faith," and "the righteousness of faith." Also, because God for the sake of Christ will count this kind of faith to the believer for righteousness, it is called "the righteousness of God;" the righteousness which God hath appointed for sinners, and which He will accept and reward. Dr. Macknight.

—— confession is made unto salvation.] The Spirit of God, who clearly foresaw what would be the turn of mankind, that some would think it needless to believe, and others to profess their belief, hath warned men separately against each of these errours, in many places of the New Testament, and jointly against both in this passage: which plainly declares, that faith in the Gospel is the ground of our acceptance with God at present, and that an open acknowledgment of the Gospel in consequence of that faith, is one of the things necessary to our happiness hereafter. This duty requires, that without forwardness or affectation, without vehemence or bitterness, every Christian avow himself, in every becoming way, to be what he is: by constantly attending the publick worship of God; renewing his baptismal vow in the solemn ordinance of confirmation; statedly coming to the holy table; and shewing, by the reverence of his deportment, that he doeth all this as matter of conscience, not of form; by practising with simplicity and openness every other precept of his religion; and leaving no room to doubt from what principle he acts: by "abstaining from all appearance of evil" in his own behaviour and discourse, and approving the like abstinence in that of others: by despising the contempt or hatred, which may fall upon him for such a conduct; "esteeming" as an honour "the reproach of Christ," and "choosing rather to suffer affliction," if he must, "with the people of God, than to enjoy the pleasures of sin for a season." Abp. Secker.

13. — whosoever shall call upon the name of the Lord] This text presents us with a double argument in favour of our Lord's divinity. First, it applies to Him what by the Prophet Joel is spoken of Jehovah: secondly, it affirms Him to be the object of religious adoration. Either of these particulars does indeed imply the other. For if He be Jehovah, He must be the object of religious adoration; and, if the object of religious adoration, He must be Jehovah. Bp. Horne.

"The Lord" in this verse must be the same with "the Lord Jesus" in the ninth verse; otherwise, St. Paul's argument is invalid and fallacious. But "the Lord" in this verse is no other than "Jehovah," as appears from the Prophet Joel, from whom this Scripture is taken. Therefore our Saviour is here called "Lord," as that name or title is the interpretation of Jehovah. Bp. Pearson.

14. How then shall they call on him &c.] The Apostle, having made it appear from the foregoing passages of the Jewish Scriptures, that God intended to save the Gentiles as well as the Jews through faith in Christ, here proceeds to shew the unreasonableness of the Jews in being displeased with him, forasmuch as his preaching the Gospel was in obedience to God's mission of him, and agreeable to what was in general foretold by their own Prophets. Dr. Wells.

15. — as it is written, How beautiful &c.] As if he had said, The necessity of persons being sent to preach the Gospel to the Gentiles being evident from the foregoing induction, we accordingly have been sent to preach the Gospel to them, agreeably to what is foretold by Isaiah, chap. iii. 7. Dr. Wells.

16. But they have not all obeyed the gospel. &c.] The Apostle, whilst he acknowledges that all, who had heard the Gospel, did not receive it, observes that this was not wonderful, and was indeed no other than had been foretold. Dr. Wells.

17. So then faith cometh by hearing, &c.] The meaning is, It is very evident, and these testimonies shew, that faith comes by hearing, and hearing by the preaching of the word of God. Burkitt, Dr. Whitby. Whence it follows, that the Jews had no reason to look on St. Paul, as a person ill-affected to them, because he professed himself to be in a special manner the Apostle of the Gentiles. Dr. Wells.

18. But I say, Have they not heard? &c.] It was no less than a miracle, that the Gospel in the space of a few years should be preached to all nations, and planted in the remotest parts of the world: yet thus it was; which makes the Apostle here apply to the light of the Gospel, what David applies to the material light of the heavens, Ps. xix. 4. Burkitt.

19. But I say, Did not Israel know? &c.] That is, did they not know of God's intention to call the Gentiles to salvation, as well as themselves: and consequently can their ignorance be admitted as any excuse for their taking offence at the Gospel, because it offers salvation to the Gentiles as well as to them? The Apostle answers the question by citing prophecies from Moses and Isaiah, which foretell that such was the intention of God. Dr. Wells.

20. But Esaias is very bold,] Or, speaks yet more expressly concerning the offer of salvation to the Gentiles, and their acceptance of it. In the following verse the Apostle observes, that the obstinate infidelity of the Jews, and their rejection of the Gospel, were signified by the same Prophet with equal plainness. Pyle.

Chap. XI. St. Paul shews, that though the main body of the Jewish nation are rejected from being God's people, yet they are not universally cast off, but a remnant is saved, who by embracing the Gospel continue a part of His peculiar people in the Church of Christ. Whence it follows, that since this privilege is preserved to them by their obedience to the Gospel, it cannot be had by the observance of the law; and therefore they only who embrace Christianity are now the people of God. Neither hath God rejected the main body of the Jewish nation; but when the conversion of the Gentiles, professing the Gospel in its purity and simplicity, shall be advanced to that degree of fulness which God foresees and intends, it shall become the means of converting the Jews, and so of restoring the whole race of mankind from the death of sin, to a new state of life, in which the earth shall be filled with the knowledge of the Lord, and the people shall be all righteous. Which consideration ought to prevail with the Gentile Christians, not to be highly conceited of themselves, and despise the Jews; but to take heed to preserve their station by a behaviour worthy of the privilege they enjoy, considering that as the Jews were cut off for infidelity, and they have obtained their present station by faithfulness, so unless they persevere in that faithfulness, they too shall be cut off likewise. Neither ought they to despise the Jews as utterly rejected of God, but to esteem them as the children of the Patriarchs, and included in the promises made to them, by virtue of which they are in due time to be reinstated in God's Church, and in His love and favour, who can and will restore them according to the prophecies of Scripture concerning them: for the disposal of God's providence to His Church is such, that the unbelief of the Jews at first, and the converting of the Gentiles thereupon, finally terminates in the more illustrious reducing of the Jews likewise, and the salvation of both to the glory of God's unsearchable wisdom and mercy.

After which the Apostle breaks out into a devout admiration of this glorious scheme of Providence, concerning both Jews and Gentiles, and then concludes with a pious doxology. T. Edwards.

Ver. 1. — For I also am an Israelite, &c.] Not a proselyte converted to the Jewish faith, but a Jew by lineal descent from Abraham: yet am not I cast off by God. Burkitt.

2. — which he foreknew.] That is, whom He once made choice of, as His peculiar Church and people. Compare Amos iii. 2; 1 Pet. i. 2. Parkhurst, Pyle, Dr. Whitby.

—— Wot ye not what the scripture saith of Elias? &c.] The Apostle says, that the state of the Jews now is much as it was in Elijah's time; and that some of the nation still remain the Church of God, by embracing the Gospel. Pyle.

—— how he maketh intercession to God against Israel,] The phrase, rendered "maketh intercession against," signifies to accuse or charge a person with a crime. Dr. Whitby.

5. — a remnant according to the election of grace.] That is, a remnant of Jews, reserved or left, according as they were elected or chosen out from the rest of their countrymen, to the blessings of the Gospel through the free grace of God vouchsafed to them on their believing in Christ, without any previous merit on their parts. See Eph. ii. 8, 9. Parkhurst.

6. And if by grace, then it is no more of works: &c.] The Apostle takes occasion to observe by the way, that if this remnant is now the people of God by the grace of the Gospel, then it is not so by virtue of the works of the law. "Work" in this discourse, is understood to confer a right of debt; but "grace" is understood to bestow something, to which there is no such claim. Dr. Wells.

7. — Israel hath not obtained &c.] That is, the generality of the people of Israel. Dr. Hammond.

"The election" is a collective appellation of the part elected, which in other places He calls "a remnant." They were those Jews who sought righteousness by faith in Christ, and not by the deeds of the law, and so became the people of God, that people which He had chosen to be His. Locke.

The correspondent Hebrew and Greek terms, signifying "to give," are often used to signify permission. Dr. Whitby.

The Apostle means, that the generality of the Jews resisted Christ when He was preached to them, and so grew obstinately blind: and thus in them was performed what Isaiah spoke of those, who first hardened their hearts against God: God gave them up to blindness and deafness, and so they continue to this day. Dr. Hammond.

"Unto this day" is added by the Apostle, to shew that the Jews always had the same vicious dispositions. Dr. Macknight.

9. And David saith, Let their table &c.] Or, 'This table shall be,' &c. The words may be properly rendered in the future tense. Dr. Whitby. What David said prophetically of some in his time, applies to the hardening of the Jews on the preaching of the Gospel. Dr. Hammond.

——through their fall salvation is come unto the Gentiles,] That is, upon their refusing to embrace the Gospel, the wisdom of God has ordered the Gospel to be preached to the Gentiles. Dr. Wells. Here "salvation" signifies the knowledge and means of salvation. Dr. Macknight.

—— for to provoke them to jealousy.] That is, to excite the Jews to emulation of the faith and obedience of the Gentiles. Dr. Wells.

12. —of the world,] Of the Gentiles, as opposed to the Jews. Parkhurst.

—— how much more their fulness?] That is, the coming in of the Jews to the faith of Christ. Dr. Wells. The Apostle's meaning is, that the general conversion of the Jews will afford to the Gentiles the completest evidence of the truth of the Gospel, by shewing them that it is the finishing of a grand scheme, which God had been carrying on for the salvation of mankind, by means of His dispensation towards the Jews. Dr. Macknight.

14. —I may provoke to emulation them which are my flesh,] My brethren, the Jews. Dr. Hammond. This seems to be said in allusion to those words of God, Deut. xxxii. 21: that seeing them, who before were not the people of God, now chosen to be His people, and invested with the privileges which formerly belonged to them, they might be induced to believe, and so might still share in all these blessings. Dr. Whitby.

I speak thus particularly to the Gentile believers among you, inasmuch as I am the Apostle of the Gentiles; but I magnify mine office, I set forth the greatness and extent of the blessing communicated to them by my ministry, that I may provoke my natural kinsmen, the Jews, by way of emulation, to embrace the Gospel likewise, and so may save some of them. T. Edwards.

15. —be the reconciling of the world,] That is, a means of sending and spreading the Gospel among the Gentiles, and so of bringing them into the Church, and obtaining pardon for them upon their repentance. Dr. Hammond.

—— life from the dead?] That is, it shall be matter of the greatest joy, such as receiving a dead friend raised to life again; and this the more, because the general conversion of the Jews shall be accompanied or attended with the general conversion of the rest of the world. Dr. Wells.

16. For if the firstfruit be holy, &c.] The Apostle argues, that it cannot be thought improbable that there should be such a receiving of the Israelites into favour, as the people of God, upon a comparison of their natural state with that of the Gentiles. Dr. Wells. The argument runs thus: If God so loved Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, as to engage His word that "He would be a God unto them and to their seed after them," Gen. xvii. 7; and by thus entering into covenant with them, hallowed to Himself all their posterity, even as "the firstfruits" of their dough, being made an offering, hallowed the whole "lump," Numb. xv. 20; then will He in His good time be so mindful of them, as to bring them again into His covenant, so that "they shall be His people, and He shall be their God;" for "as touching the election they are (still) beloved for the fathers' sake." Dr. Whitby.

—— if the root be holy, &c.] This is an allusion to Jer. xi. 16, where the Jewish nation, made the people or visible Church of God by virtue of the covenant at Sinai, are represented under the figure of "a green olive tree," of which Abraham is "the root," and his descendants by Isaac "the branches." Dr. Macknight.

17. —a wild olive tree,] Rather, 'a wild olive branch;' for branches only are ingrafted. Drs. Hammond and Macknight.

—— of the root and fatness of the olive tree;] That is, of the promises made to the seed of Abraham, remission of sins and justification. Dr. Hammond. All the outward privileges and ordinances, all spiritual benefits and blessings, which belong to the Jewish Church. Burkitt.

The juice of the cultivated olive is called "fatness," because from its fruit, which is formed by that juice, oil is expressed. Dr. Macknight.

18. Boast not against the branches.] Though the great fault, that most disordered the Church and principally exercised the Apostle's care in this Epistle, was from the Jews pressing the necessity of legal observances, and not brooking that the Gentiles, though converts to Christianity, should be admitted into their communion, without being circumcised; yet it is plain from this verse, as also from chap. xiv. 3, 10, that the convert Gentiles were not wholly without fault on their side, in treating the Jews with disesteem and contempt. To this also, as it comes in his way, he applies fit remedies, particularly in this chapter and chap. xiv. Locke.

—— thou bearest not the root, but the root thee.] Remember, that the blessings pertaining to thee, a Christian, are derived to thee from the promise made to Abraham and his spiritual seed, but no benefit accrues to Abraham or his race by any thing derived from thee. Dr. Wells.

20. — Be not highminded,] Vaunt not thyself over them, because of thy present condition: "but fear," lest thy case should hereafter be no better than that of the rejected Jews. Drs. Whitby and Wells. The best preservative from falling is humility and holy fear. If we stand in the day of trial, it is the fear of falling which must enable us to stand. Let us take heed we fall not, by thinking it impossible to fall. Burkitt.

22. — toward thee, goodness, if thou continue in his goodness:] Infinite mercy on the Gentiles, if they make a fit use of the mercy afforded them: if having received the Gospel, they obey it, and walk worthy of it. Dr. Hammond.

—— otherwise thou also shalt be cut off.] The Lord is with a people only whilst they are with Him: if they serve and seek Him, He will be found of them; but if they forsake Him, He will cast them off for ever. Burkitt.

23. — for God is able to graff them in again.] God can, and certainly will, receive them again. Dr. Hammond. From the power of God in this place, we may reasonably conclude His will also. Compare chap. xiv. 4; 2 Cor. ix. 8. Dr. Whitby.

24. For if thou wert — graffed contrary to nature — how much more shall these, &c.] This reasoning is very just. The conversion of the Jews, though it hath not yet happened, appears more probable than did the conversion of the Gentiles, before that event took place. Dr. Macknight.

25. — of this mystery,] Concerning the intended calling of the now rejected Jews. Dr. Whitby. Termed a "mystery," because it was hidden or unknown, till revealed. Parkhurst.

The Apostle here proves that the rejection of the Jews was neither total nor final; not total, because "blindness happened to Israel" only "in part;" not final, but for a time only, namely, "till the fulness of the Gentiles should be come in," that is, till the time of the more complete conversion of the Gentiles. Burkitt, Dr. Whitby.

26. And so all Israel shall be saved:] That is, called and put into a state of salvation. Dr. Whitby. Shall be converted. Dr. Wells. By coming into the Christian Church, they shall have the means of salvation bestowed on them. Dr. Macknight. It is plain that the salvation which St. Paul speaks of in this discourse, concerning the nation of the Jews and the Gentile world in the gross, is not eternal happiness in heaven, but the profession of the true religion here on earth. That all the Jewish nation may become the people of God again by taking up the Christian profession, may be easily conceived. But that every person of such a Christian nation, shall attain eternal salvation in heaven, no one can imagine to be here intended. Locke.

—— as it is written, &c.] Hence it appears from the predictions of the Prophets of God, that there shall be a general calling of the Jews to the faith of the Gospel before the second coming of Christ. Burkitt.

It has been well remarked, that, as this Epistle was written long after the most remarkable conversion of the Jews by the first preaching of the Apostles, and after St. Paul had been about thirty years engaged in his work, it appears that the prophecies relating to the calling of the Jews were not accomplished then, and consequently are not yet accomplished. Dr. Doddridge.

28. — they are enemies] To God; that is, they are no longer the people of God: but then this is "for your sakes," the fall and diminishing of them being the enriching of you; you being admitted to be the people of God on their being cast off. Dr. Wells.

—— but as touching the election,] Namely, of that nation to be an holy people to Himself. Dr. Whitby. The very persons here said to be "beloved" in respect of "the election," are in the preceding clause said to be "enemies" in respect of "the Gospel." Wherefore this election cannot be of individuals to eternal life, but it is that national election, whereby the Jews were made the Church and people of God. In respect of that "election" the Jews are still "beloved" of God. For although they be cast off for their unbelief, yet in consequence of the promises made to their fathers they are in some future period to become the people of God by believing the Gospel. Dr. Whitby remarks, that there is a twofold "election" of the Jews mentioned in this chapter: one, whereby they were made the people of God through their natural descent from the fathers, and which Moses has described, Deut. vii. 6—8. The other, whereby such of them as believed in Christ, were made the people of God under the Gospel dispensation. This latter "election" is mentioned in the seventh verse. Dr. Macknight.

29. For the gifts and calling of God are without repentance.] God will not repent of the special favours allowed to this people, and His promises made to their fathers. Dr. Hammond.

The reason is, because promises of this kind are founded upon such grounds as cannot be altered; even upon the original fixed

30. — have not believed God,] Were in a state of idolatry, vice, and superstition. Pyle. Were disobedient. Drs. Hammond and Whitby. The fault of the Gentiles consisted in their not obeying God, so far as their reason, if rightly used, would have directed them. On this account St. Paul tells them, chap. i. 20, they were "without excuse." Dr. Wells.

—— have now obtained mercy through their unbelief:] Have now, upon the Jews rejecting the Gospel, had the Gospel preached to you. Dr. Hammond.

31. — through your mercy] That they also may obtain mercy together with you, and you with them, the fulness of the Gentiles coming in with their conversion. This argument for the calling of the Jews runs thus: If God hath called the Gentiles to His grace, after a long idolatry and infidelity, though they were never before admitted to those privileges which the Jews enjoyed, nor had God promised to be their God for ever, much more will He recall His chosen people from their infidelity. Dr. Whitby.

32. For God hath concluded them all in unbelief,] He hath suffered both Jews and Gentiles successively for some time to remain under the power of unbelief and disobedience, that so He might in His own time fulfil the great counsel of His goodness, in shewing undeserved mercy to all, both Jew and Gentile, and ordering things by His wise and gracious Providence so as to bring them all to the Christian faith. Burkitt, Dr. Wells.

From all the foregoing arguments we may collect, that the conversion of the Jewish nation to the Christian faith has good foundation in the holy Scriptures: it has been the received doctrine of the Church of Christ in all ages. Burkitt.

33. O the depth of the riches &c.] Here the Apostle concludes the chapter with an awful admiration at the depth of the abundant grace and goodness of God, in bearing with the infidelity of the Jews, and the obstinacy of the Gentiles: as also of His unsearchable wisdom in making first the rejection of the Jews a mean of calling the Gentiles, and then working upon the obstinate Jews by His mercy shewn to the Gentiles. By "judgments" here some understand the decrees and determinations of God's will; by "ways" the administration of His Providence, in order to the execution of those decrees. Burkitt.

—— the wisdom and knowledge of God!] His "knowledge," in foreknowing how Jews and Gentiles would behave themselves; and His "wisdom" in ordering things accordingly for the best. Dr. Wells.

—— unsearchable — past finding out!] "Unsearchable" to any finite understanding. Dr. Whitby.

O the unfathomable depth of the infinite wisdom and knowledge of God in these wonderful dispensations both of mercy and severity to the Jews and Gentiles successively! How unsearchable are His eternal counsels, and the methods as well as the grounds and reasons of His dealings above human comprehension! for, as the Scripture saith, "Who hath known the mind of the Lord, or who hath been His counseller?" Who hath taught Him to form this glorious all-wise and merciful constitution of Providence? Or who can pretend any claim of right to these undeserved favours, these gracious effects of His free bounty? Let him make out that claim, and he shall surely have it. But vain above all vanity are such thoughts; for from His creation all things receive their being; by His Providence all things are upheld, preserved, governed and disposed; and to His glory they all terminate. T. Edwards.

35. Or who hath first given to him, &c.] By these questions the Apostle intimates, that we are not able to comprehend the wisdom of God, and therefore ought not to take upon us to advise Him what to do, much less to find fault with what He does, like the unbelieving Jews, in refusing to embrace the Gospel, because thereby salvation was offered to the Gentiles as well as to them. And that we mortals cannot lay any debt upon God by first bestowing any thing upon Him; and therefore we cannot claim any thing of God by way of debt, as due either to the Jew above the Gentile, or to the Gentile above the Jew. The inference is, that both Jew and Gentile ought humbly to submit to the wise dispensations of God. Dr. Wells.

The Apostle in this conclusion of His discourse, as Locke observes, had an especial regard to the Jews, whom in an elegant and inoffensive manner He rebuked for their presumption in finding fault with the Divine dispensations: as if God had done them an injury by admitting the Gentiles into His covenant and Church. Dr. Macknight.

36. For of him, &c.] "Of Him," as the Creator and doer; "and through Him," as the director and disposer; "and to Him," that is, to His glory, as the end. Dr. Wells.

When we see the Jews for so great a length of time preserved under calamities, which would have been long since the ruin of any other people, our regard and attention ought to be strongly excited towards them. Extraordinary was their beginning, and their progress; more extraordinary perhaps will be their end: for, if they abide not still in unbelief, they, as the natural branches, may surely be grafted in again; and there can be little doubt that such an event will take place. It is said, they are dispersed, "until the times of the Gentiles be fulfilled;" and that "blindness in part is happened to Israel, until the fulness of the Gentiles be come in." It seems evidently to be implied, that, at the period mentioned, whenever it shall come, their dispersion will cease, and their blindness be removed. Glorious things are spoken of them by their own Prophets, which do not seem, as yet, to have received their full and proper accomplishment. When the Gentiles had revolted from the true religion, revealed after the fall, the Church subsisted for two thousand years in the family of Abraham. Since the apostasy of the Jews it hath subsisted nearly the same space of time among the Gentiles. And what saith St. Paul? "As ye in times past have not believed God, yet have now obtained mercy through their unbelief, even so have these also now not believed, that through your mercy they also may obtain mercy." The very mercy shewn to the Gentiles is to be a means of bringing the Jews to the faith, and perhaps we can no where meet with an instance of a more popular and affectionate turn, than that, by which St. Paul seems to find a reason for his zeal to convert the Gentiles in his love to his own countrymen the Jews, that he may thereby provoke them to emulation. Let us second his endeavours to effect this, by our love and our good works: let us in our lives and conversations shew them a religion, whose attractive excellencies may invite and compel them to embrace it. Nor let us omit to observe, that, as Gentiles, while we labour to promote their interest, we likewise shall, by so doing, promote our own. So signal an event as the conversion of the Jews,

If the casting away of them were the reconciling of the world, what shall the receiving of them be, but life from the dead?" Bp. Horne.

Chap. XII. The Apostle, having concluded his argument, proceeds, according to his usual method in all his Epistles, to draw an inference of exhortation from what he had before said, in order to persuade men to the practice of virtue and righteousness; and because the finishing point, in which his argument terminates, is the observation that all the great dispensations of Providence are with unsearchable wisdom designed finally to issue in events of mercy, it is therefore with great eloquence of affection that he lays the stress of his exhortation upon that particular motive in what follows. T. Edwards.

From this and the following chapters, in which St. Paul, having treated of justification and the calling of the Gentiles, speaks of the duties of Christian morality, it appears that the design of the Gospel is the practice of holiness and good works; and that this in particular is the effect which ought to be produced by the doctrine of our redemption, as well as the consideration of the great mercy that God hath manifested to us in His Son. Ostervald.

Ver. 1.—brethren,] By this affectionate term the Apostle addresses the believing Romans. Burkitt.

——by the mercies of God,] This is the argument, which St. Paul employs, to persuade the Christian converts to give themselves up to God and to His service. These "mercies," as revealed in the Gospel, are the most proper, powerful, and effectual motive to prevail upon sinners, who have not yet devoted themselves to God, to do it; and upon those who have done it, to do it more and more. Burkitt.

——that ye present your bodies &c.] "A living sacrifice," in opposition to the dead ones under the law; "holy," in opposition to those external, carnal, legal ones, which had in them no intrinsecal goodness: "acceptable unto God," whereas the others were not so of themselves, nor unless joined with a holy life; nor are they now any longer so at all, having been abolished by Christ. Dr. Hammond.

——which is your reasonable service.] This will be an oblation of a rational, as those were of brute irrational creatures; and it proceeds upon rational motives. Dean Stanhope.

2. And be not conformed to this world:] Do not accommodate yourselves to the corrupt principles and customs, to the sinful courses and practices, of the men of the world. Burkitt. The Gospel forbids conformity to the world, by no means with an intention that we should be singular in matters of indifference, but resolute against compliances unlawful or dangerous. Abp. Secker.

Such is the state of the world, that the exhortation of the Apostle, "not to be conformed to it," is never unsuitable and unnecessary. He said it to the Roman converts; and for them it was surely a proper caution. They dwelt in a city, which was the seat of wealth and power, and also of every kind of debauchery; for these things go frequently together. One would imagine that such exhortations should not be so necessary now in Christian nations, in reformed and Protestant nations, were true religion is taught and professed. But still the world is the world, and evil abounds where virtue ought to abound. Truth and virtue are both of them the offspring of heaven, and were originally designed to be inseparable companions: and one would think that no power of men or devils could part them, and set them at variance. But so it is, that in the more enlightened regions of the earth, men's practice is by no means conformable to their knowledge. Dr. Jortin.

——this world:] In the style of the Scriptures, "the world" very often signifies the corrupted principles, maxims, fashions, customs, and manners of the world. If virtue and innocence had been the general and predominant character of mankind, the word would have been used in a good sense: but since wickedness hath covered the face of the earth, there arose a necessity of giving a bad sense to a word in itself harmless and inoffensive. "The world" therefore usually signifies a society of vicious beings; and the manners of the world mean manners that are degenerated and corrupted. Dr. Jortin.

——by the renewing of your mind,] By a change of your sentiments and principles from what they formerly were. Pyle.

——that ye may prove what is that good, &c.] That so ye may discern, and delight in, and practise those precepts of substantial and complete holiness, enjoined by the Gospel. Dean Stanhope.

3. For I say, &c.] Having exhorted to an holy life in general, and to a spiritual renovation of mind in order to it, the Apostle comes now to a close exhortation to more particular duties; beginning with modesty and true humility of mind. Burkitt.

——through the grace given unto me,] In respect of that apostolical authority which is given to me by the favour and commission of Christ. Dr. Hammond.

——not to think of himself more highly than he ought to think;] From this it is probable, that irregularities in the exercise of the spiritual gifts had taken place, or were likely to take place, at Rome, as at Corinth, 1 Cor. xii. 16; at Philippi, Phil. ii. 3; and at Thessalonica, 1 Thess. v. 19, 20. These the Apostle endeavoured to correct or prevent by the excellent rules prescribed in this passage. Dr. Macknight.

——but to think soberly, according as God hath dealt &c.] To be content with that part and station, which the providence of God, and the gifts vouchsafed him, have allotted to his share. Dean Stanhope.

——the measure of faith.] "Faith" is mentioned as a particular spiritual gift, 1 Cor. xii. 9. But here, by an usual figure, it is put for all the spiritual gifts, of which Christ distributed to each that share which He judged proper; called, Eph. iv. 7, "the measure of the gift of Christ." By exhorting the Romans to behave wisely "according to their measure of faith," the Apostle tacitly reproved such of them, as, not considering the nature of their own gifts, aspired to offices in the Church, for which they were not qualified. Dr. Macknight.

4.—in one body,] In one natural body. Dr. Whitby. This analogy between the natural and the mystical body is solemnly insisted on in other parts of the New Testament. Dean Stanhope.

5. So we, being many, &c.] As in the natural body the members are many, but united under one head, and mutually related to each other; so in the mystical body the persons are many, but all united in Christ. And though some be higher, and some lower; some more, and some less, active and honourable; yet still this difference of place and office does not hinder the mutual relation that there is, and the mutual help and usefulness that there ought to be, even between those that are most distant. Dean Stanhope.

6. — differing according to the grace that is given to us,] According to our several designations. Dr. Hammond. As 'the grace of apostleship' signifies the office of an Apostle graciously conferred, so the "grace" here said to be given to the Romans may mean the particular station and office in the Church, assigned to individuals by Christ. Dr. Macknight.

—— whether prophecy,] The gift either of declaring or of predicting truths by Divine inspiration. Parkhurst.

—— according to the proportion of faith;] That is, so far as he has the gift of inspiration, which was bestowed upon men in proportion to their faith. Pyle. According to the measure of the miraculous faith imparted to him, enabling him now to reveal mysteries, now to foretell future events, now to disclose the secrets of men, according as God, upon his faith, shall grant him ability to do it. The phrase answers to "the measure of faith," ver. 3. Dr. Whitby. The Apostle's meaning is, that such as enjoyed the prophetick inspiration were not to imagine that, because some things were revealed to them, they might speak of every thing: but that in prophesying they were to confine themselves to what was revealed to them. The same rule is given, Eph. iv. 7. Dr. Macknight.

It appears from 1 Cor. xii, and xiv, how apt the new converts were to be puffed up with the several gifts that were bestowed on them: and every one, as in like cases is usual, was forward to magnify his own, and to carry it farther than in reality it extended. St. Paul's design here was to prevent or regulate such disorder, and to keep every one within due bounds in the exercise of his particular gift. Locke.

7. — ministry,] Or service in the Church of God by preaching the Gospel, &c. Parkhurst. Specially in this place, "the work of an Evangelist." Dr. Whitby.

—— he that teacheth,] The "teachers" seem to be men, who, having received the doctrine of faith from the Apostles, preached it to others for their conversion to the faith. Such of them as preached the Gospel to those who had not heard it were called "Evangelists." Dr. Whitby.

8. — he that exhorteth,] He that, when the doctrine of the Gospel is taught and planted, is appointed to preach to men the practical use of it, and exhort them to live accordingly. Dr. Hammond.

—— he that giveth,] He that distributes his goods, or perhaps the goods of the Church, to the poor. Dr. Hammond. "Giving" in this passage denotes the distributing of the funds appropriated by particular churches for relieving the necessities of the afflicted. Dr. Macknight.

—— with simplicity;] With impartiality; or with liberality; or with purity of mind; freedom from all sinister designs or views. Dr. Macknight, Parkhurst.

—— he that ruleth,] Or, presideth over the Church's stock. Drs. Whitby and Wells.

—— he that sheweth mercy,] Or, is set apart by the direction of the Spirit to take care of the sick, widows, orphans, or strangers; and to perform such other acts of mercy. Drs. Whitby and Wells.

The general purport of this and the two preceding verses is to state the consequence which plainly results from that union and mutual relation before noticed among Christians, as members of one body; namely, that every man ought to consider the abilities that God hath given him, and the post He hath called him to in the Church; and, without envying those that have more and are placed above him, or despising those that have less and are below him, to make it his business to discharge his own part diligently and conscientiously, and to rest contentedly in that. By comparing this passage with the 12th chapter of the first Epistle to the Corinthians, it appears that the gifts more directly intended by the Apostle are those extraordinary assistances of the Holy Ghost, vouchsafed to Christians in the infancy of the Church, as at that time necessary evidences of the truth, and fitted for the more successful propagation of the Gospel. Yet are not those arguments, either in the Apostle's design, or in the nature of the thing, so confined to those extraordinary gifts, as not to extend, with great force and clearness of reason, to all ages and conditions of Christianity, when left to the ordinary methods of grace by which it now subsists. Dean Stanhope.

9. Let love be without dissimulation.] The former exhortations respected persons in office in the Church: those that follow concern all Christians in general, and acquaint them with their duties in common life. He begins with "love," as the root from which all other graces and duties spring. Burkitt.

—— without dissimulation.] That is, sincere and unfeigned: "not in word (only,) but in deed and in truth," 1 John iii. 18. Dr. Whitby.

10. Be kindly affectioned one to another] The word rendered "kindly affectioned," properly signifies loving with that tender affection which is natural between parents and children: here it seems to denote that affection which subsists between near relations. Parkhurst.

—— with brotherly love;] Not bearing only such kindness to one another as common humanity requires, but such as the relation of Christian brethren and the bonds of consanguinity demand. Dr. Whitby.

—— in honour preferring one another;] Being ready to think better of others than of yourselves, and so being content to have others preferred before you. Dr. Wells. They are the virtues of meekness and humanity which St. Paul hath in view, when he exhorts Christians "in honour to prefer one another," to shew respect and civility to others, without waiting to see whether they will shew as much to us. And St. Peter's direction is, "Honour all men." If therefore rudeness, and inhumanity, and harshness of behaviour be found in Christians, and in Christians who pretend to great holiness, and zeal, and piety, this is not to be laid to the charge of Christianity, or of those who first preached it; but it is the fault of those who understand not, or are not willing to understand, the plain precepts of the Gospel. Dr. Jortin.

11. Not slothful in business; &c.] The next duty recommended is diligence and industry in all our duties both to God and man, but particularly in the duties of our calling. Burkitt. As if he had

12. Rejoicing in hope; &c.] The Apostle next exhorts the Roman converts how to conduct themselves under afflictions: namely, to endure them patiently; to rejoice in hope of present deliverance or future happiness; and, in order to both, to be constant and diligent in prayer. Burkitt.

If we hope to possess that immortality which Christ promises, we must perform what Christ requires: which comprehends faith and works, belief and practice. Dr. Jortin.

13. Distributing to the necessity of saints; &c.] The next duty recommended is that of charity and almsgiving to the poor members of Jesus Christ. Burkitt. "Given to hospitality" means being very liberal in entertaining strangers, particularly those who were forced to flee from their own homes for religion. Dean Stanhope.

14. Bless them which persecute you: &c.] The Apostle, having taught us in the former verse our duty to our friends, here teaches us our duty towards our enemies. Burkitt. Pray for your persecutors, and let not their bitterest malice provoke you to any return of angry imprecations. Dean Stanhope. The repetition of the word "bless" adds force to the precept. Dr. Macknight.

15. Rejoice with them that do rejoice &c.] The next duty required is mutual affection and Christian sympathy between brethren, both in prosperity and in adversity. Burkitt.

It is the tendency and business of virtue and religion to procure, as much as may be, universal goodwill, trust, and friendship amongst mankind. If this could be brought to obtain; and each man enjoyed the happiness of others, as every one doth that of a friend; and looked upon the success and prosperity of his neighbour, as every one doth upon that of his children and family; it is too manifest to be insisted upon, how much the enjoyments of life would be increased. There would be so much happiness introduced into the world, without any deduction or inconvenience from it, in proportion as the precept of "rejoicing with those who rejoice" was universally obeyed. Our Saviour has owned this good affection as belonging to our nature in the parable of "the lost sheep:" and does not think it to the disadvantage of a perfect state, to represent its happiness as capable of increase from reflection upon that of others. At the same time, in compassion for the distress of others, there is more good than evil, more delight than sorrow. There is first the relief which the distressed feel from this affection in others towards them. There is likewise the additional misery which they would feel from the reflection that no one commiserated their case. Against the sorrow of compassion is likewise to be set a peculiar calm kind of satisfaction which accompanies it, unless in very particular cases; proceeding, partly from consciousness of a right affection and temper of mind, and partly from a sense of our own freedom from the misery we compassionate. To these things must be added the observation which respects both the affections we are considering; that they who have got over all fellow feeling for others, have withal contracted a certain callousness of heart, which renders them insensible to most other satisfactions, but those of the grossest kind. Bp. Butler.

16. Be of the same mind one toward another.] The phrase sometimes denotes consent in doctrine: here it signifies consent in life, and in mutual offices of Christian love. Parkhurst. As if he had said, Live in perfect amity and concord. And when it is in your power to do good, think no person too mean to do it to, nor any honest method beneath you to do it by. Dean Stanhope.

—— Be not wise in your own conceits.] So as to think you need not the assistance of Divine wisdom, or the advice and counsel of your Christian brethren, Prov. iii. 5, 7; or so as to neglect the concerns of your Christian brethren. Dr. Whitby.

17. Recompense to no man evil for evil.] Never practise revenge upon those whom you think to have injured you. Dr. Hammond. Corrupt nature is very prone to return wrong for wrong: Christianity sets a nobler pattern before us, even the example of Him, who, "when He was reviled, reviled not again; when He suffered, He threatened not," 1 Pet. ii. 23. Burkitt.

—— Provide things honest in the sight of all men.] Meanwhile do nothing unbecoming your character; nothing that may offend any one, or give him an occasion of using you ill. Dean Stanhope. Having exhorted them before to be careful of their conversation towards God, he now presses them to be watchful over their conversation before the world, that by innocency and honesty of life they may cut off from the enemies of religion all occasion of speaking evil of them and their holy profession; and may make the heathens to be in love with Christianity by observing the purity and integrity of their lives. Burkitt.

18. If it be possible, &c.] It may so fall out, that it may not be possible, on account of some men's dispositions, to live peaceably with them; or such conditions of peace may be tendered, as may be utterly unlawful to be accepted; but, if it possibly may be, let there be no default in you, why you should not live peaceably with all men. Bp. Hall.

"If it be possible:" cases therefore may happen, in which it will not be possible. It is not in our power to "live peaceably with all men," if some men will not live peaceably with us. We must not be the aggressors: we must not engage knowingly in a bad cause; nor persevere, if in the process we shall discover our cause to be a bad one. Bp. Horne.

19. —give place unto wrath:] Leave it to the wrath of God, or the magistrates, His ministers, to avenge you. Dr. Wells.

20. —in so doing thou shalt heap coals of fire on his head.] See Prov. xxv. 22; and the note there.

That the expression is used in a good sense by the Apostle seems probable from the following verse, where we are commanded to "overcome evil with good." The metaphor is supposed to be taken from the melting of metals, by covering the ore with burning coals. This being understood, the meaning will be, In so doing, thou wilt mollify thine enemy, and bring him to a good temper. This no doubt is the best method of treating enemies. For it belongs to God to punish the injurious; but to the injured to overcome them, by returning good for evil. Dr. Macknight. The precept thus understood is a Christian duty: understood in a different manner, it might seem, as St. Augustine says, to command that foul crime of wishing mischief. Dr. Hammond.

21. Be not overcome of evil, &c.] Let no ill usage get such a mastery over you, as to break your temper, and draw you into passionate desires of revenge: but by returning good for evil, obtain the noblest victory over both yourselves and your enemies. Pyle.

Many of the Jews and Gentiles accounted revenge to be lawful, and derided Christian patience as a practice absurd and contrary to human nature. Yet what the Gospel requires of this kind, if we mistake not, is very commendable. If we had been commanded to shew particular friendship to wicked men, who revile and injure us, to account them worthy and honest persons, to furnish them with power and opportunity to hurt us, and not to be upon our guard against them, these indeed would have been hard sayings. But it is not so: we are commanded to love them so far, as to pity their faults and follies; and to shew them such lenity, forbearance, and kindness, such humanity and civility, as can be of no detriment to us; to pray to God for their repentance; and, if they prove by their behaviour that they repent and are amended, to receive them into favour. None can say that these precepts are impracticable. On the contrary, they are so reasonable, that without mutual indulgences of this kind human society can hardly subsist; and frail and fallible creatures cannot live together in tolerable peace and order, unless patience and forgiveness be in some degree approved and exercised. Dr. Jortin.

Chap. XIII. From personal duties the Apostle here proceeds to such as are political, and oblige us as members of a civil body. This subject at the time of his writing was no less necessary than the former. For the Jews, under pretence of being the special people of God, had an aversion to all governours, but such as were of God's special appointment, and of their own nation. They thought subjection to the Roman power a derogation to God and His Church, and paying taxes to heathen emperours a reproach not to be endured. To correct or prevent this prejudice in the Jewish, or other, Christians, the Apostle warns them against it in this chapter, by declaring God to be the author and ordainer of heathen governments, as well as of the Jewish: that Christianity did not annul the rights of any civil powers; and that Christians of all sorts ought to be obedient to the constitution of the several countries they lived in, out of a principle of duty and conscience. He then returns to his exhortations to Christian charity and mutual love; to purity, peaceableness, and sobriety, as essential duties of the religion of the Gospel. Dean Stanhope, Pyle.

We have here an exhortation to the duty of submission to civil governours and magistrates, because they are the ministers of God, appointed by Him for the protection and encouragement of well-doers, and the punishment of evil-doers: and therefore they must be obeyed, not only for fear of the punishment they may inflict, but also for fear of God's wrath, who hath ordained them, and requires obedience to them in the Gospel: and since all their care and pains are continually employed in the preservation and protection of the innocent, and the restraint of wrong-doers; therefore we ought also conscientiously and willingly to pay them tribute and taxes for their support, and for their encouragement in the discharge of their duty. T. Edwards.

Ver. 1. —every soul] Emphatically, every Jewish as well as Gentile convert. Pyle.

——be subject unto the higher powers.] Let him shew obedience to the supreme powers rightly established and constituted in that country to which he belongs. Dr. Hammond.

——for there is no power but of God:] Government is called the "ordinance of man," 1 Pet. ii. 13; because it is contrived for the benefit, and limited or directed by the laws, of men. But still the right, which governments convey, is God's; and the different forms of government are but so many different methods of adjusting the measures, and transferring the administration, of it to particular uses and persons. Dean Stanhope.

Christians are not by the freedom of the Gospel exempted from any ties of duty or subjection which by the laws of their country they ought to observe toward the governours or magistrates of it, (though heathens,) any more than their fellow subjects. On the other side, these rules do not tie them up any more than their fellow citizens (who are not Christians) from any of those civil rights which by the law of nature, or the constitution of the country, belong to them. T. Edwards.

2. —shall receive to themselves damnation.] In the original, 'judgment.' They shall be punished by the magistrate; or, if they escape the magistrate, they shall be punished by God. Dr. Whitby.

3. —Wilt thou then not be afraid of the power?] Wouldest thou be secure from being punished by the magistrate? "do that which is good;" do not offend against the laws, and thou shalt in all probability receive nothing from him but reward. Dr. Hammond.

4. —he beareth not the sword in vain:] The law of Moses, derived from God Himself, inflicted capital punishments for a variety of offences; and therefore we conclude, that they are not incompatible with the essential principles of justice and mercy. The emperours of Rome, at the time of the first propagation of the Gospel, had the power of life and death, which has indeed been vested in almost all supreme governours, under greater or less limitations, in every period of the world. The New Testament does not condemn that power: and by enjoining obedience and submission to magistrates, without any restriction or exception of this kind, it gives a sanction to it. And indeed this passage from St. Paul seems to admit the power of sovereign princes over the lives of their subjects in cases of heinous criminality. The sword is always considered as the instrument of death: and therefore to say that the magistrate "beareth not the sword in vain," is to acknowledge that he has a right to punish with death. St. Paul allowed the possibility of his having committed a crime for which he ought to die; and expressed his readiness in that case to submit to the law. See Acts xxv. 11. Bp. Tomline.

5. —not only for wrath, but also for conscience sake.] Not purely from a principle of self-preservation, to avoid the civil sword; but from a principle of duty, to avoid sin and guilt, in obedience to that God, whose commission the magistrate bears. This results from the consideration, that "he is the minister of God." Dean Stanhope.

6. — attending continually upon this very thing.] Namely, executing judgment between man and man, to preserve every man in his right, and to punish the wrong-doer. Dr. Whitby. The question, "Is it lawful to give tribute to Cesar?" was agitated, not in Judea only, but in all the heathen countries, where the Jews were settled, and was the occasion of great dissensions among them. This question the Apostle decided in the affirmative, upon the following principle: that as government and governours are appointed for the publick good, taxes ought to be paid by the people, for defraying the necessary expenses of government, and for maintaining the magistrates in that honourable manner which their office requires, and which is necessary to procure them respect. Dr. Macknight.

7. — tribute — custom] "Tribute" seems to denote a tax levied on persons and estates: "custom," on goods or merchandise. Parkhurst. These are debts due to our governours; by the command of God they are to be justly and cheerfully paid; and they cannot without sin and injustice be denied or withheld. Burkitt.

8. Owe no man any thing, but to love one another:] The Apostle now returns to the duties of mutual love and charity, to which he was exhorting them in the former chapter. Pyle. As if he said, Discharge the duties of your respective capacities so faithfully, that nothing be omitted, which any relation, natural or civil, requires at your hands. But know there is still one duty of universal and perpetual obligation. For charity, even when it hath done most, is ever bound, and ever labouring, to do more. And this is so comprehensive, that it not only takes in the letter, but answers the intent, of the whole moral law. Dean Stanhope.

—— he that loveth another] The word "another" in this verse, corresponding to "his neighbour" in the 10th, shews that every man is the Christian's neighbour. Dr. Whitby. It comprehends our very enemies, according to the sublime morality enjoined by Christ. Dr. Macknight.

—— hath fulfilled the law.] All that, which the second table of the law requires of him. Bp. Hall. Namely, that part of it which relates to one's neighbour. Dr. Wells.

9. For this, Thou shalt not commit adultery, &c.] The meaning is, that the prohibitions of the law against uncleanness, killing, stealing, defamation, and false evidence, and all precepts whatever, relating to the rights of our neighbour, are all included in the Christian commandment, of "loving," or doing to others as we would be done by. Pyle.

10. Love worketh no ill to his neighbour:] It is implied, that love does all possible good, as well as no ill. And this is intended by the negative precepts of the law. Burkitt.

"Love worketh no ill to his neighbour:" it can work him no ill; it can never injure him in his person, his bed, his property, or his character: it cannot so much as conceive a desire for any thing that belongs to him. But it resteth not content with negatives. It not only worketh him no ill, but it must work for him all the good in its power. Is he hungry? It will give him meat. Is he thirsty? It will give him drink. Is he naked? It will clothe him. Is he sick? It will visit him. Is he sorrowful? It will comfort him. Is he in prison? It will go to him, and, if possible, bring him out. Upon this ground, wars must for ever cease among nations, dissensions of every kind among smaller societies, and the individuals that compose them. All must be peace, because all would be love. And thus would every end of the incarnation be accomplished: good will to men, peace on earth, and to God on high glory from both. Bp. Horne.

Our "neighbour" commonly signifies in Scripture, and not seldom in heathen writers, every person who is placed within our reach and influence. Accordingly St. Paul, in the 8th verse, instead of saying, He that loveth his neighbour, saith, "He that loveth another hath fulfilled the law." We have usually the most frequent opportunities of doing good to those who live with us, or near us. But if any one, however distant from us, or unknown to us, particularly wants our help, he is in effect by that very thing brought near us for the time, and put under our care. Abp. Secker.

—— therefore love is the fulfilling of the law.] Reflect what an appearance society would wear, if men acted upon this evangelical principle. In superiours there would be equity and moderation, courtesy and affability, benignity and condescension: in inferiours, sincerity and fidelity, respect and diligence. In princes, justice, gentleness, and solicitude for the welfare of their subjects: in subjects, loyalty, submission, obedience, quietness, peace, patience, and cheerfulness. In parents, tenderness, carefulness of their children's good education, comfortable subsistence, and eternal welfare; in children, duty, honour, gratitude. In all men, upon all occasions, a readiness to assist, to relieve, to comfort one another. Can we help exclaiming with the celebrated author of the Spirit of Laws, 'How admirable the religion, which, while it seems only to have in view the felicity of the other life, constitutes the happiness of this!' Bp. Horne.

11. — to awake out of sleep:] A life of sensuality and sin is here compared to "sleep," which is a state of blindness, inactivity, and danger; and the shaking off of such dissolute conversation is represented under the figure of "awaking out of sleep," which opens men's eyes, rouses them to action, and apprizes them of their danger, and puts them upon their guard against it. Dean Stanhope.

—— for now is our salvation nearer than when we believed.] That is, we draw nearer to the goal of glory and salvation, than when we first began to believe the Gospel. Bp. Hall. The duties of a Christian are here enforced by a representation of the shortness of our present life, and the nearer approaches, which the bliss, to be obtained at our Saviour's second coming, every day makes towards us. In this sense some of the best interpreters understand these words. Dean Stanhope.

12. The night is far spent, the day is at hand: &c.] Our life of sin and errour wears away apace; and a state of glory and perfection is approaching with speed towards us. Those scandalous vices must therefore be abandoned, which will not endure the light: and those virtues acquired and exercised, which may be at once a defence against temptations, and an ornament to our profession. Dean Stanhope.

The meaning and force of this exhortation is, that Christianity lays us under new obligations to a good life, as by it the will of God is more clearly revealed, and as it affords additional motives to the practice of it, over and above those which arise out of the nature of virtue and vice: I might add, as our Saviour has set us a perfect example of goodness in our own nature. *Bp. 13. Let us walk honestly, as in the day;] Decently, honourably, as becometh Christians. Dr. Whitby. "As in the day," as men that walk in the publick and open view of others in the daytime. Bp. Hall.

14. But put ye on the Lord Jesus Christ,] That is, be conformable to His doctrine and holy life. St. Chrysostom says, that this was a common phrase to signify one person being an imitator of another. Compare Eph. iv. 24. Dr. Whitby. The expression evidently imports, that Christ should be our pattern; that His sobriety and gravity, His meekness, and moderation, and great charity, and all the virtues and graces so conspicuous in Him, should be as familiar to us, as inseparable from us, as evident a distinction of our quality, as the apparel, which we constantly wear, is to our bodies. Dean Stanhope.

Chap. XIV. The reverence, which the Jewish converts still retained for the Mosaical law, made them scrupulous in several matters, of themselves indifferent, such as the use of particular meats, and the observation of certain days: while the Gentile Christians openly indulged themselves in perfect liberty from such restrictions, not without some contempt of the Jewish scruples. The Apostle here exhorts both parties to mutual forbearance. Pyle, Burkitt.

Ver. 1. Him &c.] This direction appears to be given with a view to the prevention of the strife, and the promotion of the great Christian duty of love, noticed in the foregoing chapter. Drs. Whitby and Wells.

——but not to doubtful disputations.] That is, Do not quarrel or contend with him about his opinions, or fill his head full of curious and intricate questions, or trouble him with doubtful disputes. Burkitt.

2. For one believeth that he may eat all things: &c.] The Apostle here declares the first ground of difference between them. One thought all meats to be lawful under the Gospel; another, rather than eat any meats forbidden by the law, will eat only herbs. Burkitt.

——eateth herbs.] It appears that some of the Jews used to eat no flesh at all, and others looked upon it as a very high pitch of virtue to abstain from it in Gentile countries, and to subsist entirely on vegetables: because they did not know but any flesh sold in the shambles might have been offered to idols, or might at least have contracted some other ceremonial pollution. Drs. Whitby and Doddridge.

——to his own master he standeth or falleth.] By God's sentence alone he is to be acquitted or condemned. Dr. Wells.

——Yea, he shall be holden up: &c.] But he certainly shall be cleared; for God is able to clear him, if He please; and He certainly will, having, by receiving him into His family, given him this liberty. Dr. Hammond.

5. One man esteemeth one day above another: &c.] The second case, as to indifferent things, was about the observation of days. Many of the believing Jews could not be taken off from solemnizing those feasts, which were instituted by God among the Jews. Another with reason looked upon them as abrogated by Christ. Burkitt.

This is by no means to be extended to a neglect of the observance of the Lord's day in a Christian manner, or of the moral part of the commandment, concerning the observance of the sabbath for the worship of God, and the practice of humanity, which is founded in the nature and reason of things, and therefore is of perpetual obligation; it respects only the ritual and instituted part of the observance of that absolute and strict rest from every sort of work whatsoever, which had relation, as a particular memorial, to the deliverance of the Jews out of Egypt, and was peculiar to that nation, but is now abolished by the Gospel, as well as the observance of other Jewish festivals, insomuch that St. Paul, Col. ii. 16, 17, among ordinances of meats and drinks, and new moons and other shadows of good things to come, reckons up also the sabbath days. *T. 8. For whether we live, &c.] If we act suitably to our duty and our obligations, we "live unto the Lord;" that is, under His dominion, and under the governance of His laws. Dr. Whitby.

—— whether we live, we live unto the Lord; and whether we die, we die unto the Lord:] In both states we are absolutely His property, and entirely at His disposal. If we obey Him, "we shall also reign with Him: if we deny Him, He also will deny us," 2 Tim. ii. 12. Abp. Secker.

9. — that he might be Lord both of the dead and living.] He, by His resurrection being constituted "Lord of all," and having conferred upon Him "all power in heaven and in earth," must have power over all; we being all His servants, and so obliged "not to live unto ourselves, but unto Him that died for us and rose again," 2 Cor. v. 15. He being also the rewarder of all those, who serve Him faithfully, He must be the "Lord of the dead," so as to be able to bring them to life again, that they may receive the promised reward. Dr. Whitby.

10. — we shall all stand before the judgment seat of Christ.] And from Him, who is the Lord and Master of us all, shall receive the sentence according to our works. Dr. Whitby.

11. For it is written,] See Isai. xlv. 23; and the notes there.

12. — to God.] Here Oecumenius notes, that it is said of God the Father, that "He judgeth no man, but hath committed all judgment unto the Son," John v. 22; and therefore what the Apostle here says, "Every one shall confess to God, and bow the knee to Him," ver. 11; and "shall give account of himself to God," ver. 12; is manifestly spoken of Christ as Judge, and therefore Christ is God. This argument was used before the Nicene council by Novatian and others.

And seeing Christ is "Lord over the dead," by the power, by which "He is able to subdue all things unto Himself," Phil. iii. 21, which doubtless is the power of God; and seeing that having raised all men, He will "bring to light the hidden things" which they have done, and "make manifest the counsels of their hearts," 1 Cor. iv. 5, and so must be omniscient, and have the knowledge of the secrets of the heart; and seeing it is the property of God alone to raise the dead by His power, and to be the searcher of hearts; these properties ascribed to Christ, here and elsewhere, must shew that He is truly God. Dr. Whitby.

13. Let us not therefore judge one another &c.] He had before reproved the weak, who censured the strong in the use of their liberty. He comes now to restrain the strong from offending their weak brethren by a too free use of their liberty, in not forbearing the use of it, where it might give offence to the weak. Locke.

—— an occasion to fall] The original word here, as well as that in the former clause, is sometimes rendered "a stumblingblock." It denotes whatever actually makes, or has a tendency to make, men fall, stumble, or be remiss in the ways of duty; and particularly what hinders men from becoming the disciples of Christ, or discourages them in their new profession, or tempts them to forsake the faith they had lately embraced. Parkhurst.

14. — am persuaded by the Lord Jesus,] By the faith of the Lord Jesus. Dr. Whitby. By revelation from the Lord Jesus. Dr. Macknight.

—— that there is nothing unclean of itself: &c.] Nothing is in its own nature unclean, for God made all things good; but in a man's conceit and opinion some creatures seem unclean; and, while a man is in that mind, surely that creature is unclean to him, because his conscience riseth up against the use thereof. Bp. Hall.

15. — if thy brother be grieved with thy meat,] So grieved and hurt, as hereby to be drawn into a scandal; (Bp. Hall:) and by that means driven off from the profession of Christianity. Dr. Hammond.

—— Destroy not him — for whom Christ died.] The Apostle here plainly supposes, that he, for whom Christ died, might perish. See the note on 1 Cor. viii. 11. Dr. Whitby.

16. — your good] That is, your liberty herein, which is justly esteemed a "good" enjoyed by you under the Gospel. Dr. Wells.

The business of the Apostle here is, not to deter from the practice of evil, but to direct in the use and practice of that which is good, that our virtue may be without offence, and secured from calumny and reproach. The passage may be thus paraphrased: Be not content with merely doing that which is in itself good and commendable, but look forward to its probable consequences, and endeavour to prevent any mischief that may grow out of it to yourself or others, that your good may be inoffensive and irreproachable. Bp. Sherlock.

17. For the kingdom of God is not meat and drink; &c.] Christianity consists not in such external matters, eating or not eating such or such meats, but in the practice of Christian virtues. Dr. Hammond. "Drink" is mentioned as well as "meat," because, though the law of Moses did not forbid any kind of drink, the Nazarites abstained from wine, and all kinds of fermented liquors. Hence the exhortation in Col. ii. 16. Dr. Macknight.

"Righteousness," towards God and our neighbour; "peace," that is, peaceableness of disposition, Christian love, concord and unity; and "joy in the Holy Ghost," that is, the joyful sense of the love of God, shed abroad in the heart by the Holy Ghost. Burkitt.

20. — destroy not the work of God.] Thy weak brother. Dr. Wells. The Christian converts, 1 Cor. iii. 9. Dr. Whitby. Do not destroy a Christian brother, who is the workmanship of God in Christ Jesus. Pyle.

—— All things indeed are pure;] Rather, 'clean.' The known distinction of meats among the Jews, which is here alluded to, was into clean and unclean. Dr. Wells.

—— who eateth with offence.] That is, so as to offend and endanger others, who are not satisfied of their lawfulness. Burkitt.

21. — stumbleth, or is offended, or is made weak.] Is kept from receiving the faith; or discouraged and driven from the profession; or any way wounded or hurt, that is, brought to any kind of sin. Dr. Hammond.

Even such actions as appear to us very allowable, yet, if they appear evil to others, it is, ordinarily speaking, both our prudence and our duty to abstain from, as much as with tolerable convenience we can. Whatever indeed on mature consideration we are fully persuaded we ought to do, that we must do, let the world think as it will. But where we apprehend a thing to be only permitted, if the wise will disapprove it, or the injudicious misinterpret it; if the good will be afflicted, or the bad rejoice at it; if rigid and warm tempers will be guilty of censuring us for it rashly, or easy and complying ones follow us in it against their judgments; if our taking harmless liberties will encourage others to take sinful ones; in short, if any how, by doing what otherwise we might, we shall induce any one else to do what he ought not: the great law of Christian charity requires, that "no man put a stumblingblock, or an occasion to fall, in his brother's way;" or do any thing, whereby he is grieved, "or offended, or made weak." Shewing this tender care neither to entice nor provoke a single person, if it can be avoided, into sin of whatever sort, but to "please our neighbour for his good, to edification," chap. xv. 2, is a precept, I believe, peculiar to the Gospel: or at least hath so peculiar a stress laid on it there, as to distinguish our religion, greatly to its honour, from every other institution of life, that the world hath known. Abp. Secker.

22. Hast thou faith?] Or a persuasion that all meats are clean and may lawfully be eaten. Dr. Whitby.

—— have it to thyself before God.] Thou mayest use it betwixt God and thyself, but not always before men; as when there may be danger of hurting them. Dr. Hammond.

—— Happy is he that condemneth not himself &c.] That is, who, when he knows a thing to be lawful, so practises it, as to have no reason to accuse or condemn himself. Dr. Hammond.

23. And he that doubteth is damned if he eat,] He, that doubteth whether he sin in eating or not, is condemned if he eat; because his conscience is unsettled, and he eateth sinfully, because he eateth doubtfully. Bp. Hall.

—— for whatsoever is not of faith is sin.] Whosoever doth any thing without a persuasion of the lawfulness of his action, called "faith" here, and "knowledge," 1 Cor. viii. 7, he certainly sins in so doing. Dr. Hammond.

In determining upon the difference of opinion and conduct between the Jews and Gentiles, and upon the jealousies and disputes occasioned by it, how admirably does St. Paul combine good sense and liberality of opinion with caution and prudence in conduct. He admits the errour of the Jewish opinion, but maintains, that so long as it was retained, and influenced the persuasion of any man's conscience, it ought to be followed in his practice: see ver. 14. But while he approves the rational freedom of the Gentiles in their opinions, he condemns the want of prudent and benevolent attention to the prejudices of their weak but well-meaning brethren, whose feelings they shocked, and whose affections they alienated, by openly despising and acting in defiance of their scruples, and even disturbing their conscience by tempting them to compliances which they could not sincerely approve; see ver. 15. And upon the whole he determines, that each should bear with the different opinions, and pass no uncharitable constructions, no sentence of reprobation, on the conduct of the other; see ver. 3—5. How wholly inconsistent is this with the spirit of fanaticism! Dr. Graves.

Chap. XV. The Apostle still exhorts the Gentile Christians to bear with the scruples of the Jewish converts, from the example of Christ: and prays for their unanimity and mutual peace. He owns himself the Apostle of the Gentiles, and glories in his success amongst them. He then mentions his intended journey to Jerusalem and to Rome; and desires the concurrence of their prayers for his safe arrival and success at both places. Pyle.

That this psalm was undoubtedly spoken of the Messiah, we learn from ver. 22, applied to Christ, John xix. 28, 29; and from the former part of the verse here cited, applied to Christ, John ii. 17. The Jews refer the accomplishment of the things contained in this psalm to the days of the Messiah. Dr. Whitby.

in any Scriptures of the Old Testament. Pyle. We learn hence the great end for which the Holy Scriptures were written: namely, "for our learning," or the informing of our judgment; and for the directing of our practice, that, by the examples which we there find of the patience of holy men under sufferings, and of God's relieving and comforting them in their distresses, "we might have hope" that God will relieve and comfort us also under the like burdens. Burkitt.

5. Now the God of patience and consolation] Who works this "patience" in us, and gives to us this "consolation." Dr. Whitby. Having in the preceding verse mentioned the "patience and comfort," or consolation, "of the scriptures," the Apostle in this verse calls God "the God of patience and consolation," to shew that the patience and consolation of the saints proceeded from God. In like manner, having in the twelfth verse said, "in Him shall the Gentiles trust," he calls God in the following verse, "the God of hope," to shew that the hope, which the Gentiles entertained of salvation, proceeded from God. So also ver. 33, "the God of peace;" and elsewhere, "the God of glory," &c. Dr. Macknight.

——grant you to be likeminded &c.] Give you the grace of unity and charity, such as Christ commanded and expects from you. Dr. Hammond.

6. That ye may with one mind and one mouth glorify God,] That ye may join unanimously, Jews and Gentiles, into one; and assembling together, worship and serve the Lord, in all unity of affections and form of words. Dr. Hammond.

Not only praising God with the same words in your doxologies, but also joining in those praises with a mind full of Christian love and a sense of the Divine goodness. Dr. Whitby.

——God, even the Father of our Lord Jesus Christ.] Rather, "the God and Father," &c. Dr. Hammond. So 2 Cor. i. 3, and xi. 31; Eph. i. 3, 17; Col. i. 3; 1 Pet. i. 3; Rev. i. 6. On which words the comment of the Fathers is to this effect, That the first Person of the sacred Trinity is "the God" of Jesus Christ, in respect of His manhood; His "Father," in respect of His Divinity, or as He is the Word. Dr. Whitby.

7. Wherefore receive ye one another,] Into mutual love. Dr. Wells. In all humility of condescension and kindness embrace and succour one another. Dr. Hammond.

——as Christ also received us] Both Jews and Gentiles, into His love. Dr. Wells.

8. Now I say &c.] The Apostle, having proposed for the imitation of Christians the example of Christ, in receiving both Jew and Gentile to His favour, here declares how He received them both. As first, that He shewed His love and mercy to "the circumcision," or the Jews, by exercising His ministry among them, according to the promises made by God to their patriarchs, ver. 8: then, secondly, that He was the Saviour also of the Gentiles, whom He called and received to mercy, according to numerous prophecies in the Old Testament, ver. 9—12. Burkitt, Dr. Whitby.

9. —I will confess to thee &c.] See Ps. xviii. 49: the following words, concerning "His king," and "David, His Messiah, or Anointed," are by the Jews interpreted of Christ: and so the preceding words are doubtless fitly applied to Him. Dr. Whitby.

12. —to reign over the Gentiles;] See Isai. xi. 10. The Hebrew phrase, "for an ensign," is rendered by the Greek translators 'to bear rule, or dominion:' because the power of war, like the power of the sword, being a branch of imperial authority, which belongs to the prince alone, the "being for an ensign" is equivalent to ruling. The Apostle, according to his manner, makes use of the Greek translation. Dr. Hammond.

——in him shall the Gentiles trust.] Literally, 'in Him shall the Gentiles hope:' and so it follows in the next verse, "Now the God of hope," &c. Dr. Wells. See the note on ver. 5.

14. And I myself also am persuaded &c.] The Apostle here in conclusion excuses himself for having written so largely and freely to the Church at Rome, believing, as he says, that they were able to instruct one another: however, he thought it fit to write to them, by virtue of his Apostolical office, and particularly of his commission as ambassadour to the Gentiles. Burkitt.

——full of goodness, filled with all knowledge,] Full of virtue and charity, and perfectly know what is your Christian duty. Dr. Hammond.

16. —ministering the gospel of God,] 'Being employed in the sacred office of' preaching or administering "the Gospel." Parkhurst. Here is a plain allusion to the Jewish sacrifices, offered by the priest, and sanctified, or made acceptable by the salt offered with them. For the Apostle compares himself in the preaching of the Gospel to the priest, conversant about his sacrifice, to prepare and fit it to be offered. The Gentiles, dedicated by him to the service of God, are his sacrifice or oblation: the Holy Spirit is the salt poured on this sacrifice, by which they are sanctified, and rendered acceptable to God. See Numb. xv. 3—10. Dr. Whitby.

Anno DOMINI 60.

17 I have therefore whereof I may glory through Jesus Christ in those things which pertain to God.

18 For I will not dare to speak of any of those things which Christ hath not wrought by me, to make the Gentiles obedient, by word and deed,

19 Through mighty signs and wonders, by the power of the Spirit of God; so that from Jerusalem, and round about unto Illyricum, I have fully preached the gospel of Christ.

20 Yea, so have I strived to preach the gospel, not where Christ was named, lest I should build upon another man's foundation:

g Isai. 52. 15.

21 But as it is written, [g] To whom he was not spoken of, they shall see: and they that have not heard shall understand.

22 For which cause also I have been ‖ much hindered from coming to you.

‖ Or, many ways, or, oftentimes.

23 But now having no more place in these parts, and having a great desire these many years to come unto you;

24 Whensoever I take my journey into Spain, I will come to you: for I trust to see you in my journey, and to be brought on my way thitherward by you, if first I be somewhat filled † with your company.

Anno DOMINI 60.

† Gr. with you, ver. 32.

25 But now I go unto Jerusalem to minister unto the saints.

26 For it hath pleased them of Macedonia and Achaia to make a certain contribution for the poor saints which are at Jerusalem.

27 It hath pleased them verily; and their debtors they are. For [h] if the Gentiles have been made partakers of their spiritual things, their duty is also to minister unto them in carnal things.

28 When therefore I have performed this, and have sealed to them this fruit, I will come by you into Spain.

29 And I am sure that, when I come unto you, I shall come in the fulness of the blessing of the gospel of Christ.

30 Now I beseech you, brethren, for the Lord Jesus Christ's sake, and for the love of the Spirit, that ye strive together with me in your prayers to God for me;

31 That I may be delivered from them that ‖ do not believe in Judea; and that

‖ Or, are disobedient.

By representing the converted Gentiles as a most acceptable offering to God, the Apostle alludes to Isai. lxvi. 20. Dr. Macknight.

17. — through Jesus Christ] Through the assistance of Jesus Christ. Dr. Whitby.

—— in those things which pertain to God.] As to the success which I have had in converting the Gentiles. Dr. Wells.

"Things which pertain to God;" offerings presented by the ministration of the priests, as appears from Heb. ii. 17, and v. 1; where the same phrase is so used. The figure of the priestly offering, alluded to in ver. 16, is still continued. The Gentiles are spoken of in the light of a sacrifice, offered by the Apostle to God. T. Edwards.

18. — which Christ hath not wrought by me,] But only of those which He hath. Dr. Whitby. Some such words as these are necessary to complete the sense. The Apostle would not speak of what Christ had wrought not by him, but by His disciples, for making the Gentiles obedient; though he might have claimed some praise also from their success. But he would speak only of what Christ had wrought by him personally; namely, that he had preached the Gospel with the greatest success from Jerusalem, and round about in all the Gentile countries, as far as Illyricum. Dr. Macknight.

19. — from Jerusalem, and round about unto Illyricum,] Beginning at Jerusalem, and taking a circuit through Phenice, and Syria, and Arabia, Acts xv. 36, 41; xix. 20, &c., to the Macedonians, which join upon Illyricum. Dr. Hammond. The words import, that St. Paul had come to the confines of Illyricum, and that these confines were the external boundary of his travels. He considers Jerusalem as the point, from which he commenced; and is here viewing the space over which his travels had extended. Illyricum was the part which he mentions to the Romans, because it lay in a direction from Jerusalem towards Rome, and pointed out to the Roman readers the place nearest them, to which his travels from Jerusalem had brought him. It was upon his second visit to Macedonia, almost immediately before the writing of this Epistle, that he approached Illyricum. Archdeacon Paley.

20. — not where Christ was named,] That is, preached by others before me. Dr. Whitby. Not where Christianity was already planted. Dr. Wells.

22. For which cause also I have been much hindered &c.] The Apostle considered the preaching of Christ, where He had not been named, the most needful work; he therefore declined going to Rome, where was a church already planted. But now, "having no more place in these parts," ver. 23, that is, having no more churches to plant hereabouts, he signifies his resolution of visiting the Roman church. Burkitt.

24. — if first I be somewhat filled with your company.] When I have for some time enjoyed your company, and so in some measure satisfied my longing on that account. Dr. Wells.

25. — to minister unto the saints.] To distribute to the poor Christians there, the collection that has been made for them. Dr. Hammond.

26. — them of Macedonia and Achaia] That is, the brethren in those provinces, particularly at Philippi, Thessalonica, Berea, Corinth, and in every other city of these provinces, where churches were planted by the Apostle. Dr. Macknight.

27. It hath pleased them verily; &c.] Thus bountiful are they to them, and indeed well they may: for it was from Jerusalem that these Gentiles first received the Gospel: and, for such a spiritual and eternal blessing, they may well in return supply them with the necessary things of this present life. Pyn.

28. — have sealed to them this fruit,] Have delivered to them safely this fruit of the liberality of the Gentiles. Dr. Hammond.

29. — in the fulness of the blessing of the gospel of Christ.] Or, with a full power of imparting to you the gifts of the Spirit in the most plentiful manner. See the note on chap. i. 11. Drs. Whitby and Wells.

30. — for the love of the Spirit,] Upon that obligation of Christian love, which Christ requires, and His Spirit works in your hearts. Dr. Hammond.

—— that ye strive together with me in your prayers] That you will with great earnestness and fervency join your prayers to mine. Dr. Hammond.

31. — from them that do not believe in Judea;] The unbelieving Jews at Jerusalem had got notice of the Apostle's success in converting the Gentiles, to whom he preached salvation without requiring them to obey the law of Moses. And being falsely informed that "he taught all the Jews which were among the Gentiles to forsake Moses," &c. Acts xxi. 21, they were exceedingly Chap. XVI. The Apostle recommends Phebe, the bearer of the Epistle; and offers salutations to and from the Christians of his acquaintance. In the midst of them he renews his pathetick desires of their mutual care to avoid divisions, and the persons who foment and spread them. He repeats his assurances to the Gentile Christians, that they are the true church of Christ without observing the Jewish law. And concludes with praises to God for His universal mercies to mankind. Pyle.

The deaconesses were women employed in the primitive church, originally widows, the wives of one husband; see the note on 1 Tim. v. 9; although in process of time it appears that virgins also were made deaconesses. Their business was to baptize women, to teach the female catechumens, to visit and attend upon the sick, to administer to martyrs, and to perform other inferiour services of the church. Schleusner.

—— a succourer] The original word seems to signify hostess, not in a common inn, for there were no such things as our inns in that country; but one, whose house was the place of lodging and entertainment of those, who were received by the church as their guests; and these she took care of. Locke.

3. Greet] Or, Salute. A form of very frequent occurrence in the end of St. Paul's Epistles, for expressing good wishes for an absent person. Schleusner.

The Apostle is very affectionate in these salutations; giving to almost every one some signal epithet, that he might both recommend them for their piety, and propose them to others for imitation, and the more endear their affections to him, and shew his gratitude to them, and the honourable esteem he entertained for them. Bp. Fell.

—— my helpers in Christ Jesus:] The Apostle in his salutation thus describes Priscilla and Aquila, because both at Corinth and Ephesus they had been very active in spreading the Gospel. Dr. Macknight.

4. Who have for my life laid down their own necks:] This is said in allusion to the custom of placing on blocks the necks of criminals, whose heads are to be cut off. The expression is proverbial, and denotes the undergoing of the greatest perils. It is thought the Apostle alluded to some great danger, to which Aquila and Priscilla exposed themselves, in defending him from the Jews in the tumult which they raised at Corinth during the proconsulship of Gallio, Acts xviii. 12. Dr. Macknight.

—— but also all the churches of the Gentiles.] For such their great kindness to me the Apostle of the Gentiles. Dr. Wells.

7. —my kinsmen, and my fellowprisoners,] St. Paul styles all the Jews "kinsmen," chap. ix. 3. Before he went to Rome, he was "in prisons frequent," 2 Cor. xi. 23; and so might have had many "fellowprisoners." Dr. Whitby.

—— his mother and mine.] His mother, who for her motherly affection to me may also be called mine. Dr. Wells.

16. Salute one another with an holy kiss.] That is, with the kiss of charity, so called as being a token of the holy or religious love and charity between Christians. Dr. Wells. This kiss was used at the end of the prayer, before the celebration of the sacrament: but the men and women did not kiss each other promiscuously; the men saluted the men only, and women none but their own sex: as their separate places in the church, or synagogue, seemed to require. Drs. Whitby and Macknight. The custom was borrowed from the Jewish synagogue: and, as chastely and prudently as it was managed, it seems to have been the occasion of false and scandalous reports concerning the Christian assemblies, on which account it appears to have been laid aside very early. Dr. Doddridge.

—— The churches of Christ salute you.] That is, The Christian churches in the country, where St. Paul was writing. Pyle.

17. —contrary to the doctrine which ye have learned;] Of the Apostles. Dr. Whitby.

—— and avoid them.] So long as the fixed regular assemblies of the nation, wherein we live, do truly belong to the catholick church, and we can lawfully join with them, we are bound so to do, and not to join with those congregations that have withdrawn themselves from them. For to do this would be to join in society with separatists, would be a partaking of their sin, and a breach of the Apostle's precept of "avoiding them which cause divisions." Abp. Sharp.

18. —their own belly;] Their own worldly ease and advantage. Dr. Wells.

—— the simple.] Honest, ignorant, and well-meaning persons. Pyle.

19. For your obedience is come abroad unto all men.] That is, it is talked of all over the Roman empire. Dr. Wells. That such a number of the inhabitants of the metropolis had forsaken the worship of idols, must have been much spoken of through all the provinces. Dr. Macknight.

—— but yet I would have you wise &c.] The Apostle's argument is this: Since ye have shewn such prudence and discernment in receiving the Gospel, ye should shew like prudence and discernment under the Gospel, by doing every thing that is good, and preserving yourselves unpolluted by evil. Dr. Macknight.

20. —shall bruise Satan under your feet shortly.] That is, shall shortly defeat the designs of Satan against your church, and shall rid you of his instruments, that would seduce and divide you. Dr. Wells.

21. Timotheus my workfellow,] Timothy was converted by St. Paul, while very young; and, having been chosen by him as his assistant in the ministry, accompanied him in all his journeys, and shared with him in all his dangers. Hence he styles him his "fellowlabourer," 1 Thess. iii. 2. Dr. Macknight.

22. —who wrote this epistle,] From the mouth of the Apostle Paul dictating it to me. Dr. Wells.

23. Gaius mine host, and of the whole church,] One that hath used great liberality to me and all the Christians. Dr. Hammond.

25. Now to him &c.] The Apostle here concludes his excellent Epistle with a solemn doxology or thanksgiving to God. Burkitt.

—— according to my gospel, and the preaching of Jesus Christ,] The Fathers observe, that these expressions are of the same import; the Gospel, which the Apostles preached, being the same with that which Christ preached whilst He was on earth; and they, after His ascension, preaching in His name, by His authority, and by the assistance of His Spirit, and so delivering His laws and doctrine, not their own. Dr. Whitby.

—— the mystery,] Namely, that the Gentiles should have the Gospel preached to them. Dr. Hammond. So the calling of the Gentiles is styled, Eph. i. 9; iii. 3, 5, 9; Col. i. 26, 27; ii. 2; iv. 3. Pyle.

—— since the world began,] The Greek may signify, 'from the beginning of ages,' the promise of the Messiah being obscurely made or hinted to Adam from the beginning; though the Fathers only render the words 'before' or 'of old.' Dr. Whitby.

26. —by the scriptures of the prophets,] They of old foretold of the Messiah, and of the calling of the Gentiles: but yet, as to many circumstances, this was still "a mystery," till these prophetick sayings were more clearly revealed by the Spirit given to the Apostles and Prophets, and by the actual accomplishment of what they foretold. See note on Eph. iii. 6. Dr. Whitby.

The whole design of the Gospel, the dispensation of Providence in the salvation of mankind, is styled "a mystery," because it was "kept secret since the world began," God not having opened or declared His gracious purposes before the coming of Christ. With respect to this time of secrecy and silence it is called a mystery: but, upon the revelation of it by Christ Jesus, it is looked upon no longer as a mystery, but as the manifestation of God's will and goodness to men. That it was once hidden in the secret counsels of Providence, but is now by the revelation of Christ Jesus made known unto all men, may administer to us great joy, and be a subject of praise and glory to God: inasmuch as our eyes have seen, and our ears have heard, those things, which many righteous men and Prophets have "desired to see, and have not seen them, and to hear, and have not heard them," Matt. xiii. 17. Bp. Sherlock.

—— for the obedience of faith:] That they might believe the Gospel. Dr. Hammond.

27. To God only wise,] Or, 'To the only wise God.' This, as the Fathers note, cannot exclude the Divine nature of Jesus Christ, who is the wisdom of the Father, from this title, any more than those words, "who only hath immortality," 1 Tim. vi. 16, exclude Christ from being immortal. Dr. Whitby.

Thus endeth the Epistle of St. Paul the Apostle to the Romans: a writing, which, for sublimity and truth of sentiment, for brevity and strength of expression, but above all for the unspeakable importance of the discoveries which it contains, stands unrivalled by any merely human composition. Dr. Macknight.

THE FIRST EPISTLE OF PAUL THE APOSTLE

CORINTHIANS.

INTRODUCTION.

CORINTH, situated on the isthmus which joins Peloponnesus to the rest of Greece, was, at the time when this Epistle was written, a place of extensive commerce, and the capital of the Roman province of Achaia. Near it were celebrated the Isthmian games, to which the Apostle alludes in this Epistle. Its inhabitants were a very licentious and profligate people, and were great admirers of the sceptical philosophy of the Greeks. St. Paul, in his first journey on the continent of Europe, resided at Corinth about eighteen months, and planted a church there, which consisted chiefly of converts from heathenism. After he left this city, some false teachers, who are supposed to have been Jews by birth, endeavoured to alienate the converts from their attachment to him and his doctrine, by calling in question the authority of his mission, and by ridiculing the plain and simple style in which he delivered his instructions. They recommended themselves to their hearers by shewing indulgence to their prejudices and vicious propensities, and by using those artificial ornaments of eloquence which had great effect upon their minds. Hence arose divisions and other irregularities among the Corinthian Christians, totally inconsistent with the genuine spirit of the Gospel.

This Epistle was written by the Apostle St. Paul from Ephesus, in the beginning of the year 56, during his second visit to that city, in the second year of Nero's reign, and about three years after he had left Corinth. The immediate occasion of its being written was to answer some questions which the Corinthians had in a letter proposed to St. Paul; but before he enters upon that subject, he takes notice of the abuses and disorders which prevailed in the church at Corinth, and of which he had received private information, 1 Cor. i. 11, 12; v. 1. He then exhorts them to harmony and union, and condemns the parties and factions into which they had formed themselves; he vindicates his own character, justifies the manner in which he had preached the Gospel to them, and shews the futility of all human learning when compared with the excellency of the Gospel of Christ, chap. ii. 1—9. He next orders that a man, who had married his father's wife, should be publickly excommunicated; and directs the Corinthians not to associate with any person of a notoriously wicked life, chap. v. He blames them for carrying their disputes before heathen courts of judicature, and advises them to settle their differences among themselves; he condemns the sin of fornication, and cautions them against sensual pleasures, to which the Corinthians were in general addicted in the highest degree, chap. vi.

After discussing these points, St. Paul proceeds to answer the questions which the Corinthians had put to him; and he begins with those relating to the marriage state, upon which subject he gives a variety of directions, chap. vii. He then considers the lawfulness of Christians eating the meat of sacrifices offered to idols, chap. viii.: and warns them against making the liberty, which he allows, an occasion of offence; he asserts his right as an Apostle to a maintenance from his disciples, although he had never accepted any money from the Corinthian converts; and, because the false teachers had contrived to make this disinterestedness a ground of reproach to St. Paul, he points out the superiour motives by which the ministers of the Gospel were animated to bear the hardships of their ministry, above those which induced the Greeks to submit to the labour of contending at the publick games, chap. ix. He next directs that women should not pray or prophesy unvailed; and by this subject he is led to speak of some irregularities, of which the Corinthians had been guilty in celebrating the Lord's supper, but which were probably not noticed in the letter to the Apostle; and he afterwards gives an account of the institution of that sacrament, chap. x, xi. He then discourses concerning spiritual gifts, and explains the nature and extent of Christian charity, chap. xii, xiii, xiv. He enumerates the proofs of Christ's resurrection, deduces from it the certainty of the general resurrection of the dead, and in a forcible strain of eloquence answers some objections which were urged against that fundamental doctrine of the Gospel, chap. xv. In the last chapter St. Paul gives directions concerning the collections to be made for the poor Christians of Judea; promises to visit the Corinthians, and concludes with friendly admonitions and salutations.

From this summary account, it appears that this Epistle relates principally to the then state of the church at Corinth; but the truths and instructions, which it contains, are of the greatest importance to Christians of every age and country.

It was sent to Corinth by Titus, who was directed to bring an account to St. Paul of the manner in which it was received by the Corinthians. Bp. Tomline.

PAUL, called to be an apostle of Jesus Christ through the will of God, and Sosthenes our brother,

Chap. I. The Apostle congratulates the Corinthians on their conversion to the Christian faith, and the gifts conferred upon their church. He then shews the main design of his Epistle to be, to cure them of the divisions among them, fomented by new and false teachers, who set themselves up for the heads and leaders of parties. And whereas several endeavoured to make St. Paul contemptible, he confesses that his preaching was not attended with worldly wisdom and eloquence, but that he preached after a very plain manner, suitably to the nature of the Gospel, which is the doctrine of Christ crucified: he lays down this doctrine as the chief article of Christianity; and proves the wisdom, power, and excellency of the dispensation, as far exceeding the philosophy of the Gentiles, or the worldly and temporal expectations of the Jews. Pyle, Osterwald.

2. Unto the church of God] The "sanctified in Christ Jesus," the "saints called," seem here to be words of the same import, denoting such as are called out of the world, and separated from others, through faith in Christ, to be a peculiar people to God, as the Jews were before; all Christians being, by virtue of this calling, "a chosen generation, a royal priesthood, an holy nation, a peculiar people," 1 Pet. ii. 9; though many members of the church of Corinth, and of other churches, wanted the inward sanctification of the Holy Spirit. So that the word "saints," in many places of the Acts, and of the Epistles, is as large as the word "Christians;" and stands opposed, not to the unsound Christians, but to the heathen world. Dr. Whitby.

—— with all that in every place &c.] Though the Epistle was written to correct the disorderly practices of the Corinthians, it contained many general instructions, which could not fail to be of use to all the churches in the province of Achaia likewise, and even to Christians in every place. Dr. Macknight. From this passage it appears, that St. Paul's Epistles, though occasionally written and directed to particular churches, were designed for the use of all Christians. Dr. Whitby.

—— that — call upon the name of Jesus Christ our Lord,] This in the New Testament is the character of a Christian, that he is one who "calleth on the name" of Christ, Acts ix. 14, 21; xxii. 16; Rom. x. 12, 13; 2 Tim. ii. 22. Thus we find not only St. Stephen "calling upon" this name, and saying, "Lord Jesus, receive my spirit," Acts vii. 59; and St. Paul bid to wash away his sins, "calling on the name of the Lord," Acts xxii. 16; but we find this to have been generally the character of a disciple, or a convert to the faith of Christ, that he was one who called upon the name of the Lord. See Acts ix. 14, and 21. Dr. Whitby.

Praying to Christ was so much practised by the first Christians, that Pliny mentioned it in his letter to Trajan: 'They sing with one another a hymn to Christ, as God.' Dr. Macknight.

It appears from the expression, here and elsewhere used, that to invocate the name of our Lord Jesus Christ is a practice characterizing and distinguishing Christians from infidels. Dr. Isaac Barrow.

—— both their's and our's:] The Lord, I say, both of you to whom I write, and of me who write. Dr. Whitby.

4. —for the grace of God] Here the context seems to restrain this phrase to the favour of God shewn to the Corinthians in vouchsafing these spiritual gifts. So Rom. xii. 6; Eph. iv. 7, 8; 1 Pet. iv. 10. Dr. Whitby.

5. —in all utterance, and in all knowledge;] That is, the gift of tongues; and the knowledge of all mysteries, or the gift of prophecy. Dr. Whitby. Those very powers and graces, both for understanding and preaching the Gospel, by which you were first brought to the faith of it. Pyle.

6. —the testimony of Christ] The Gospel is called "the testimony of Christ," because therein testimony is given concerning Christ, namely, that He is the Son of God, &c. Dr. Wells.

7. So that ye come behind in no gift;] Ye are inferiour to no other Christian churches in any extraordinary endowments of the Holy Spirit. Pyle.

—— waiting for the coming &c.] The Apostle means, that by these gifts, and by this earnest of the Spirit, they had encouragement to expect or wait for the second coming of the Lord. Burkitt, Dr. Whitby.

8. Who shall also confirm you unto the end, &c.] That is, He will do all that is requisite on His part, to render you unblamable to the end; so that you shall not fail of it through any want of Divine grace necessary to that end, or any unfaithfulness to His promise on the part of God, who hath already reconciled you to Himself through the death of Christ, to "present you holy, and unblameable, and unreproveable in His sight: if ye continue in the faith grounded and settled, and be not moved away from the hope of the Gospel," Col. i. 22, 23. Dr. Whitby.

9. —unto the fellowship of his Son] To the knowledge of the Gospel, and participation of the graces reached out to you therein. Dr. Hammond.

10. Now I beseech you, brethren, &c.] The Apostle here proceeds to one of the chief occasions of his writing this Epistle, concerning which, as a most important duty, he beseeches and exhorts them with the most pathetick earnestness. Pyle, Burkitt. As if he had said, That therefore, to which I first exhort you, and that with all earnestness possible, as the prime addition to those gifts and graces that are among you, is this; that ye all teach the same doctrine, and nourish charity and unity, that there be no divisions in your churches, but that ye be compacted and united, as members of the same body, in the same belief and affections. Dr. Hammond.

—— by the name of our Lord Jesus Christ,] Emphatically set in opposition to those, under whose names they ranked themselves into parties and divisions. Pyle.

—— divisions] As the original expresses it, 'schisms.' There are only three places in the New Testament, in which the word occurs; namely, here; and chap. xi. 18; and xii. 25. In this place the "schism" appears to have consisted in the formation of religious parties, which pretended to follow, one the cause of St. Paul, and another that of Apollos. In chap. xi. 18, the charge is grounded upon the adoption of new modes, which some had wantonly introduced in the administration of the sacrament. And in chap. xii. 25, the offence of schism appears to have consisted in the violation of that subordination of teaching, ministering, and governing, which was originally appointed in the church. "Schism" therefore may be defined to be an open violation of church unity, when individuals assume to themselves the power either of forming new communions; or of instituting new rites; or of creating a new ministry, in opposition to such as have been established by regular authority, as being the ministry and the ordinances originally of apostolick institution. Dr. Nott.

duty, which the Apostle recommends to the consideration of the Corinthians in this Epistle; and the last, which he recommends to them in his other Epistle, 2 Cor. xiii. 11: intimating to us thereby, that this unity in judgment and affection is the first and last thing to be respected among Christians, as being both the beginning and perfection of Christianity. Burkitt.

11. — my brethren,] This name of union and friendship is used here twice together by St. Paul, in the entrance of his persuasion to them to put an end to their divisions. Locke.

12. — I am of Paul;] Of the Gentile part of the church of Corinth, some preferred St. Paul, as being their spiritual father, 1 Cor. iv. 14, 15; others preferred Apollos, as an "eloquent man and mighty in the Scriptures," Acts xviii. 24. Meanwhile the Jewish Christians preferred St. Peter, as the chief Apostle of the circumcision out of the territories of Judea. Dr. Whitby.

—— and I of Christ.] While others slight us all, and pretend Christ to be their only master. They either pretended their doctrines to have been learned immediately from Christ Himself; or else they were zealous for circumcision, alleging the example of Christ Himself. Pyle. It is hence very observable, that for any one to say, "I am of Christ," in opposition to His lawful ministers, is as faulty as to say, "I am of Paul, or of Peter," &c. in opposition to Christ, or any other of Christ's Apostles or ministers. Dr. Wells.

13. Is Christ divided?] Did Christ institute more than one religion, or preach different and contradictory doctrines, as your different sects of philosophy are wont to do? Pyle.

—— were ye baptized in the name of Paul?] So as to be called the disciples of St. Paul. Dr. Whitby. His disciples we are, in whose name we are baptized; and that is not in the name of any man, but in the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost. Burkitt.

14, 16. Crispus — Gaius; — the houshold of Stephanas:] The first of these was the chief ruler of a synagogue, Acts xviii. 8; the second, a principal man in the church of Corinth, Rom. xvi. 23; "the houshold of Stephanas" were the first converts in all Achaia, 1 Cor. xvi. 15. Dr. Wells.

17. — not to baptize, but to preach the gospel:] That is, not principally to baptize, which others might do as well, but to publish the Gospel to them that never heard it. Dr. Hammond. The writers of the Old and New Testaments, almost every where, agreeably to their Hebrew idiom, express a preference given to one thing before another, by an affirmation of that which is preferred, and a negation of that which is opposed to it. And so we must understand here. Bp. Pearce. See Acts xxii. 21; and xxvi. 16, 17; ix. 15; xxii. 15. St. Paul's commission to baptize was comprised in the general commission given to Christ's Apostles for that end, Matt. xxviii. 19. That was not, say the Greek expositors, his great business; for to baptize is easy to any, who is admitted to sacred orders; but to preach the Gospel at its promulgation required a Divine revelation, and great assistance of the power of God. Hence St. Peter himself preaches to Cornelius and his kinsmen, but "commands them to be baptized" by others, Acts x. 48. Dr. Whitby.

—— not with wisdom of words,] Not with philosophical niceties and fine terms of rhetorick. Pyle.

—— the cross of Christ] The doctrine of Christ crucified. Dr. Whitby.

18. For the preaching of the cross &c.] The preaching of a crucified Saviour, requiring belief in, and obedience to, Him who was shamefully put to death, may seem a ridiculous thing to impenitent unbelievers; but to us, who have come unto Christ by repentance and faith, it is the most glorious evidence of the power of God. Dr. Hammond.

20. Where is the wise?] Or, the philosopher of the Greeks? "where is the scribe?" or the learned in the law of the Jews? "where is the disputer of this world?" that is, he, who by studied disquisitions and disputations, searches after what has hitherto been esteemed, either by Jew or Greek, the wisdom of this world? Dr. Wells.

—— made foolish the wisdom of this world?] Shewed that sort of learning or knowledge, on which the unbelieving Jews or Gentiles value themselves, to be of no use to the attainment of eternal salvation, wherein consists what alone deserves to be called wisdom? Dr. Wells.

21. — in the wisdom of God] By permission of God's wise providence. Pyle.

—— by wisdom] By means of its false wisdom. Dr. Wells.

—— by the foolishness of preaching] By the preaching of the cross of Christ, esteemed both by Jew and Gentile a foolish absurd doctrine. Dr. Wells.

The meaning and language of St. Paul will be accounted for, by considering what led him to this kind of expression. The doctrine of the cross, and of the redemption of the world by the death and passion of Christ, was received by the great pretenders to wisdom and reason with scorn and contempt. The "Greeks," says the Apostle, "seek after wisdom, but Christ crucified is to the Greeks foolishness." The pride of learning and philosophy had so possessed the polite parts of the heathen world, that they could not submit to a method of salvation which was above the reach of their philosophy, and which refused to be tried by the disputes and subtilties of their schools. The Apostle, ver. 17, says, "Christ sent him to preach the Gospel not with the wisdom of words." The wisdom of the world, thus discarded, took its revenge of the Gospel, and called it "the foolishness of preaching." Be it so, says the Apostle, yet by this foolishness of preaching God intends saving those who believe: for this method is of God and not of man; and "the foolishness of God is wiser than men." You see what led St. Paul to use this expression, and to call the preaching of the Gospel "the foolishness of preaching." The great and the learned so called it and so esteemed it: the Apostle speaks to them in their own language, and calls upon them in the text to compare their much-boasted wisdom with this foolishness of preaching, and to judge of them by their effects: "the world by wisdom knew not God;" but the foolishness of preaching is salvation to every believer. Bp. Sherlock.

22. For the Jews require a sign,] It is plain from the Gospel history, that our Lord wrought many "signs," John xx. 30; Acts ii. 22. Yet the Jews perpetually demanded of Him "a sign," and "a sign from heaven," Matt. xii. 38; xvi. 1. Since the Apostle wrought great miracles in confirmation of the Gospel, the Jews demanded probably the same sign as the Pharisees sought from our Lord Himself. For as Daniel had foretold the coming of the Son of man in the clouds of heaven, to receive the kingdom, the Jews expected that Christ would make His first appearance in the clouds, and by some great exertion of power wrest the empire of the world from the Romans. Hence the preaching of Christ crucified was to the Jews a stumblingblock. Pyle, Dr. Macknight.

—— the Greeks seek after wisdom:] Some extraordinary philosophical discovery. Dr. Wells. Deep speculation and refined eloquence. Pyle.

The Greeks or Gentiles did not object to the Gospel, that the authority of it wanted the proof of signs from heaven; but that the preaching of it wanted the recommendation of what they called "wisdom." Neither the manner of the Apostles' teaching was adorned with that plausible oratory, of which they were so fond; which soothed the ears, and entertained the imagination; which could make a bad cause victorious, and a good one suspected: nor yet was the matter of their discourse made up of curious speculations; abstruse points in philosophy debated with acuteness; theories, built upon slender foundations to great heights, then attacked with subtle objections, and defended with more subtile refinements. These were the delight of the learned Greeks: and agreeable to this was the treatment which they gave the Gospel of Christ. Its doctrines had nothing amusing to minds full of trifling curiosity: its precepts had many things disgusting to human sensuality and pride: its proofs were inconsistent with their prevailing notions. So it was rejected without examination by persons whom the irony of Job suits perfectly well, "No doubt but ye are the people, and wisdom shall die with you," chap. xii. 2. It ought to surprise no one, that this sort of men, who have always been too common in the world, and never more than now, should scorn Christianity. While they continue such, they cannot embrace it. Abp. Secker.

24. —the power of God, and the wisdom of God.] "The power of God," in respect of the miracles wrought for the confirmation of the doctrine: "the wisdom of God," in respect of the wonderful contrivance of man's redemption by these means. Dr. Wells. Thus we are taught, that we should not presume to sit in judgment on the methods of Providence; since, how foolish or how weak soever they may seem to us, they will be found in His hand to be the wisest and the strongest. Bp. Sherlock.

25. —the foolishness of God — the weakness of God] That is, what the unbelieving Greeks account "foolishness," and the unbelieving Jews account "weakness." Dr. Wells.

26. For ye see your calling, brethren, &c.] Ye see, my brethren, the condition of Christianity: how that now, in this entrance of the Gospel, not many that are worldly wise and deeply learned, not many mighty, &c. are called. Bp. Hall.

27. But God hath chosen the foolish things of the world &c.] Who were the persons, to whom our Saviour's commission to His Apostles was given? those who were best qualified and able to carry it into execution? the rich, the wise, the mighty of this world? No: they were chiefly a few poor fishermen; of low parentage and education; of no learning or eloquence; of no policy or address; of no repute or authority; despised as Jews by the rest of mankind, and as the meanest and worst of Jews by the Jews themselves. What improper persons were these to contend with the prejudices of all the world, the superstitions of the people, the interests of the priests, the vanity of philosophers, the pride of rulers, the malice of the Jews, the learning of Greece, and the power of Rome! Bp. Newton. The majesty and power of God are never more clearly seen, than when He makes choice of "the weak things of the world to confound the things which are mighty." Bp. Sherlock.

28. —things which are not,] That is, the Gentiles, who are esteemed base and looked upon as nothing by the Jews, "to bring to nought," or to abolish, "things that are;" namely, to become God's church and people, and so to cause the Jewish church and economy to cease. Dr. Whitby.

30. But of him are ye in Christ Jesus,] It is of God's grace and favour, that ye, who believe, partake, through faith and obedience of the Gospel, of the merits of Christ Jesus. Dr. Wells.

——wisdom, &c.] As being the Author of that evangelical wisdom, which far excels the wisdom of the philosopher and scribe, and even that legal constitution which is called the wisdom of the Jews, Deut. iv. 6: the Author of justification, as procuring for us that remission of sins, which the law could not give, Gal. ii. 21; iii. 21: the Author of sanctification, as procuring for, and working in, us, not only an external and relative holiness, as was that of the Jews, but true and eternal holiness, Eph. iv. 24, wrought in us by the Holy Spirit: the Author of redemption, not from the Egyptian bondage or Babylonish captivity, but from the servitude of Satan, the dominion of sin and death, and from "the bondage of corruption, into the glorious liberty of the children of God," or "the redemption of the body," Rom. viii. 21, 23. Dr. Whitby.

7 But we speak the wisdom of God in a mystery, even the hidden wisdom, which God ordained before the world unto our glory:

Chap. II. Whereas their new teachers of the Gentile part undervalued the Apostle for his want of deep speculation and eloquence; he tells them, the plainness and great importance of the Christian doctrine of a crucified Saviour stood in no need of such arts to recommend and set it off; but would be disparaged by the use of them, to ver. 6: human philosophy being utterly unserviceable for discovering things that are matters of pure revelation: which, as they are dictated only by the inspiration, and effected by the wisdom and power of God, can never be attained by the utmost progress of mere human reason. If therefore men would be duly instructed in Christianity, they must apply themselves, not to philosophy, but Scripture; not to an eloquent orator, but an inspired Apostle. Pyle.

Ver. 1. And I, brethren, when I came to you, &c.] After a long parenthesis, the Apostle here resumes what he had said in the seventeenth verse of the former chapter, that he preached the Gospel in all plainness. This accusation was brought against him, and he declares himself ready to confess it. Dr. Hammond.

—— not with excellency of speech or of wisdom,] That is, of human wisdom. Dr. Whitby. I did not endeavour to set it off with any ornaments of rhetorick, or the mixture of human learning or philosophy; but plainly declared it to you as a doctrine coming from God, revealed and attested by Him. Locke.

—— the testimony of God.] The Gospel is so styled, because God gave witness to the truth of it, partly by the prophecies contained in the Old Testament, as also the several types, &c. therein described; and partly by miracles: which evidences or testimonies are therefore referred to by St. Paul in the fourth verse. Dr. Wells.

2. — not to know any thing among you, &c.] That is, not to discover any other knowledge to you: to act as one who knew nothing of the eloquence and wisdom of the Greeks, but only to give you the knowledge of a crucified Saviour, which was to them "foolishness," chap. i. 23. Dr. Whitby.

"To know Jesus Christ, and Him crucified," was to know, not simply to believe, but to know in such a manner as to be able to teach others, that Jesus of Nazareth was the Messiah announced by the Prophets from the beginning of the world; and to understand that the sufferings of the Messiah were the means appointed by God for man's deliverance from sin and damnation. This knowledge, therefore, of Jesus Christ, and Him crucified, to which St. Paul laid claim, contained an accurate knowledge of the ancient prophecies; a clear apprehension of their necessary reference to the Messiah; a discernment of their exact completion in the person of Jesus; and an insight into that great mystery of godliness, the expiation of the actual sins of men, and the cleansing of man's sinful nature, by the shedding of the blood of Christ.

And who is sufficient for these things? That no study can attain this knowledge of Christ in the degree in which the Apostles possessed it, he who confesses not, hath studied Christ to little purpose: but he who imagines that Christ may thus be known by men uninformed both by inspiration and education, or imagines that where inspiration is wanting education may contribute nothing at all in aid of the deficiency; that is, to make my meaning very plain, he who imagines that, of uninspired men, the learned and the unlearned are equally qualified to be teachers of the word of God; he who builds this extravagant opinion upon the terms in which the Apostle speaks of the knowledge of Christ, as the only knowledge to which he himself made pretensions; only proves that more learning is necessary than he is aware of, to the right apprehension of this single text. Bp. Horsley.

3. — in weakness,] Of the body and of speech, "his bodily presence being weak" and mean, "and his speech contemptible," 2 Cor. x. 10. This infirmity of flesh rendering him despicable in the eyes of others. Dr. Whitby.

—— and in fear, and in much trembling.] In much awe of that great and weighty charge which I sustained; in much fear of those many and spiteful machinations of mine enemies against me. Bp. Hall. St. Paul's "fear" at Corinth is intimated in Acts xviii. 9. Bp. Pearce.

4. — but in demonstration of the Spirit and of power:] It appears best to understand these expressions, as Origen does, the former, of the prophecies in the Old Testament, inspired by the Spirit of God; the latter, of the miracles done by Christ and His Apostles under the Gospel. Drs. Hammond, Whitby, and Wells.

6. — we speak wisdom] Or, what is justly accounted the greatest wisdom, "among them that are perfect," that is, who thoroughly understand the nature of the Christian religion. Dr. Wells. Who are fully instructed in the principles of the Christian faith. That this is the sense of the word "perfect" here, appears from the opposition of those that are perfect to "babes in Christ," as in Heb. v. 12, 13; vi. 1. Compare Matt. xix. 21; Phil. iii. 15. See also 1 Cor. xiii. 10; Col. i. 28; Heb. v. 14. Dr. Whitby.

—— not the wisdom of this world,] That is, neither the arts and sciences of the Greeks, nor the rabbinical conceits of the Jews. Dr. Wells.

—— nor of the princes of this world,] Not such learning as is approved and encouraged by either the Gentile or the Jewish princes or great men. Dr. Wells.

—— that come to nought:] The Apostle means, that such wisdom avails them nothing as to their spiritual and eternal welfare. Dr. Wells.

7. — the wisdom of God in a mystery,] That wise dispensation of God in giving up His Son, which was hidden under the Jewish types, and only darkly spoken of by the Prophets. Dr. Hammond.

—— the hidden wisdom,] "Hidden" before, not after, the revelation of it: for this mystery, saith the Apostle, "God hath revealed unto us by His Spirit," ver. 10. It is the mystery, which hath been "hid from ages and generations, but now is made manifest to His saints," Rom. xvi. 25, 26; Eph. i. 9; iii. 3, 4, 9, 10; vi. 19; Col. i. 26, 27; ii. 2; iv. 3, 4. Dr. Whitby.

—— which God ordained before the world] Determined by God from the beginning to be now revealed to us. Dr. Hammond. "Before the world," and so, long before the Jewish constitution. Dr. Wells.

—— the Lord of glory.] Him, who by the voice from heaven and His miracles, as well as by their own prophecies, appeared to be God Himself come down from heaven. Dr. Hammond. Not a mere man, not an angel, not an archangel, but the only begotten Son of God, of the same essence and glory with the Father. The same Apostle, or rather the Spirit of God Himself, speaking in him, makes use of language to the same effect, Acts xx. 28, where He speaks of "the church of God, which He hath purchased with His own blood." Bp. Beveridge. As in this verse, compared with Ps. xxiv. 10, and Isai. vi. 3, is contained a clear proof of the true divinity of our blessed Saviour, or His being One in essence with the Father; so in verse 11 is contained a proof of the Divinity of the Holy Ghost. Dr. Wells.

9. But as it is written, &c.] These words, quoted from Isai. lxiv. 4, do not immediately respect the blessings of another world, but are spoken by the Prophet of the Gospel state, and the blessings then to be enjoyed by them that love God, Rom. viii. 28. Dr. Whitby.

Hall.* "No man," properly, as in the original, 'no one,' not only man, but other creature, as angel. Accordingly what the Apostle here asserts holds good of the angels and all created beings; of all beings but God Himself; whence it follows, that the Holy Spirit is undoubtedly God. Dr. Wells. From what the Apostle here asserts, it seems to be a plain consequence, 1st, that the Holy Spirit is omniscient, as "knowing all things, even the deep things of God;" 2dly, that the Holy Spirit is with God and in God, even as intimately as the soul is in the body. Dr. Whitby.

12. Now we have received, &c.] We, the true Apostles; or rather, I: for though he speaks in the plural number, to avoid ostentation, as it might be interpreted; yet he is here justifying himself, and showing the Corinthians, that none of them had reason to forsake and slight him, to follow and cry up a false apostle. That he is speaking of himself is plain from the next verse, compared with chap. i. 17; and ii. 1. Locke.

—— not the spirit of the world,] Which suggests worldly wisdom. Dr. Whitby.

—— that we might know the things that are freely given to us of God.] That we might, by His illumination and grace, know and apprehend the great, spiritual, and heavenly blessings of forgiveness and salvation, that are freely given to us of God. Bp. Hall.

13. — not in the words which man's wisdom teacheth,] Not with rhetorical eloquence, but in the words or manner of expression, which the Holy Ghost teaches, plain indeed, yet not without a peculiar and most affecting eloquence. Dr. Wells. From this and the preceding verse, as also from the following, it is evident, that the Apostles spake and writ by inspiration of the Holy Ghost, as did the Prophets of old time, and delivered, as from God, only those things, which God revealed to them by the Holy Spirit, according to the words of St. Peter, 1 Pet. i. 12. Dr. Whitby.

The pretended teachers of the Corinthians could perform no miracles in confirmation of their doctrine: it was supported only by an affected sublimity of argument, and the studied ornaments of eloquence. To these arts they trusted, to gain credit for their innovations with the multitude. St. Paul they vilified, as a man of mean abilities, who either had not himself the penetration to discern I know not what hidden meaning of the revelation of which he was the minister, or had not the talents of a teacher in a sufficient degree to carry his disciples any considerable length; and, through his inability, had left untouched those treasures of knowledge which they pretended to teach. This sketch of the characters of the false teachers in the Corinthian church, and of the sort of doctrine which they taught, is the key to the Apostle's meaning, in many passages of this epistle, in which, as in the text, he may seem to speak with disparagement of wisdom, learning, and eloquence, as qualifications of little significance in a preacher of the Gospel, and as instruments unfit to be employed in the service of Divine truth. In all these passages, a particular reference is intended to the arrogant pretensions of the false teachers; to their affected learning, and counterfeit wisdom. It was not that, in the Apostle's judgment, there is any real opposition between the truths of revelation and the principles of Divine reasoning; or that man's proficiency in knowledge can be in itself an obstacle in the way of his conversion to the Christian faith; or that an ignorant man can be qualified to be a teacher of the Christian religion; which are the strange conclusions, which ignorance and enthusiasm, in these later ages, have drawn from the Apostle's words: but he justly reprobates the folly of that pretended wisdom, which, instead of taking the light of revelation for its guide, would interpret the doctrines of revelation by the previous discoveries of human reason: and he censures the ignorance of that learning, which imagines that the nature of the self-existent Being, and the principles of his moral government of the world, are in such sort the objects of human knowledge, as, like the motions of the planets or the properties of light, to be open to scientifick investigation: and he means to express how little is the amount and how light the authority of the utmost wisdom that may be acquired in the schools of human learning, in comparison of that illumination which was imparted to him by the immediate influence of the Divine Spirit, the fountain of truth and knowledge, on his mind. Bp. Horsley.

—— comparing spiritual things with spiritual.] According to the interpretation of the Fathers, comparing the things which were inspired by the Spirit in the Old Testament, with what is now revealed to us by the same Spirit, and confirming our doctrines from them. Dr. Whitby.

14, 15. — the natural man — he that is spiritual] "The natural," or 'animal man,' is one, who makes the faculties of his animal nature, that is, his senses, his passions, and his natural reason darkened by prejudices, the measure of truth, and the rule of his conduct, without paying regard to the discoveries of revelation. Of this character were the heathen philosophers, to whom the doctrines of the Gospel were "foolishness," chap. i. 23: also the Jewish scribes, and those false teachers, whom St. Jude, ver. 19, calls by the same term in the original, 'animal men, not having the Spirit.' These all rejected the Gospel, because they could not explain its doctrines by their own principles or preconceived notions. The "spiritual" man, being opposed to 'the animal man,' is a person whose spiritual faculties, his reason and conscience, are not biassed by his animal nature, but have their due ascendant; and who entertains a just sense of the authority of revelation in matters pertaining to God; and, being sincerely desirous to know the truth, is assisted in his inquiries by the Spirit. Such a spiritual man, and he only, is able to judge properly of the things revealed by the Spirit of God. Dr. Macknight.

The sense of these verses may be thus given: "The natural man," that is, the philosopher, who will admit of nothing but what may be proved from natural principles, "receiveth not the things of the Spirit," that is, will not embrace these mysteries which I declare unto you: "for they" seem "foolishness unto him, neither can he," so long as he is thus disposed, "know" or believe "them, because they are spiritually discerned;" that is, because they are to be known, understood and judged of only by that evidence, which the Spirit gives, namely, "the demonstration of the Spirit," spoken of ver. 4; which evidence such a person is already disposed not to admit of. Whereas "he that is spiritual," that is, he who will admit of such evidence as this, "judgeth all things," that is, all these Gospel mysteries, whereof I am now speaking: he is able to prove that they are true, by proving that they are divinely revealed: "yet he himself is judged of no man," that is, no man can confute him, whose knowledge is thus grounded upon the evidence of the Spirit. "For who hath known the mind of the Lord?" that is, who can pretend to know the mind of the Lord, better than He Himself does? And yet, those must do so, who contradict what is proved by "the demonstration of the Spirit." And therefore this is the certain foundation of our knowledge, which must stand when all the wisdom of the wise shall perish, that "we have the mind of Christ," that is, are instructed by Christ Himself, who came from God. Dr. Stebbing.

Chap. III. The new teachers preferred themselves before St. Paul, for preaching higher and deeper points of Christianity than he did: the Apostle tells them, their excessive pride in human learning, and their factious temper, was a just reason, why he taught them only the first and fundamental points of the Christian religion, and made their progress so slow, ver. 1—5: that no teachers ought to exalt themselves, for all are but ministers of Christ, and not their own masters, ver. 6—10: that they did but build upon the Apostle's foundation, and it behoved them to take heed what doctrines they built, for they must pass a severe examination. He insists upon the danger of false doctrines, ver. 18; and on the folly of preferring any teachers for their mere human accomplishments. Pyle.

Ver. 1. And I, brethren, could not speak unto you as unto spiritual, &c.] St. Paul here meets an objection, which appears to have been alleged against him, that he did not teach the Corinthians the more sublime parts of Christianity, which were since taught them by others. To this he answers, that their small advance in Christianity had not fitted them to receive those sublimer doctrines. Dr. Wells.

—— spiritual, — carnal,] The "spiritual" man here appears to signify the man endued with the fruits of the good Spirit, and who "walketh in the Spirit, not fulfilling the lust of the flesh," Rom. viii. 1, 4; Gal. v. 16. The "carnal" imports men, through the too great prevalence of their carnal appetites lusting against the Spirit, still subject to such things, as shewed in them some strong remains of a carnal mind. What the Apostle says in commendation of the "faith, utterance, and knowledge" of the Corinthians, 1 Cor. i. 5; 2 Cor. viii. 7, must be restrained to some few of them, who enjoyed these gifts for the instruction of the rest, so that the generality of them might notwithstanding be "babes in Christ;" or, this "faith, utterance, and knowledge" must be restrained to the gifts of miracles, of tongues, and the interpretation of them, bestowed for the confirmation of the Gospel and for the good of others on them who were not "spiritual" in the best sense, but of very small proficiency in the saving fruits of the good Spirit. Hence we find them "puffed up" on account of these gifts, envying others who had them in a higher measure, and abusing them to vain ostentation and confusion in the church, instead of using them to edification, which things sufficiently evidence that they were but "babes in Christ." Dr. Whitby.

—— babes in Christ.] First beginners, who have made but little or no progress in Christ. Dr. Wells.

Men are ordinarily made capable of Divine knowledge and graces by degrees: those, not first prepared by the lower, cannot attain the higher. See John xvi. 12. Bp. Fell.

2. — with milk, and not with meat:] With the "milk" of the first principles of religion, not with the strong "meat" of harder and higher doctrines. Bp. Hall.

8. Now he that planteth and he that watereth are one:] That is, are but as one instrument or agent of the same God; their pains are directed all to one end. Bp. Hall. The Apostle here advances a second argument for union. As if he had said, The doctrine of both of us is but one; both of us have had the same design of establishing men in the doctrine of Christ: though, according to the labour, that either of us has taken in the work, we may have different degrees of reward. And consequently though one labourer may deserve more honour than another, yet ought not this to be an occasion of division or schism among you, because, our design and doctrine being the same, your faith ought to be the same also. Dr. Hammond.

9. For we are labourers together with God:] Rather, 'fellow-labourers of God:' servants or officers of God, co-operating with each other in that great work, which, when it is completed, must be attributed not to them, who are the instruments, but to God, who is the author and accomplisher of all. Dr. Hammond. God is always represented in Scripture as the Master of the "husbandry" or vineyard, or of the "building," under which images His church is described. All preachers or ministers of the Gospel are "fellow-labourers" employed by God therein. And this is agreeable to the design of the Apostle. Dr. Wells.

10. —I have laid the foundation,] "Jesus Christ, and Him crucified," chap. ii. 2. Drs. Hammond and Whitby.

11. —which is Jesus Christ.] On whom alone the church of God is originally founded and built. Bp. Hall.

12. —gold, silver, precious stones,] That is, sound doctrine: "wood, hay, stubble," that is, unsound doctrine. Dr. Wells. The meaning is, that persons must not mix doctrines of their own invention with the Gospel of Christ; for when "the Lord Jesus shall be revealed from heaven in flaming fire," 2 Thess. i. 7, 8, to judge the world, such notions will not stand the trial. Abp. Secker.

13. —for the day shall declare it, because it shall be revealed by fire;] There is a day coming which shall clearly declare, what sort of doctrine it is, because it shall be made manifest by the fire of God's judgment. Bp. Hall.

14. If any man's work abide] As gold abides the fire: that is, if at the day of judgment any man upon his trial shall be found to have preached sound doctrine. Dr. Wells.

15. If any man's work shall be burned,] If his doctrine be frivolous, like straw, or stubble, or wood, apt to be burnt up, and so to be wasted in that fiery examination. Bp. Hall. That is, if he be found to have preached unsound doctrine, provided it be erroneous only in matters of inferiour consequence, and not subversive of the foundation of Christianity. Dr. Wells.

——he shall suffer loss:] He shall lose his labour in teaching it, so that his works in the ministry shall be of no advantage to him. Bp. Hall, Dr. Wells.

——but he himself shall be saved;] Because he holds and maintains the foundation. Bp. Hall. Upon timely repentance, or by not having actually denied Christ, notwithstanding he has built upon that foundation some erroneous doctrines, he shall be more mercifully dealt with by Christ, and freed from having his portion with unbelievers. Dr. Hammond.

——yet so as by fire.] That is, not without great hazard and difficulty: as St. Chrysostom expresses it, like one that, when his house is set on fire at midnight, wakes, and leaps out of the bed, and runs naked out of doors. It is a common observation, that this is a proverbial expression for such as escape from any calamity with great difficulty and danger. See Amos iv. 11; Jude, ver. 23. Drs. Hammond and Whitby.

This passage relates, not to punishing in purgatory the persons of some men before the day of judgment, as the Romanists pretend, but to trying the works of all men at the day of judgment: and far from sanctioning the doctrine of the church of Rome, gives them indeed an awful warning, not "to build on the foundation" of Christianity, "hay and stubble," such useless trash as this, and many other of their doctrines; which that great day of the Lord will shew to have no solidity in them: but "their works shall be burnt up, themselves suffer loss, and (at best) be saved only so as by fire." Abp. Secker.

From these words of the Apostle it may be observed, that men may hold all the fundamentals of the Christian religion, and yet may superadd many things, whereby they may greatly endanger their salvation. Abp. Tillotson.

16. Know ye not &c.] The Apostle here passes from false doctrines, to the evil effects of them in the divisions of the Corinthians. Dr. Whitby.

——that ye are the temple of God, &c.] That ye are the spiritual temple of God, built by Him, and consecrated to His own service; and as God testified His presence and inhabitation in the material temple, so the Spirit of God dwelleth in you? Bp. Hall.

17. If any man defile the temple of God,] By dividing that church which is His temple, and in which one and the same Spirit dwells, into parts and factions. Or the words may be referred to the corrupting of the temple of God by filthiness of the flesh, uncleanness and fornication; or by filthiness of the spirit, that is, idolatrous practices: both which the Corinthians were guilty of. Compare chap. vi. 15—19; 2 Cor. vi. 16; vii. 1. Dr. Whitby.

18. —seemeth to be wise in this world,] That is, in the wisdom of this world. That the Corinthians were induced to eat things offered to idols in the idol temples, by men pretending to great knowledge, see chap. viii. 1, 2. Such men also introduced among them the doctrine of the lawfulness of fornication. Agreeable to this interpretation of the two last verses is the remark of the

—— For all things are your's;] That is, designed by God for your service unto salvation. Dr. Wells.

22. — or things present, or things to come; all are your's;] The Apostle means, that by the direction of the providence of God, all things prosperous or adverse, whether present or future, shall be made subservient to the promoting of the virtue of believers in the present life, and of their felicity in the life to come. Among the rest, death itself is theirs, as it is the appointed means of bringing them to the vision and enjoyment of God. Dr. Macknight.

23. And ye are Christ's; and Christ is God's.] And the conclusion from hence is this, that you give not up your faith to any but Christ, that you resolve firmly to obey Him, and adhere to Him uniformly, as He resigned Himself up to the will of God, to do and to suffer whatsoever He appointed Him, in the great office of being our Mediator and Redeemer. Dr. Hammond.

Chap. IV. The Apostle here declares, that the Corinthians ought to respect the ministers of Christ, but that it was not for them to prefer some before others: that although he discharged his office with a good conscience, he did not think himself better than his colleagues; that the gifts, with which ministers are endowed, proceed from God; and that God alone is to judge of their fidelity. He argues with the heads of the faction, and represents their pride and vainglory. And as the persecutions, to which he was exposed, gave some men occasion to despise him, he describes the evils which he endured, and the patience with which he suffered them, and even glories in them, that so he might induce the Corinthians to think of him as they ought, and to imitate his patience, meekness, and humility. He proposes to send Timothy to them, to give them still further assurances how constant he was to himself and them: and he threatens those who suggested that he durst not make his personal appearance amongst them. Ostervald, Pyle.

Ver. 1. Let a man so account of us, &c.] Let Christians look upon their teachers, not as masters of their faith, or men acting for themselves, and upon their own authority; but as servants employed by Christ, our common Master. But withal let them consider, how honourable a service this is, since Christ hath made them His stewards, the dispensers of His word, and other means of grace, to the rest of the family. Dean Stanhope.

3. But with me it is a very small thing that I should be judged of you,] Not that he was unconcerned, whether the Corinthians had a good esteem of him or not: the contrary is evident from the whole drift of his Epistles, in which he labours to convince them of the truth of his doctrine, and of his sincerity in the discharge of his office, and rejoiceth greatly in their affection to him, 2 Cor. vi. 13; vii. 14, 15; viii. 24. His meaning only is, that their judgment is little to him, in comparison of the final and unerring judgment of the Lord. Dr. Whitby.

—— I judge not mine own self.] I dare not rely upon my own judgment, so far as to depreciate others, and prefer myself. Dean Stanhope.

4. For I know nothing by myself; &c.] For though, I bless God, my conscience reproaches me not with any neglect or mismanagement in my office, yet I will not be bold to say, I am absolutely clear of any. Because God will make a stricter inquiry into these matters, and knows me better than I do myself. Dean Stanhope. See the note from Bp. Sanderson on 2 Cor. i. 12.

5. Therefore judge nothing before the time,] Suspend such censures of your teachers, and do not anticipate the judgment of God. Dean Stanhope. The Apostle does not mean to condemn all judgment, civil or ecclesiastical, of any person's deeds or words; or bid us suspend our judgment of things occurring to our senses, till the day of judgment: but only forbids our censures of things uncertain, of which no righteous judgment can be passed, because we cannot be certain of the truth of that judgment, and of things, of which it belongs not to us to judge. Dr. Whitby. This is one of those general expressions, of which there are a great number in Scripture, that must be limited by the subject to which they are applied. Dr. Macknight.

—— the Lord] That is, the Lord Jesus Christ. This is a strong proof of the divinity of our blessed Saviour. He that has knowledge of the heart, of the secrets of the hearts of all men, and has all these subject to His judgment, is undoubtedly God. See 1 Kings viii. 39; 1 Chron. xxviii. 9; Jer. xvii. 10. But Christ ascribes all this knowledge to Himself, Rev. ii. 23. Therefore He is essentially and really God. Burkitt, Dr. Whitby.

6.— these things,— I have in a figure transferred &c.] I have thus said in the persons of myself and Apollos, to give you, under that figure, a general rule how to demean yourselves to any other ministers of the Gospel. Dr. Hammond. The Apostle appears to refer to what he had said, chap. iii. 5—8. Dr. Whitby.

—— above that which is written,] That is, above the directions here given. Dr. Hammond. Or, as it has been explained in something of a different sense, above what Scripture warrants. Dr. Doddridge.

7. For who maketh thee to differ from another? &c.] As if the Apostle had said, Who is it that maketh one minister to differ from and excel another? Is it not God? If so, then let those ministers, who have received the greatest gifts from God, whom the inspiration of the Almighty hath made most wise and understanding, be most humble themselves; and let none take occasion from thence to despise others who have received less. Burkitt. The Apostle is manifestly speaking here of those gifts of the Spirit, which were immediately infused without human industry, and were dispensed by God and by His Spirit, according to His good pleasure, chap. iii. 5; xii. 11. But it cannot be hence argued, that no man doth any thing to make himself differ from another, in any virtue or in any pious dispositions, in which we are continually exhorted to excel, and in which we differ from one another, as by God's grace preventing and exciting us, so by our faculties co-operating with that grace. Dr. Whitby.

According to the judgment of the most learned expositors, the Apostle speaks here, not of sanctifying, but of edifying grace: that is, such as was given to the teachers, not so much for the private good of themselves, as for the benefit of the Church, as appears chap. iii. 5. The ministers of the Church being then qualified for their work by miracle, the Apostle justly checks their arrogance for glorying in such gifts, as were not acquired by their own study and industry, but inspired into them immediately of the Holy Ghost: which abilities therefore were not rewardable nor commendable in them that had them, as to the manner of possession, chap. ix. 16, 17; Gal. i. 11, 12; but only so far forth as they did employ and improve them for the edification of the church. Bp. Womack.

8. Now ye are full, now ye are rich, &c.] In these words the Apostle ironically rebukes the overweening opinion, which the Corinthians had of their present attainments and spiritual perfections. As if he had said, Now you think yourselves so full and rich in all kinds of knowledge, that you despise your spiritual fathers, who first converted you to the faith. Burkitt.

—— full,— rich,] "Full" of secular wisdom; "rich" both in wealth and in spiritual gifts, chap. xiv. 26. All the ancient commentators having noticed in their prefaces to this Epistle, that Corinth was a city, which abounded in wealth, and was full of rhetoricians and philosophers, and that hence arose their disorders, pride, and vainglory, as well as from their gifts; the text appears to require this twofold interpretation. Dr. Whitby.

—— I would to God ye did reign,] I wish with all my heart your happiness were real, that we might be sharers in it: but verily I fear that you are only puffed up with false notions, and that ye have little, except in conceit. Burkitt.

9.— us the apostles last, as it were appointed to death:] This is an allusion to the Roman theatrical spectacles. From a passage of Seneca's Epistles, quoted by Dr. Whitby, it appears, that in the morning those combatants, to whom was given a chance of escaping with their lives, fought with the wild beasts armed. But in the afternoon the gladiators fought naked; and he who escaped was only reserved for slaughter to another day: so that they might well be called persons "appointed to death." By comparing the Apostles to these devoted persons, St. Paul has given us a strong and affecting picture of the dangers which the Apostles encountered in the course of their ministry: dangers, which at length proved fatal to the majority of them. Dr. Macknight.

The design of Providence was, that hereby the world, to whom the Apostles preached the Gospel, might be fully convinced of their sincerity in the preaching of it; that they sought not themselves, or their own ease and advantage, but were content for the propagation of the Gospel, of which they were ministers, to endure the greatest inconveniences, necessities, and extremities. This was sufficient to satisfy all sober and reasonable persons that they had no design of their own, that their only aim was the advancement of that truth, which, with so great a loss and hazard to themselves, they constantly published to the world. Bp. Bull.

10. We are fools for Christ's sake, &c.] We are vile and despised for doing our duty, the exercise of our apostolical office; but you forsooth are very wise men, deeply learned in the doctrine of Christ, &c. Dr. Hammond. In this verse the Apostle repeats ironically the things which his enemies at Corinth said of him. And in the same spirit of irony he attributes to them the contrary qualities. Dr. Macknight.

11.— are naked,] Not strictly so, but ill clothed. Bp. Pearce.

12. And labour, working with our own hands:] The Apostles, whose whole lives were dedicated to preaching the Gospel of Christ, yet were not elevated above the common relations, they did not undervalue the common duties, of life. The very reverse: they frequently recalled men to observe, but never encouraged them to neglect, such duties; they never exhorted them to abandon business or industry; and to retire to the cave or the desert for the purpose of indulging indolence or spiritual pride beneath the mask of devotion, and thus becoming a burden to others for their support, without contributing any thing to the general good. We observe in their conduct no unnecessary austerities, no self-inflicted sufferings, no habitual melancholy; not even in St. Paul, whose conduct is more particularly detailed, and whose remorse for having persecuted the church of Christ had made the deepest impression on his soul: even he did not attempt to atone for his offence by solitude and penance, but by indefatigable activity in the service of that Christ whom he had persecuted: this was sincerity, not enthusiasm. Impostors would not adhere to a religion attended with such difficulties as are here enumerated; see ver. 9—12; enthusiasts would not endeavour to exhibit an example of active, humble industry, even in the midst of the most severe persecutions, and most important religious engagements. The conduct, as well as the language, of the Apostle bespeaks "truth and soberness." Dr. Graves.

13. — as the filth of the earth,] When a city was under any great calamity, the heathens used to choose out some very base, vile, and sordid person, whom they burnt in a ditch, and cast the ashes with imprecations into the sea, for the purification of the city. This is what is meant by "the filth" of the world: and "the offscouring of all things" appears to be another expression for the same thing; namely, the vilest refuse creature in a city, such as used to be the expiation in a publick calamity: or else it signifies the dirt and filth which scavengers rake together in the street, and carry to the dunghil. Dr. Hammond, Burkitt.

We may observe here the several kinds or sufferings to which the holy Apostles were exposed: hunger and want, poverty and reproach, persecution and death. They suffered in their bodies by hunger, and nakedness, and stripes: in their names by scandals and reproaches, being accounted "the filth of the earth and the offscouring of all things." Nor was it only at their first entrance on the apostolical office that they met with this usage; but all along, from the first hour that they began to preach the Gospel, "even unto this present hour," saith St. Paul. The manner too, in which they supported this burden of reproach, disgrace, and persecution, is not less remarkable. "Being reviled, they blessed" the persons that were thus injurious to them. "Being persecuted, they suffered it" patiently. "Being defamed, they intreated" God to pity and pardon their calumniators. Such was the vile esteem which the world had for the holy Apostles and messengers of Christ! such was their humility, their meekness, and patience under it! Burkitt.

The Apostles of the Lord were examples of fervent zeal for the welfare of mankind, of an inoffensive behaviour, of disinterestedness and self-denial, of indefatigable industry, of the most extensive charity, of patience, and courage, and constancy, and of a regular practice of all that they taught. To be a good Christian at that time was to be an example of well-tried virtue, of true wisdom and consummate fortitude; for he surely deserves the name of a great and a good man, who serves God, and is a friend to mankind, and receives the most ungrateful returns from the world, and endures them with a composed and calm mind, who dares look scorn and infamy and death in the face, who can stand forth unmoved and patiently bear to be derided as a fool and an idiot, to be pointed at for a madman and an enthusiast, to be reviled as an atheist and an enemy to all righteousness, to be punished as a robber and a murderer. He who can pass through these trials is a conqueror indeed; and what the world calls courage, scarcely deserves that name when compared to this behaviour.

This constant and pious greatness of soul under the most trying and afflicting circumstances, was one of the means by which Christianity was propagated. The example of the person who is humble in adversity, who places his whole trust in God when God seems to forsake him, this example preaches the Gospel more effectually than the most ingenious and learned discourses, and inclines others to say, surely that faith must be rational and well-grounded, which produces such noble effects; and that religion must have God for its author, which can support the mind under all difficulties and pressures. Dr. Jortin.

opposed the progress, or notoriously violated the rules, of the Gospel, is the opinion of all the ancient commentators, who instance in the death inflicted by St. Peter on Ananias and Sapphira, Acts v. 5, 10; the blindness inflicted by St. Paul on Elymas, chap. xiii. 11; the delivery of Hymeneus and Alexander, and of the incestuous person, unto Satan, 1 Tim. i. 20; 1 Cor. v. 5; that their bodies might be chastised with some disease. And so they interpret these words, "shall I come unto you with a rod?" that is, with punishments and chastisements? This sense is confirmed by the words of the Apostle, 2 Cor. xiii. 10. Opposed to this power of inflicting chastisements is "the spirit of meekness" that follows; namely, mercifulness in withholding punishment on sight of their speedy reformation, which by his present threatenings he desires and hopes to produce, before he comes to them personally. Drs. Whitby and Hammond.

Chap. V. St. Paul reproves the Corinthians for suffering among them an incestuous person, and he delivers him unto Satan, that is to say, to be afflicted in his body by Satan, which was an extraordinary punishment which the Apostles had power to inflict. He represents to them by the comparison of leaven, that it is very dangerous to suffer notorious sinners in the church, since they infect and corrupt others. And lastly he orders the Corinthians to cut off from among them, by excommunication, those that are impure, and all such as live in a scandalous manner, and not to consider them as brethren or members of the church. Ostervald.

Ver. 1. —fornication] The original word denotes all kinds of uncleanness. It here signifies incest joined with adultery, the woman's husband being still living, as appears from 2 Cor. vii. 12. Dr. Macknight.

—— have judged already,] Have already passed sentence on him that hath thus offended. The sentence is contained in the two following verses. Dr. Hammond.

4. In the name of our Lord Jesus Christ, when ye are gathered together, and my spirit,] That in a publick assembly gathered in the name of our Lord Jesus Christ, in which assembly you are to suppose me present among you. Dr. Hammond. Or, in which assembly I will in my desire, and consent, and approbation, be present with you. Bp. Hall.

—— with the power of our Lord Jesus Christ,] Committed ordinarily to His church, so far as to excommunicate; and extraordinarily to His Apostles, so far as in a miraculous manner to give the devil power over the body of the excommunicated person. Dr. Wells.

Among the powers of Christ which attended the preaching of the Gospel this was one, of delivering men for their offences up to Satan, to inflict corporal punishments on them for the destruction of the flesh. This power seems to have been peculiar to the Apostles; and therefore St. Paul here prescribes the doing of it, the authority or power of his spirit being present with the Corinthians. Dr. Whitby.

5. — that the spirit may be saved &c.] That the disease may be a means to bring him to a sense of his sin, and to reformation, and so to salvation also. Dr. Hammond.

6. Your glorying is not good.] Ye Corinthians have no reason to pride yourselves, and to boast and glory of your estate, while ye have such foul sins among you. Bp. Hall.

—— a little leaven leaveneth the whole lump?] So such a member, continued among you, will defile your whole body or society of Christians. Burkitt.

7. Purge out therefore the old leaven, &c.] The Apostle pursues the similitude of leaven in allusion to the Jewish custom, before the celebration of the passover, when the people were commanded to cast all leaven out of their houses upon penalty of being cut off from the congregation of Israel. Burkitt.

—— as ye are unleavened.] That is, forasmuch as your Christianity obliges you so to be. Dr. Whitby. The end of Christianity was to call them from their former wicked courses to newness or holiness of life. This was the spiritual meaning of the command in the Mosaick law, concerning the keeping of the passover with unleavened bread. And as Christ is "our Passover," represented by the paschal lamb under the law, and as such "is sacrificed," the Apostle therefore exhorts the Corinthians to adhere to the true spiritual meaning of the commandment, and to "keep the feast" of the Christian passover, not only by putting away from themselves all sinful practices, and following after sincere and true piety; but also by putting out of the communion of the church every vicious wicked person, and retaining amongst them those only who were free from any mixture of false and impious doctrines, and embraced the truth of the Gospel, which he had taught. Dr. Wells.

The great virtue and efficacy of the sacrifice of Christ was plainly signified by the Jewish passover, wherein the lamb was slain, and the sinner did escape and was passed by. In allusion to this St. Paul makes no scruple to call Christ "our Passover," or Paschal Lamb, who was slain that we might escape. "Christ our Passover is slain (or offered) for us:" that is, He, by the gracious appointment of God, was substituted to suffer in our stead, all that which the paschal lamb was supposed to suffer for the sinner. Abp. Tillotson.

9. I wrote unto you in an epistle,] Some learned men have thought from this passage, that St. Paul wrote an epistle to the Corinthians before he wrote this. It is certain that no such epistle is quoted or alluded to by any ancient author now extant; and therefore others have supposed, what seems more probable, that in this passage St. Paul referred to the former part of this Epistle. Bp. Tomline.

10. Yet not altogether with the fornicators of this world,] Yet I did not intend to require you to avoid the company of heathenish fornicators, or of covetous, or oppressive, or idolatrous heathens: for then ye must go out of the world. Bp. Hall.

11. — that is called a brother] Professing himself a Christian. Dr. Wells.

—— with such an one no not to eat.] Not to admit him to their own table, much less to that of Christ. Burkitt, Dr. Hammond.

Were we to observe this rule with strictness, now that all the world around us are become Christians, we should be obliged to go out of the world. Nevertheless, as Dr. Wall observes, the main sense of it is an everlasting rule: that a conscientious Christian should choose, as far as he can, the company, intercourse, and familiarity of good men, and such as fear God; and avoid, as far as his necessary affairs will permit, the conversation and fellowship of such as St. Paul here describes. This is a thing (whatsoever decay there be of publick discipline) in each particular Christian's power. Dr. Macknight.

12. For what have I to do to judge them also that are without? &c.] As if the Apostle had said, My jurisdiction extendeth not to heathens; I have nothing to do with judging and censuring "them that are without" the church: but such as are "within" the pale of the church, your own members, who own your jurisdiction, these you have an undoubted right and power to judge, leaving the other to the judgment of God. Therefore I advise, nay, charge you, to "put away from yourselves that wicked (incestuous) person," by excommunicating him and banishing him from your communion. Burkitt. The Apostle appears to have written these two verses, to shew the Corinthians the reason, why, after commanding them to pass so severe a sentence on the man, he said nothing concerning the woman, who was guilty with him. She appears not to have owned the Christian faith; and so not to have fallen under the discipline of the church: he leaves her therefore, together with other heathens, to the sentence of God, the Governour and Judge of all. Drs. Macknight and Whitby.

Chap. VI. The Apostle reproves the Corinthians for having recourse to heathen judges and magistrates to determine their lawsuits. He adds upon this occasion, that those who wrong their neighbours shall not enter into the kingdom of heaven, any more than those who are guilty of impurity, and other crimes which he here mentions. He exhorts the Corinthians to pay great regard to the edification of their brethren, in use of things indifferent and lawful; but above all to avoid impurity, proving by several arguments, that this is by no means a matter of indifference, but in itself evil, and utterly inconsistent with the profession of Christianity. Ostervald.

Ver. 1. — a matter] An action or suit. Dr. Hammond.

—— before the unjust, and not before the saints?] Before the heathen magistrate, and not let the matter be decided by your fellow Christians? Dr. Wells. The heathens are called "unjust" or "unrighteous," in the same sense that Christians are called "saints" or "holy." For as the latter were called "saints" on account, not of the real sanctity of their manners, but of their professed faith; so the former were called "unrighteous," on account of their idolatry and unbelief, ver. 6, although many of them were remarkable for their regard to justice and to all the duties of morality. Dr. Macknight, Bp. Pearce.

2, 3. Do ye not know &c.] What particular judgment is here meant, it is not easy to assign or determine.

In the 2d verse of this chapter he probably refers to Dan. vii. 27; and in the 3rd verse he is thought by some to refer to our Saviour's words, John xii. 31; and xvi. 11. Dr. Wells.

4. If then ye have judgments of things pertaining to this life, &c.] Whenever therefore you have any debate about matters of right between man and man, which the parties cannot agree upon, if you do not think fit to trust your church governours with it, refer it to an arbitration of two or three of even the meanest of your Christian brethren. Pyle. Refer it to the meanest and simplest Christians, or even set them in the tribunal, rather than carry your controversy before the Gentile courts. Dr. Hammond.

7. Now therefore there is utterly a fault among you, &c.] It is not so well that you go to law at all: it were the part of a more excellent magnanimous Christian spirit, to be content to lose somewhat of his own, to bear some injuries, rather than to go to law upon every trespass. Dr. Hammond.

8. Nay, ye do wrong, and defraud, &c.] But some of you are so far from this excellent Christian temper, that you are ready to injure others, even your fellow Christians. Dr. Hammond.

Some persons have condemned lawsuits as forbidden by the Gospel, and support their opinion by this passage of St. Paul. But we must so interpret the direction of the Apostle, as to reconcile it at least with his own practice. Now he often put himself under the protection of the Roman law, and claimed his privilege as a Roman citizen, and pleaded his cause before Pagan magistrates, and appealed to Cesar, to escape the hands of his wicked countrymen. When St. Paul gave this direction to the Corinthians, they, as well as other Christian societies, lived in Pagan cities, under Pagan governments, by which they were sometimes indulged with connivance and toleration, at other times hated, oppressed, and persecuted. He therefore doth not forbid them to go to law with unbelievers, and to appeal to Pagan courts of judicature; if they were grievously injured and defrauded by such persons. But he forbids them to go to law with one another, and to carry their causes to those Pagan tribunals, which would be a disgrace to them, and bring an evil report upon the religion which they professed. He exhorts them, instead of having recourse to such scandalous methods, to refer all their differences to arbitrators or judges chosen out of their own body, and to submit to their determinations. Now in these days, and in countries where Christianity is established, and the church and the state constitute one and the same community, the Apostle's direction, together with the reasons by which he supports it, no longer holds good; and all that can fairly be collected from it is, that Christians should avoid litigations as far as they possibly can, and bear with some inconvenience and detriment rather than have recourse to the laws. Dr. Jortin.

9. Know ye not that the unrighteous &c.] As if he had said, Is it possible you should be ignorant of so great a truth as this, so often and so plainly taught you by the Gospel of Christ? Certainly if you know not this, you know nothing in Christianity. God is infinitely good and merciful, and it is out of that infinite goodness and mercy, that He bestows the gift of eternal life upon any man: but God is also infinitely wise, and righteous, and holy; and therefore He will not, I think I may say He cannot, confer the rich donative upon any unrighteous or unholy person. St. Paul here seems to count it strange, that any man, who had been taught the truth as it is in Jesus, should either not know, or not believe, or not consider this. Bp. Bull.

11. And such were some of you:] Such sins as these were ordinary among you in the time of your heathen state: but now you have given up your names to Christianity, which denounceth judgment against all those: your baptism is a renouncing of them all; your sanctification by the Spirit directly contrary to it; your justification by what Christ hath suffered and done for you, utterly incompatible with such impurities and iniquities. Dr. Hammond. "Ye are washed," that is, your former sins are washed away or forgiven at your baptism: "but ye are sanctified," that is, made saints or members of Christ's church, and as such ought now to follow after holiness and purity of life: "but ye are justified," that is, put into a state of justification. Dr. Wells.

Here having been washed in Christ's name doth, in congruity with what is said in other places, denote baptism in His name; being sanctified and justified do express the first benefits accompanying that baptism. And indeed, wherever a general remission of sins, or a full sanctification, or consecration, and justification of men's persons in God's sight, are mentioned; that remission of sins, that separation, or dedication unto God's service, that reception into grace, which are consigned in baptism, are I conceive understood; there being no other season or occasion, wherein ordinarily and visibly God doth exhibit those benefits. Dr. Isaac Barrow.

12. All things are lawful unto me, &c.] The Apostle still proceeds in the reprehensory part of his epistle, and begins here to reprove the growing heresy of those who allowed the eating of things sacrificed to idols, and fornication, as things indifferent. He here grants, that all indifferent things are "lawful," and may be used, first, when they are expedient, that is, when they may be used without hurting ourselves or others; and secondly, when they do not get such a dominion over us, as to enslave us to an intemperate and immoderate use of them. Burkitt.

13. Meats for the belly, &c.] Meats are ordained for the belly, and the belly is at present ordained for the reception of meats: but as God will destroy meats, so will He destroy the belly also, as to the use it now hath: for in the resurrection men shall neither hunger nor thirst any more. Burkitt. The Apostle's argument is, that in the next life, which is a spiritual life, the desire of meat shall be taken away; and therefore even here we should keep the flesh in due subordination to the spirit. Dr. Hammond.

—— Now the body is not for fornication, &c.] From this verse to the end of the chapter, the Apostle labours by sundry arguments to convince the Corinthians of the exceeding sinfulness of the sin of fornication, partly because they reckoned it among indifferent things, and also because, before their conversion to Christianity, they were notoriously addicted to this sin. Burkitt.

—— but for the Lord; &c.] The body is not to be prostituted to lust, but to be consecrated to the Lord; and the Lord challenges the members of the body to be the property of Himself, who is their head. Bp. Hall. And who is the benefactor of our bodies as well as of our souls. Burkitt.

14. —and will also raise up us] Since therefore our bodies are to be raised, and to be fashioned like unto Christ's glorious body, they ought not to be defiled with lust here on earth. Burkitt.

15. —your bodies] As ye are Christians, "are the members of Christ," who is your head? 1 Cor. xii. 12, 27. Drs. Wells and Whitby. By reason of that perfect union, which is betwixt Christ and His Church, your bodies are the members of the mystical body of Christ. Bp. Hall.

CHAP. VII.

2 He treateth of marriage, 4 shewing it to be a remedy against fornication: 10 and that the bond thereof ought not lightly to be dissolved. 18, 20 Every man must be content with his vocation. 25 Virginity wherefore to be embraced. 35 And for what respects we may either marry, or abstain from marrying.

NOW concerning the things whereof ye wrote unto me: It is good for a man not to touch a woman.

2 Nevertheless, to avoid fornication, let every man have his own wife, and let every woman have her own husband.

Anno DOMINI 59.

3 Let the husband render unto the wife due benevolence: and likewise also the wife unto the husband.

4 The wife hath not power of her own body, but the husband: and likewise also the husband hath not power of his own body, but the wife.

5 Defraud ye not one the other, except it be with consent for a time, that ye may give yourselves to fasting and prayer; and come together again, that Satan tempt you not for your incontinency.

6 But I speak this by permission, and not of commandment.

7 For I would that all men were even as I myself. But every man hath his proper gift of God, one after this manner, and another after that.

8 I say therefore to the unmarried and widows, It is good for them if they abide even as I.

9 But if they cannot contain, let them marry: for it is better to marry than to burn.

10 And unto the married I command,

17. But he that is joined unto the Lord] That is, he that keeps close to Christ's commandments, and so cleaves to Him, Deut. x. 20, hath a spiritual union with Him. Dr. Hammond. He is "one spirit" with Him, as being partaker of His Spirit; for by one Spirit we Christians are all united to this Head, Rom. viii. 11; 1 Cor. xii. 13. Dr. Whitby.

18. —Every sin that a man doeth] That is, every other sin, "is without" any proper debasement of "the body," and debases only the soul: "but he that committeth fornication sinneth against his own body," as well as against his soul, by debasing his body, and degrading it from its proper dignity and honour; making that the member of an harlot which was made to be a member of Christ. Dr. Wells, Burkitt.

19. —your body is the temple of the Holy Ghost] Two things concur to make up the notion of a temple. The Divinity dwells in it, and it is dedicated and consecrated to His use. And because the Holy Ghost dwells in the bodies of Christians, and they are appropriated to His use and service, therefore they are called His temple. Excellent is the inference of Tertullian, that 'since all Christians are become the temple of God, by virtue of His Holy Spirit sent into their hearts, and consecrating their bodies to His service, we should make chastity the keeper of this sacred house, and suffer nothing unclean or profane to enter into it, lest that God, who dwelleth in it, being offended, should desert His habitation thus defiled.' Dr. Whitby.

20. For ye are bought with a price:] Even the precious blood of Christ. Dr. Whitby. This price makes purchase of our bodies as well as of our souls, and so leaves us not at liberty to dispose of them as we please, but engages us to serve and glorify God in both. Dr. Hammond.

Chap. VII. The Apostle, having finished the reprehensory part of his Epistle, proceeds to resolve divers cases of conscience, about which the Corinthians had written to him; particularly concerning marriage: not about the lawfulness of marriage, for that was not in dispute; but about the expediency of it at that time, whether it were advisable in that afflicted state of the church. Burkitt.

Ver. 1. —It is good for a man not to touch a woman.] The meaning of the Apostle is, that a single life was more agreeable to the actual necessity, more convenient in regard to the then persecuted state of the church, as being a condition less distracted with cares and less troubled with business. Burkitt.

2. —let every man] Who hath not the gift of continency. Dr. Wells. It is to be observed here, that the Apostle's expression is general, "every man," and "every woman:" he excepts against no particular orders of persons, as is done by the church of Rome; but every one is permitted, nay, for avoiding fornication is commanded, to marry. It is to be observed further, that by the direction for "every man to have his own wife, and every woman her own husband," polygamy, or the sin of having either more wives or more husbands at the same time than one, is here forbidden. Burkitt.

3. Let the husband render unto the wife due benevolence:] Let them on all occasions be ready mutually to oblige, and consult the happiness of each other. And let them not imagine that there is any perfection in living separate from each other, as if they were in a state of celibacy. Dr. Doddridge.

5. —for your incontinency.] Or, 'by reason of your not being able to contain.' Dr. Hammond.

6. But I speak this] Namely, which I am now about to say, "by permission," and do "not of commandment" of the Lord enjoin abstinence from marriage, ver. 25. Dr. Whitby. See the notes on ver. 12, and 25.

7. —that all men were even as I myself.] That all Christians could as easily live a single life in present circumstances, and exercise as resolute a command over their natural desires. Common sense requires us thus to limit the expression: for it would be a most flagrant absurdity to suppose that St. Paul wished marriage might entirely cease. Dr. Doddridge.

8. —the unmarried] Those who were so at the time of writing: widowers, and so properly joined with widows. Bp. Pearce.

Anno DOMINI 59.

yet not I, but the Lord, Let not the wife depart from her husband:

11 But and if she depart, let her remain unmarried, or be reconciled to her husband: and let not the husband put away his wife.

12 But to the rest speak I, not the Lord: If any brother hath a wife that believeth not, and she be pleased to dwell with him, let him not put her away.

13 And the woman which hath an husband that believeth not, and if he be pleased to dwell with her, let her not leave him.

14 For the unbelieving husband is sanctified by the wife, and the unbelieving wife is sanctified by the husband: else were your children unclean; but now are they holy.

15 But if the unbelieving depart, let him depart. A brother or a sister is not under bondage in such cases: but God hath called us † to peace.

† Gr. in peace.

16 For what knowest thou, O wife, whether thou shalt save thy husband? or how knowest thou, O man, whether thou shalt save thy wife?

Anno DOMINI 59.

17 But as God hath distributed to every man, as the Lord hath called every one, so let him walk. And so ordain I in all churches.

18 Is any man called being circumcised? let him not become uncircumcised. Is any called in uncircumcision? let him not be circumcised.

19 Circumcision is nothing, and uncircumcision is nothing, but the keeping of the commandments of God.

20 Let every man abide in the same calling wherein he was called.

21 Art thou called being a servant? care not for it: but if thou mayest be made free, use it rather.

22 For he that is called in the Lord, being a servant, is the Lord's † freeman: likewise also he that is called, being free, is Christ's servant.

† Gr. made free.

23 Ye are bought with a price; be not ye the servants of men.

---

10. — not I,] Only, "but the Lord" also, Matt. xix. 6, 9. Dr. Whitby.

12. But to the rest speak I, not the Lord:] But to the rest, that are unequally matched with infidels, I speak as an Apostle of Christ; having otherwise no express charge for it, either in the law or in the words of Christ. Bp. Hall. St. Paul does not say this to intimate, that this direction was given by him, only as a man using his natural reason: but to signify, that our Lord, in His discourse touching divorce, had not decided the case of the marriage of a believer with an infidel, but had left this to the decision of the Apostles, by the assistance of the Holy Ghost, who was promised to lead them into all truth. Dr. Whitby.

14. — is sanctified by the wife,] Or, because of the wife: that is, by becoming one flesh with the believing wife, he is to be reputed as sanctified, so far as relates to conjugal duties. Drs. Whitby and Wells.

—— else were your children unclean; but now are they holy.] That is, otherwise such children among you, as are born of one believing and one unbelieving parent, would be "unclean," or heathens in the sight of God: "but now" under the Gospel, they are esteemed for the sake of the believing parent as "holy;" or, as having by birth a title to be admitted into covenant with God; and so they are to be admitted into the Christian church by baptism, the outward rite appointed by God for admitting members into His church. Drs. Wells and Whitby, Burkitt.

15. — A brother or a sister is not under bondage in such cases:] A believer is not hereupon to be held in bondage to an unbelieving wife or husband, in case of the unbelieving party renouncing matrimonial society with the believer. Bp. Hall.

—— but God hath called us to peace.] The words may be taken as a caution, intimating that notwithstanding the foregoing indulgence, it is above all things to be remembered, that the believing party is to do the utmost that is consistent with Christianity, in order to live peaceably with the other. Dr. Wells.

17. But as God hath distributed to every man, &c.] But whatever the success of that may be, let me desire every Christian to continue contentedly in that state, condition, and relation, wherein he was at his first conversion: and not think that Christianity dissolves his obligation to any natural or civil duties. Pyle.

18. — let him not become uncircumcised.] Let not the native Jew affect the state of him, who was born a Gentile: nor the native Gentile that of him, who was born a Jew. Burkitt.

19. Circumcision is nothing, &c.] For such outward things, on either side, are no part of Christianity, but the observation of the precepts of Christ is all in all. See Gal. v. 6; vi. 15. Dr. Hammond. That is, nothing now available to salvation, nothing that renders persons more or less acceptable in the sight of God; but the keeping of the commandments of God, this is all in all: for God regards, not men's outward conditions, but obedience to His commandments. Burkitt.

20. Let every man abide &c.] So again, for your civil relations in particular: let every one remain in the state, in which his Christianity found him. Pyle.

It is plain from what immediately follows, that this is not an absolute command, but only signifies, that a man should not think himself discharged, by the privilege of his Christian state, from any ties or obligations, in which he was, as a member of civil society. Still it was lawful for Christians, as well as others, to change, in cases where it would have been lawful for them to change supposing that they had not become Christians. Locke.

21. — being a servant?] Or slave. The condition of slaves, according to the laws and customs of the Romans, was truly wretched and deplorable: far different from that of Hebrew servants among the Jews. A knowledge of the legal state of these unhappy persons under the Roman government, better enables us to enter into the full meaning and spirit of several passages of the New Testament, particularly in the Epistles of St. Paul. Parkhurst. The Apostle could not in stronger terms express his deep conviction of the small importance of human distinctions, than when speaking of what seems to great and generous minds the most miserable lot, even that of a slave, he says, "Care not for it." Dr. Doddridge.

22. — he that is called in the Lord, &c.] Though he be a slave to man, yet, as a Christian, he is Christ's freeman, John viii. 36, in the most honourable sense of true freedom: and the Christian, who is no man's slave, is yet a servant, and owes an absolute obedience to Christ, our common Lord and Master. Pyle.

23. Ye are bought with a price; &c.] Ye are bought to a holy freedom by the precious ransom of the blood of Christ. And therefore, if ye may be outwardly free, do not sell yourselves to the servitude of men; or, if ye be bondmen or servants, yet be not so the slaves of men, as for their sakes to do that which is unworthy of your Christian profession. Bp. Hall.

Anno DOMINI 59.

24 Brethren, let every man, wherein he is called, therein abide with God.

25 Now concerning virgins I have no commandment of the Lord: yet I give my judgment, as one that hath obtained mercy of the Lord to be faithful.

26 I suppose therefore that this is good for the present ‖ distress, I say, that it is good for a man so to be.

‖ Or, necessity.

27 Art thou bound unto a wife? seek not to be loosed. Art thou loosed from a wife? seek not a wife.

28 But and if thou marry, thou hast not sinned; and if a virgin marry, she hath not sinned. Nevertheless such shall have trouble in the flesh: but I spare you.

29 But this I say, brethren, the time is short: it remaineth, that both they that have wives be as though they had none;

30 And they that weep, as though they wept not; and they that rejoice, as though they rejoiced not; and they that buy, as though they possessed not;

31 And they that use this world, as not abusing it: for the fashion of this world passeth away.

Anno DOMINI 59.

32 But I would have you without carefulness. He that is unmarried careth for the things that belong to the Lord, how he may please the Lord:

33 But he that is married careth for the things that are of the world, how he may please his wife.

34 There is difference also between a wife and a virgin. The unmarried woman careth for the things of the Lord, that she may be holy both in body and in spirit: but she that is married careth for the things of the world, how she may please her husband.

35 And this I speak for your own profit; not that I may cast a snare upon you, but for that which is comely, and that ye may attend upon the Lord without distraction.

36 But if any man think that he behaveth himself uncomely toward his virgin, if

---

Slaves were bought and sold in the market, as cattle are; and so by the price paid, there was a property acquired in them. This, therefore, is a reason for what he advised that they should not be slaves to men, because Christ had paid a price for them, and they belonged to Him. The slavery he speaks of is civil slavery, which he makes use of here to convince the Corinthians, that the civil ties of marriage were not dissolved by a man's becoming a Christian, since slavery itself was not; and in general, in the next verse he tells them, that nothing in any man's civil estate, or rights, is altered by his becoming a Christian. Locke.

25. Now concerning virgins] That is, such of either sex as have never yet been married. Dr. Wells.

—— as one that hath obtained mercy] As I am an Apostle of Christ, and one that hath obtained this mercy of the Lord to be faithful in the place wherein He set me: (Bp. Hall:) and on whose judgment you may rely in the matter. Dr. Wells.

This, saith the Apostle, is all that is required of a minister of God, and steward of His mysteries, that he be found faithful in administering the grace of his apostleship, chap. iv. 1, 2. And this fidelity was still attended with the power of Christ assisting the Apostles, as appears from these words, "I thank Christ Jesus our Lord, who hath enabled me, for that He counted me faithful, putting me into the ministry," 1 Tim. i. 12. So that this phrase doth not imply, as some imagine, that the Apostle had only an ordinary assistance in this advice, such as any pious skilful pastor may still expect. Dr. Whitby.

26. —for the present distress,] Considering the many and terrible persecutions, to which the church was then daily subject. Pyle. From the expression here it is evident that this judgment of the Apostle cannot relate to the peaceable times of the church. Dr. Whitby.

——for a man] Or woman. The original word signifies the whole species, both male and female. Bp. Pearce.

28. —Nevertheless such shall have trouble in the flesh:] Only in such times as these the married state is likely to be fullest of trouble. Dr. Hammond.

29. But this I say, brethren, the time is short: &c.] This may have been said out of a prophetical foresight of the approaching persecution under Nero. Locke. Or, it may be taken generally, as if he had said, Let all persons, whether married or unmarried, consider that the time of this life is short and transitory; it is therefore true spiritual wisdom to look upon outward comforts and gratifications as they will shortly be: to be moderate in the enjoyment of them; not to be too much affected when we have them, or too much afflicted when we want them. Burkitt.

32. But I would have you without carefulness.] St. Paul here gives as a reason for his observations concerning an unmarried state being preferable to a married one, that "he would have them without carefulness," that is, free from those greater cares of the world that attend a married life. Dr. Wells.

35. —not that I may cast a snare upon you,] Not that I would force upon you a necessity of containing, and thereby cast a snare upon your consciences. Bp. Hall.

—— but for that which is comely,] Or most suitable to your profession of Christianity. Dr. Wells. This seems to intimate that they were now in circumstances, in which God did, as it were, exact a peculiar severity from all their thoughts; and that it was a time to think of the trials of martyrdom, rather than the endearment of human affections. Dr. Doddridge.

The reasons advanced by the Apostle for preferring the single to the married state are, that unmarried persons of both sexes have more leisure than the married, to "care for the things of the Lord, how they may please the Lord," and to render themselves "holy, both in body and in spirit." In the first ages of Christianity, next to their believing in Christ, men's greatest duty was publickly to confess their faith in Him, how great soever the evils might be, which befell them on that account. For by openly confessing their faith, especially if they sealed that confession with their blood, the Gospel was to be continued in the world. This was an object of such importance, that our Lord solemnly declared, "Whosoever shall confess Me before men," in a time of persecution, "him will I confess also before My Father which is in heaven. But whosoever shall deny Me before men, him will I also deny," &c. This duty being as difficult as it was necessary, that persons of both sexes might perform it with the greater ease, the Apostle recommended to both a single life, if they could therein live continently; because being attached to the world by fewer ties, they would leave it with the less regret, when called to die for the Gospel. Dr. Macknight.

36. —toward his virgin,] That is, his virgin daughter, as the term sometimes signifies in the best Greek writers. Parkhurst, Schleusner. The meaning of this and the next verse is as follows: 36. If any man find it not fit to continue his daughter in the state of virginity, for that either her age or disposition persuades the contrary, I press him not, but leave him at liberty: let him do she pass the flower of her age, and need so require, let him do what he will, he sinneth not: let them marry.

37 Nevertheless he that standeth stedfast in his heart, having no necessity, but hath power over his own will, and hath so decreed in his heart that he will keep his virgin, doeth well.

38 So then he that giveth her in marriage doeth well; but he that giveth her not in marriage doeth better.

39 The wife is bound by the law as long as her husband liveth; but if her husband be dead, she is at liberty to be married to whom she will; only in the Lord.

40 But she is happier if she so abide, after my judgment: and I think also that I have the Spirit of God.

CHAP. VIII.

1 To abstain from meats offered to idols. 8, 9 We must not abuse our Christian liberty, to the offence of our brethren: 11 but must bridle our knowledge with charity.

Anno DOMINI 59.

NOW as touching things offered unto idols, we know that we all have knowledge. Knowledge puffeth up, but charity edifieth.

2 And if any man think that he knoweth any thing, he knoweth nothing yet as he ought to know.

3 But if any man love God, the same is known of him.

4 As concerning therefore the eating of those things that are offered in sacrifice unto idols, we know that an idol is nothing in the world, and that there is none other God but one.

5 For though there be that are called gods, whether in heaven or in earth, (as there be gods many, and lords many,)

6 But to us there is but one God, the what he will: he offendeth not in giving her in marriage. 37. Nevertheless, he that is resolved thus to keep his daughter unmarried, finding no necessity, either in her disposition or in his own estate, but perceives, after careful deliberation and due inquiry, that he hath good ground and power so to do, he doth well in it. Bp. Hall.

As both the Jews and Greeks reckoned celibacy dishonourable, some fathers might think it sinful to restrain their daughters from marriage; while others, following the opinions of the Essenes and more rigid philosophers, fancied they acted properly in restraining them. The Corinthians therefore had judged it necessary to consult the Apostle on that head. Dr. Macknight.

38. — doeth better.] Doth what is more for the benefit of his daughter: because, if she agrees to it, by keeping her in his own family unmarried, she will be exposed to fewer temptations than if she were married, and in a better condition for acquiring that holiness in body and spirit, which will enable her to adhere to the Gospel in a time of persecution. Dr. Macknight.

39. The wife is bound by the law as long as her husband liveth; &c.] The Apostle concludes the chapter with resolving the case, whether or not second marriages were lawful. He answers, they were. After the death of her husband the widow might marry again, provided she married in the Lord; that is, with a believer. But though the Apostle asserts the lawfulness of widows' marrying again, he declares that considering the persecuted state of the church they would be more happy in their widowhood. Burkitt.

40. — I think also that I have the Spirit of God.] Be assured, whatever your new teachers may think of me, my directions are given by the special guidance and assistance of the Holy Spirit. "I think that I have" may be rendered "I have;" or rather thus, 'Surely I have.' Pyle. The phrase does not imply that the Apostle was in any doubt whether he was inspired in giving this judgment. It is only a soft way of expressing his certain knowledge of his own inspiration, and may have been used in irony with a view to the false teacher who called his inspiration in question. Dr. Macknight. This ironical seeming doubt was designed to imply the strongest affirmation, and to put his adversaries to shame. Abp. Secker.

Chap. VIII. St. Paul examines the question proposed to him by the Corinthians, whether it is lawful for Christians to eat things which had been offered unto idols, and to be present at the feast of the heathens, in the temples of their false gods: to which he answers, That Christians know very well there is but one God, and that idols are lifeless and vain, and could not defile the meats offered to them, and therefore that it was lawful to eat even of meats offered to idols. Nevertheless the Apostle observes, that all had not the same knowledge in this particular; and therefore he warns those Christians who were most knowing, not to abuse their liberty in this point, for fear they should, by eating things offered to idols, give offence to weak Christians, and occasion them to sin by eating contrary to the dictates of their conscience, and even to fall into idolatry. Ostervald.

Ver. 1. — we know that we all have knowledge. &c.] We, who abstain from eating things offered unto idols in order to avoid offending the weak, know as well as others among you, who act differently, that an idol is nothing; for we all have this knowledge. Yet knowledge, when it is not joined with charity, is only apt to make men swell with pride; but love to God, and consequently to our neighbour, makes us have regard to the welfare of others in our actions, and thereby renders ourselves also truly Christians. Drs. Whitby and Wells.

2. — think that he knoweth any thing,] And by reason of that knowledge despiseth others, not regarding their welfare. Dr. Whitby.

3. But if any mun love God,] And his brethren, in and for God, the same man is approved and accepted of God: it is not therefore our knowledge, but our love, for which we are accepted of Him. Bp. Hall.

4. As concerning therefore the eating &c.] As to your question then, whether a Christian may eat of an idol entertainment, having no reverence for the idol, but doing it in a mere civil way; I say we know, as well as your new teachers can tell us, that the heathen demons or their images have no manner of divinity in them. Pyle.

—— an idol is nothing in the world,] Has no existence as a god, has no share in the government of the world. Dr. Macknight. Not absolutely nothing, whether by an idol be understood the image itself, or the sun, moon, air, Cesar, or the like, represented thereby: but, as Dr. Whitby remarks, 'nothing of a god, for the Apostle proves that an idol is nothing, because there is no God but one.' Parkhurst.

5. — (as there be gods many, and lords many,)] That is, there are such in the estimation of the heathens, they having their celestial and terrestrial gods and lords. Dr. Whitby.

6. But to us there is but one God, &c.] To us there is but one God, even that eternal Father, of whom and from whom all things, and we amongst the rest, receive their being; and one Lord Jesus Christ, in and by whom all, both being and blessings, are derived from God the Father unto us and all creatures. Bp. Hall.

In these words as "the Father" is opposed as much unto the "many lords" as "many gods," so is the Son as much unto the "many gods" as "many lords:" the Father being as much Lord as God, and the Son as much God as Lord. Bp. Pearson.

11 And through thy knowledge shall the weak brother perish, for whom Christ died?

12 But when ye sin so against the brethren, and wound their weak conscience, ye sin against Christ.

13 Wherefore, if meat make my brother to offend, I will eat no flesh while the world standeth, lest I make my brother to offend.

As the name of "God," truly common to all three Persons of the blessed Trinity, is, not in way of exclusion, but according to a mysterious peculiarity, attributed to God the Father, who is the fountain of the Deity, and first in order amongst the Divine Persons; so likewise is the name "Lord," truly common to the other Persons, peculiarly, though not exclusively, ascribed and appropriated unto God the Son. Dr. Isaac Barrow.

It is observed by the ancient commentators upon this place, that as the Apostle, by saying "there is one Lord Jesus Christ," cannot be reasonably supposed to exclude the Father from being also the Lord of Christians, as He is often styled in the New Testament; so neither by saying "there is one God, the Father," ought he to be supposed to exclude Jesus Christ from being also the God of Christians. The primitive Fathers, considering God the Father as the fountain of the Deity, and Jesus Christ as God, frequently assert two things, which may serve to illustrate this passage. 1st, That Christians acknowledged one God only, even the Father, and yet that Jesus Christ was truly God, of the substance of the Father. 2dly, That God the Father was the Creator of all things, and yet that all things were created by the word. Dr. Whitby.

Or the intention of the Apostle may be as follows: The name Father, applied to God in the books of the New Testament, is taken in several senses: sometimes for the first Person in the Holy Trinity, as distinguished from the other two; at other times for the Author and Preserver of all things, in opposition to His creatures, in which sense He is said to be our Father and we to be His offspring. Agreeably to this, the Apostle by the Father here does not mean the first Person of the blessed Trinity, in opposition to the Son and Holy Spirit, but only affirms it in opposition to the Gentile world, who acknowledged many gods, to whom they gave the name of 'fathers;' that in the Christian religion we acknowledge but one God, the only Father, Creator, and Preserver of all things, and accordingly he explains himself in the words immediately following: "of whom are all things, and we in Him; and one Lord Jesus Christ, by whom are all things, and we by Him." Dr. Cockman. "The Father, of whom are all things," means God in His nature, which includes the whole Trinity, who are jointly the Father of all creatures. Leslie.

7. Howbeit there is not in every man that knowledge:] But howsoever ye have knowledge to understand this, yet every man hath not: for some ignorant Christians, out of a misled conscience, thinking hereupon that there is some virtue conceived to be in the idol, eat the meat sacrificed thereunto, with some kind of good respect to the idol; and so their conscience being weak is by your example defiled and drawn into sin. Bp. Hall.

8, 9. But meat commendeth us not to God: &c.] As if the Apostle had said, It is not the eating or the not eating, simply considered, that makes a man either better or worse, more or less acceptable in the sight of God; but we must take great heed, lest by our example others take occasion to worship the idol; you therefore ought not so to eat as to give occasion to the fall of your weak brother. Burkitt.

10. — sit at meat in the idol's temple,] 'The Gentiles,' saith Josephus, 'offer hecatombs to their gods, and use their temples for their banqueting houses;' so we read, Judg. ix. 27; Amos ii. 8; and in profane authors very frequently. When therefore, saith the Apostle, the weak Jews who abhorred idols, or the Gentiles newly converted from the worship of them, shall see thee doing the same thing, which heathens do in honour of their idols, and that in places appropriated to their worship; will they not be tempted by the example of such a strong and knowing Christian to conclude, either that idolatry is by Christians accounted no sin, or that the idol deserves some honour; and so comply with heathens from these erroneous principles in eating things offered to idols? Dr. Whitby.

11. — for whom Christ died?] From this and the like passage, Rom. xiv. 15, it is strongly argued, that Christ intentionally died for those that may for ever perish. Dr. Whitby.

That Jesus is the Saviour of all men, is expressed in numerous passages of the Scriptures in the most general and comprehensive terms. But farther, to exclude any limitation or diminution of these so general terms, at least to exclude any limitation in regard to all the members of the visible church, which are or have been incorporated thereinto, it is expressed, that our Saviour's undertakings did respect even those, who by their own default might lose the benefit of them, and who in effect should not be saved. For of those false teachers, who introduced "pernicious heresies," it is said that "they denied the Lord who bought them," 2 Pet. ii. 1. And St. Paul implies, that by a scandalous example "a weak brother, for whom Christ died," being induced to sin might be "destroyed." "And by thy knowledge shall thy weak brother perish, for whom Christ died." And "do not," saith he again, "by thy eating destroy him, for whom Christ died," Rom. xiv. 15. And the Apostle to the Hebrews signifies concerning apostates, that they do "trample upon the Son of God, and pollute the blood of Christ, by which they were sanctified, Heb. x. 29. Dr. Isaac Barrow.

13. — I will eat no flesh] In heathen countries a great part of the meat sold in the publick markets had been sacrificed to their idols. And therefore as the Jews were extremely scrupulous in every thing that had any relation to idolatry, it might on some occasions be necessary for the Christians to abstain from every kind of flesh, to avoid giving offence to such converted Jews as still retained their old prejudices. The Apostle here engages rather to submit to this, than to be the occasion of another's ruin. Drs. Whitby and Macknight.

We learn from this chapter, that it is the duty of Christians, in matters wherein they are left at liberty by the law of God, to take that part which they see will give least occasion of sin to their brethren, and to avoid that part which, if taken, will certainly give others occasion to sin. Although we be ourselves well satisfied of the lawfulness of an action, we ought to deny ourselves in some things, rather than occasion our brethren to fall into sin. He deserves not the name of a Christian, who will not abridge himself of his Christian liberty to preserve his brother from sin and temptation. Burkitt.

Chap. IX. St. Paul, upon several prudential considerations, would not receive maintenance from the Corinthian Christians, but lived either upon his own labour, or contributions from other churches. The heads of the faction raised reflections upon this, to the disparagement of the Apostle; nay, insinuated it to be a tacit confession, he was indeed no true Apostle at all. The well affected part of the church seem plainly to have desired some account of his conduct in this matter. The Apostle's answer. He claims a right to a maintenance from them as much as any other Apostle could do; and proves it. Gives his reason why he did not make use of that right in the Corinthian church. His great condescension to the weaknesses and prejudices of all sorts of Christian people; illustrated by a familiar comparison, and recommended to their imitation. Pyle.

Ver. 1. — am I not free?] That is, to maintain myself, or to be maintained by others. Pyle.

—— have I not seen Jesus Christ our Lord?] The Apostles being chosen to be witnesses of the resurrection, it was requisite that St. Paul should also see Him risen. Hence the language addressed to him by Ananias, Acts xxii. 14, 15; and his own declaration to Agrippa, Acts xxvi. 26. Accordingly we find that Christ was seen of him, chap. xv. 8; nay, often appeared to him after His resurrection, Acts xviii. 9; xxii. 18; and that he was taught the Gospel by "the immediate revelation of Jesus Christ," Gal. i. 12. Dr. Whitby.

—— are not ye my work in the Lord?] I converted you to the faith, and planted the Gospel at Corinth. Dr. Hammond.

4. Have we not power to eat and to drink?] That is, I claim the same right to be maintained by the people, to whom I preach, as the other Apostles do. It was agreeable to the Eastern style to assert things for truths, by way of interrogation of their contraries. Pyle.

5. — a sister, a wife,] That is, a Christian wife. Bp. Pearce, Dr. Macknight. Have we not power to lead about with us our wives at the charge of the church, as well as other Apostles? Bp. Hall.

—— as the brethren of the Lord,] Or the Lord's kinsmen. So St. James is called, Gal. i. 19; and he is here pointed at. Pyle.

—— and Cephas?] From this we learn, that St. Peter, here called Cephas, continued to live with his wife after he became an Apostle: also, that St. Peter as an Apostle possessed no rights which were not common to St. Paul and to all the rest. These facts, being traced to their obvious consequences, utterly subvert the main pillars of popery. Dr. Macknight.

6. — Barnabas,] He is named here, because he was St. Paul's companion, separated for the apostleship of the Gentiles, Acts xiii. 2; who was one of them, among the Apostles' first converts, that having land in Cyprus sold it, and laid the money at their feet, called by them "the Son of Consolation:" and it seems here, in his travels with St. Paul, worked together with him for their living, that they might not be burdensome to their new converts. Bp. Fell.

—— to forbear working?] That is, for our maintenance. Dr. Wells. From this it appears, that St. Barnabas as well as St. Paul preached the Gospel without demanding maintenance from his disciples, and that he also was hated for his doctrine by the Judaizers. The honourable mention here made of him by St. Paul deserves notice, as it shews that these good men, notwithstanding their contention mentioned Acts xv. 39, entertained no resentment against each other on that account, but mutually esteemed each other. Dr. Macknight.

7. Who goeth a warfare &c.] And shall we soldiers of Jesus Christ, the planters of His spiritual vineyard, the pastors of His flock, be debarred of this privilege? Dr. Whitby.

8. Say I these things as a man? &c.] What I say is agreeable, not only to human reason, but also to revelation. Dr. Wells.

10. — For our sakes, no doubt, this is written: &c.] The precept concerning oxen, being introduced in the law immediately after precepts enjoining justice and mercy in punishments, was certainly intended to impress the Israelites with a sense of the obligations of justice and humanity towards rational creatures, as the Apostle here affirms. Dr. Macknight. God thereby shews in general, what equity should be used in the just rewarding of all men that labour for us; and particularly that the spiritual labourers, such as plow, and sow, and thresh in the spiritual husbandry, should labour in hope of a livelihood and subsistence, and eat their bread when they have earned it. Burkitt.

16 For though I preach the gospel, I have nothing to glory of: for necessity is laid upon me; yea, woe is unto me, if I preach not the gospel!

17 For if I do this thing willingly, I have a reward: but if against my will, a dispensation of the gospel is committed unto me.

conduct of the other Apostles, and from that of St. Paul at other places, particularly among the Macedonian churches, we may conclude, that he might see some circumstances at Corinth which determined him to decline accepting of any subsistence from them whilst he resided there. Dr. Doddridge.

13. Do ye not know &c.] The former argument was drawn from the application of a precept, literally spoken of oxen, to a spiritual sense. This is a plainer argument from the law, taken from the example of the Levites, to whom a considerable part of the sacrifices in the temple and at the altar was allowed by God Himself for their ministration. Dr. Wells, Burkitt.

15. — than that any man should make my glorying void.] Than that I should lose this glory of my free and unrecompensed preaching of the Gospel amongst you; wherein I have both prevented scandal, and excelled and shamed the false apostles. Bp. Hall.

16. For though I preach the gospel, I have nothing to glory of: &c.] That in which the Apostle glories is not his bare preaching of the Gospel, but his preaching of it freely and without maintenance. The strength of his argument lies in this; that no man can reasonably boast of, glory in, or expect an extraordinary reward for, the doing of that which he is under a command from his superiour to do, and that under a penalty for disobedience. This was his case: necessity was laid upon him to preach the Gospel, but no necessity to preach it freely: therefore for him so to preach it, without demanding any reward, was matter of glorying, which he declares he had rather die than any should take from him. Burkitt.

18. What is my reward then?] What is it then which shall bring me in a reward? Dr. Hammond. Or, what is matter of special reward and glory to me? Dr. Whitby. As if he had said, The only thing that I can holily glory in, is this, That I have preached the Gospel cost free; and have not so abused my power and liberty as to be a scandal unto any whatsoever. Bp. Hall.

It may be hence observed, that there is matter of glorying in things done by the assistance of the grace of God, and it is for the glory of a man to do them, ver. 15: see also 2 Cor. xi. 10; i. 12; Gal. vi. 4. The glorying, which the Apostle elsewhere rejects and excludes, is only that of the merit of our works, or their sufficiency to procure the justification of a sinner, Rom. iii. 27; iv. 2; or that which excludes the assistance of the grace of God in Christ, chap. i. 29, 31. Dr. Whitby.

19. — yet have I made myself servant unto all,] "Servants," or rather slaves, were wholly in the power of their masters, who had power of life and death over them, much more of their bodies for labour, without giving them any wages or reward. St. Paul being a free man, no slave to the Corinthians, that is, under no obligation to preach without maintenance, might in reason have expected from them a reward for all his services, his preaching, and the like: but he did all this for nothing, and so he "made himself a servant unto all." Dr. Hammond.

20. And unto the Jews I became as a Jew,] In like manner I have denied myself the use of my Christian liberty in many other things also. Dr. Hammond. To the unconverted Jews I became as a Jew, circumcising Timothy for their sakes, Acts xvi. 3. Dr. Whitby.

—— to them that are under the law,] That is, in their own opinion still subject to the obligation of it, I became "as under the law," purifying myself in the temple, because they were zealous of the law, Acts xxi. 21—26. Dr. Whitby.

21. To them that are without law, &c.] On the other side, with the unbelieving Gentiles I argue in their own way from principles of reason owned by them; and for the converted Gentiles, who were never under any obligation to the Mosaical ceremonies, I strenuously maintain that they are under none still. Pyle.

—— (being not without law to God, but under the law to Christ,)] Obedient to the law of Christ, and taking care to do nothing contrary to the moral law of God, and to the rules of Christianity. Dr. Whitby.

22. To the weak] Whether Jewish or Gentile converts, "became I as weak," by abstaining from what might hurt their weak consciences. Burkitt. In descending to their capacities; tolerating their infirmities; forbearing lawful things, offensive to them, &c. Bp. Fell.

—— I am made all things to all men,] By a compliance with them in all lawful matters. Dr. Whitby.

Into what a variety of shapes did the Apostle turn himself, to gain upon the affections of men, that he might more easily gain admission for the Gospel of Christ! Had he fallen directly on their infirmities and mistakes, he might have fired their minds, and stopped their ears to his instructions. He knew that patience and gentle teaching would by degrees get the mastery of their errours, and lead them without tumult and opposition to the acknowledgment of the truth; and their prejudices would wear out; and as the light of the Gospel began to dawn in their hearts, their affections would take a new turn of themselves, which were at present not to be stemmed. Bp. Sherlock.

23. — that I might be partaker thereof with you.] That is, that I may have a share myself in the promised rewards of the Gospel, which I have preached to you. Burkitt.

the customs in the Grecian games. Of these some were celebrated on the isthmus, on which Corinth was situated, and thence denominated Isthmian. With the greatest propriety therefore the subject is introduced by the question, "Know ye not" &c. For every citizen in Corinth was perfectly acquainted with each minute circumstance of this solemnity; a solemnity, every way so splendid and pompous, that there was no danger lest the allusions made to it in this and other parts of the apostolical writings should appear low and degrading. Dr. Hammond, Bp. Horne.

——run all, but one receiveth the prize? &c.] As if he had said, In one of your celebrated games, namely that of running, all the racers observe the rules prescribed them, and exert their utmost vigour, though of these but one gains what all aim at. Let these men be your pattern; and do you run your Christian race with an eagerness that strives to be foremost, and would not be outdone by any engaged in the same course; and at the same time with an attention to the rules prescribed to you, which is as necessary as swiftness towards obtaining the prize. Dean Stanhope, Dr. Hammond.

——So run, that ye may obtain.] It appears to be the Apostle's intention to encourage Christians to run, because as many as run may obtain. In the Isthmian races indeed only one carried away the prize; and the rest received no reward: but in the Christian race all may run, and all may win too. The preceding verse implies, that many may be partakers of the heavenly prize at the same time. Bp. Pearce.

25. And every man that striveth for the mastery &c.] Again, they who contend in those games at wrestling and boxing, submit to discipline, debar themselves many liberties, and undergo great and long hardships to prepare them for the combat. Dean Stanhope. The allusion here is to a game, called the pancratium, consisting of wrestling and boxing united, and therefore requiring every kind of strength and agility. Dr. Hammond.

——is temperate in all things.] It was indispensably necessary that the candidates in these games should previously submit to a severe regimen and preparatory exercises, regulated and directed by a number of persons, appointed daily to superintend them. The body was to be purified and lightened by strict temperance, braced by exercise, and hardened by being inured to the changes of the atmosphere. Bp. Horne.

——Now they do it to obtain a corruptible crown; &c.] A most striking circumstance in the comparison instituted by the Apostle is the difference here noticed, between the crowns bestowed upon the conquerors in the Grecian games, and that reserved in store for them who shall finally overcome in the Christian conflict. St. Paul makes the observation, and founds upon it an unanswerable argument, why we should not suffer ourselves to be exceeded by them in the severity of our preparatory discipline, or the vigour of our exertions in the course or the combat. "They do it to obtain a corruptible crown, but we an incorruptible:" and St. Peter (1 Ep. v. 4,) speaks of "a crown of glory, that fadeth not away," immortal, ever-blooming; a fine contrast to poor fading withering crowns of wild olive and parsley, for of these were the Olympian and Isthmian garlands composed. Bp Horne.

26. I therefore so run, &c.] The Apostle here strengthens his precept by proposing his own example. "I therefore so run, not as uncertainly;" not as one unprepared to distinguish himself in publick, as one exercising himself only in private, not yet trained and fitted for the conflict; (or, not as one ignorant of my course, and uncertain of my reward, provided I regularly perform the race and overcome; Dr. Hammond:) "so fight I, not as one that beateth the air," in a previous fictitious combat with mine own shadow: "but I keep under my body," I deal blows in earnest, that do execution; "and bring it into subjection," lead it captive with all its appetites, obedient to my better part, my mind: and all this I do, "lest that by any means, when I have preached to others," proclaimed to others the laws and the rewards, like the herald at the Olympick or Isthmian games, "I myself should be a castaway," disapproved; be rejected as unworthy; come off without honour and approbation. Bp. Horne.

Excellent upon this passage is the note of the ancient commentators: If St. Paul, so great a man, one who had preached and toiled so much, dreaded this termination of his labours, what cause have not we to fear, lest the like event should befall us? Dr. Whitby. And what care and diligence can be too great in endeavouring to make good our progress in the race that is set before us, to secure our success in the warfare of the spirit against the flesh? Dean Stanhope. See the notes from Bp. Bull and Abp. Cranmer, on 2 Tim. iv. 6.

Chap. X. The Apostle's scope in this chapter is the same as in the two last; namely, to dissuade Christians from eating things offered unto idols, either publickly, in the idol's temple, which was absolutely sinful; or privately, in the houses of any, to the offence and scandal of their weak brethren; which, had there been no scandal in the case, would have been lawful, but otherwise ought to be forborne. He treats the first subject, ver. 1—23; and the other, to the end of the chapter. Burkitt.

Ver. 1. Moreover, brethren, I would not that ye should be ignorant, &c.] To make the Corinthians more diligent in running their Christian race, and in avoiding the sins which would cause them to fail of the prize, the Apostle here lays before them the case of the Israelites, their forerunners, shewing what privileges and what advantages they had, and by what means most of them so unhappily miscarried. Dr. Whitby.

This chapter is closely connected with the preceding: for St. Paul here gives the Jews an instance of what he had hinted in the last verse of the former chapter; namely, that a man, who is in covenant with God, may yet fall into sin, and provoke God to punish him, unless he uses diligence to persevere faithfully in his duty. Bp. Pearce.

——our fathers] The Israelites are so called as ancestors, from whom Christians are descended; of the same race and stock in a spiritual sense, and differing in point of priority in time. Dean Stanhope.

——were under the cloud,—passed through the sea;] They were conducted out of Egypt under the protection of a bright cloud, denoting God's presence and favour with them. And they passed through the Red sea, miraculously dried up to give them way. Dean Stanhope.

this miraculous deliverance they entered into covenant with, and professed their faith in, God. Dean Stanhope. The being "baptized unto Moses" signifies their being baptized into the doctrine taught by Moses. They believed him, and followed his conduct through the sea, and were confirmed in their belief of him, the typical mediator, as a person employed by God; and were obliged under his ministry and guidance to follow God whithersoever he led them. Burkitt.

The Jews did not in fact call themselves by the name of Moses, as the several sects of philosophers did by the names of their several leaders. For the doctrine, which Moses taught, was not his own: and the obedience, which he required, was not to himself; but to God, the Maker of heaven and earth. And therefore, when the Jews were thus baptized into Moses, they were at the same time, in a much higher sense, baptized into the name of God: taking that upon them, as an acknowledgment of their being His; for servants are known by the name of their lord. See 2 Chron. vii. 14; Jer. xiv. 9; and the note on Numb. xxi. 29. Abp. Secker.

3, 4. And did all eat the same spiritual meat; &c.] They also were fed with manna, and drank of water out of the rock, which were not a bodily sustenance only, but of a sacramental nature, and types of Christ. The manna, by which the Israelites were sustained in the wilderness, we have our blessed Lord's authority for applying to Himself, "the true bread which came down from heaven," John vi. And the rock, pierced to furnish water for their thirst, St. Paul expressly calls a representation of Christ. Dean Stanhope. The argument of the Apostle is, that they had the like spiritual advantages and privileges with us, so that their spiritual meat and drink must have signified or typified to them Christ, as ours doth to us. Dr. Whitby.

4. — Rock that followed them:] That is, of the water that came out of the rock. Dr. Wells.

Concerning these crimes and punishments, alluded to in this and the four following verses, see the passages referred to in the margin, and the notes upon them.

10. — were destroyed of the destroyer.] That is, of the destroying angel, executing the just wrath of God. Bp. Hall.

11. Now all these things happened unto them for ensamples: &c.] The mention of these provocations, and of the dreadful judgments consequent upon them, were in a particular manner seasonable to the church of Corinth; among whom St. Paul's two epistles sufficiently discover several abuses and errours, of great affinity with the crimes of those Israelites. Such was their profane contempt and publick dishonour of the body and blood of Christ, in the sacrament of the Lord's supper, (chap. xi.) of which true bread from heaven, thus disdainfully used, the manna, treated of old with so much contumely, was in that respect also a type. The scandalous liberties of partaking in idol-feasts and temples (chap. viii. 10.) were an approach to the Israelites eating and drinking before their molten calf. The indulgence given to lust and sensuality appears, not only from the care taken to insist on these vices, and the danger of them, at large, chap. v, vi, vii; but especially from their conniving at a crime so flagitious and unnatural, as open incest with a father's wife, chap. v. 2. And lastly the murmurers, who despaired of Canaan and discontentedly wished to return to Egypt, had but too near a parallel at Corinth in many, whom dread of persecution and trials affrighted from their duty; but in none so much as in them, whose staggering in the faith rendered necessary the discourse in the 15th chapter, in proof of Christ's resurrection and our own. These admonitions and examples however are highly seasonable to the Christians of every place and time. And whilst there are, even among the professors of this religion, so many bold contemners of its mysteries; so many hypocritical receivers of its sacraments; so many indulgers of those sensual lusts, which every baptized believer hath solemnly renounced; so many murmurers against the dispensations of Providence; so many hearts entirely set on the present world; and so little belief, desire, and pursuit of the everlasting bliss of a life to come; they, who are thus faulty, betray the same spirit of perverseness, infidelity, and discontent with the Israelites of old; and may perceive their own danger in the events that befell the persons, after the example of whose sins they copy. Dean Stanhope.

—— upon whom the ends of the world are come.] Literally, 'the ends of the ages,' that is, the last age. The Jews counted three ages of the world; the first was before the law was given to Moses; the second was under the law; and the third was under the Messiah. St. Paul speaks here of the last of these ages, without undertaking to teach how long it was to continue. Phrases to the same sense occur in Heb. i. 2; ix. 26. Bp. Pearce.

12. Wherefore let him that thinketh he standeth &c.] This is the Apostle's inference from the foregoing discourse. Seeing that so many, who enjoyed great privileges among the Jews, were yet punished greatly for their sins; seeing that sacraments are no privilege for sin, no exemption from punishment, therefore "let him that thinketh he standeth, take heed lest he fall." How many thousands have fallen by a presumptuous confidence of their own strength in standing! The only security of a Christian under the Divine grace is to be wary and watchful. Burkitt.

There is no man so perfect, but that he ought to carry this fear about him; and where his fear points, there must his care and diligence be applied, that is, to himself still: he must watch his passions and affections, lest any of them break out into open enmity against God: his rebel heart must be guarded, lest it quench the holy flame which God has kindled in it; lest it do despite to the Spirit of God, which comes to dwell and inhabit in it. *Bp. 19 What say I then? that the idol is any thing, or that which is offered in sacrifice to idols is any thing?

20 But I say, that the things which the Gentiles [e] sacrifice, they sacrifice to devils, and not to God: and I would not that ye should have fellowship with devils.

cautions the Corinthians against being tempted by persecution to join with the heathens in their idolatries: and encourages them, first, by telling them that such temptations are only ordinary and to be expected: secondly, by assuring them that God according to His promise will enable His servants to overcome temptation, if they continue faithful and constant. Dr. Hammond. God engages to all who enter into covenant with Him, to enable them to perform the condition of that covenant. The exhortation is addressed to all the members of the church of Corinth. Dr. Whitby.

This is the doctrine we are to learn from the history of the Israelites. He that standeth may now fall through unbelief, as they did: he that has been brought out of Egypt, may fall in the wilderness; therefore let us "pass the time of our sojourning here in fear." But then, as God is still with us, we are never to be discouraged in the time of trial, nor doubt of His protection. If there is a sea on one side, and a host of Egyptians on the other, and there seems no way to escape, the waters shall be divided and the Egyptians overthrown. If there is neither bread nor water in appearance, some improbable causes shall give us a supply of both; some flinty stone shall become a springing well, and the heavens above shall give us meat enough. Then for the sickness of the soul we have the remedy of the cross; and against the gigantick race of Anak, a Defender who will never leave us nor forsake us: howsoever great and formidable the enemies of the Christian may appear, "greater is He that is in us than he that is in the world," 1 John iv. 3. Jones of Nayland.

14. —flee from idolatry.] Committed by the participation of things offered to idols in the idol-temple. Dr. Whitby.

15. —judge ye what I say.] Judge of the reasonableness of the following argument concerning the ill consequence or sinfulness of eating things offered to idols. Dr. Wells.

16. The cup of blessing] The Jews used to conclude the feast of the passover with a cup of wine, called "the cup of blessing," because they sanctified it and gave thanks for it by blessing God. Hence the receiving of the wine in the Sacrament, which was instituted by Christ after His paschal supper, is called by the same name, being sanctified or consecrated by thanksgiving to God. Drs. Hammond and Whitby.

—— which we bless,] The solemn blessing and breaking was performed by the Apostles afterwards, according to the pattern, as our Saviour did it first, Matt. xxvi. 26: who, besides the blessing of meat, usual before the meal, (see Matt. xv. 36,) after supper made another consecration of this bread and cup, continued ever since by the clergy. Bp. Fell.

—— is it not the communion of the blood of Christ? &c.] Look to the holy elements of both kinds: that sacred cup in the Eucharist, which we consecrate and bless, is it not that, wherein we have a joint communion with Christ, in partaking of His blood? The bread, which we break in that holy supper, is it not that, wherein we do both profess and have communion with Christ, in a joint receiving of His body? Bp. Hall. The argument of the Apostle is, that the Gentiles have fellowship with the idols in their feasts, as Christians have communion with Christ at His holy table. Burkitt.

St. Paul here plainly teaches us, that these sacred signs make them who use them to have communion with Christ crucified. The partaking of the bread and of the cup is the means, that God hath appointed for our partaking of the benefits of Christ's body that was broken, and of His blood that was shed for us: that is to say, the forgiveness of our sins, and all the other fruits and advantages of His passion. Is not this a consideration, that should strongly oblige all Christians to a frequent participation of this sacrament? Can any thing more recommend this ordinance to us, than the thought, that it cancels all accounts between God and us, provided we come prepared as we ought to be? That it puts us into a state of His favour, and enters us into so strict a league of friendship with Him, as not all the powers of earth and hell can dissolve, unless we ourselves be traitors to ourselves? Abp. Sharp.

If all people were but as sensible of this as some are, they would neglect no opportunities of receiving that holy sacrament; and they, who do neglect it, have too much cause to suspect, that they care not for any of the blessings which God hath promised, nor whether they live in heaven or hell hereafter, so they may but live in ease, and plenty, and credit, while they are in this world. This is plainly the foundation of that gross neglect of this holy sacrament, which is so visible among us. Bp. Beveridge.

17. For we being many are one bread, &c.] All we that partake of that one feast are by that supposed to be one body, of the same kind one with another, even as the bread is of many grains made up into one loaf: and so in like manner if ye join with heathens, and partake with them of their idol-feasts, ye are to be supposed of the same lump and mould with those heathens. Dr. Hammond, Bp. Hall.

18. Behold Israel after the flesh: &c.] Look to the Jewish church, and you will find that the same holds good in that also. Dr. Wells.

—— partakers of the altar?] Do they not, by partaking of the gift consecrated by the altar, and partly consumed upon it, partake with the altar, and own that they communicate with and worship that God, at whose altar or table the meat was offered in honour of Him? Mal. i. 7. For as "swearing by the altar," is swearing by Him also, whose altar it is, Matt. xxiii. 20; so having communion with the altar is having communion with Him, whose altar it is. Dr. Whitby.

19, 20. What say I then? that the idol is any thing, &c.] Not that any of those heathen deities have the least divinity in them; for it is certain they have none, being only imaginary demons, or the delusions of evil spirits; nor can any thing consecrated to them be in itself of any virtue to benefit their worshippers, or defile you. I only say, that all kind of feasting upon sacrifices supposes a fellowship and communion with him they are consecrated to. And I would not for the world have you hold communion with demons or wicked spirits, nor give occasion to others to think that you do so. Pyle.

20. But I say,] In order to complete the sense, the word 'No!' should be supplied in answer to the foregoing question. This way of asking a question and dropping the answer, and yet going on as if the question was answered, is not unusual with St. Paul. See a like instance in chap. xii. 31. Bp. Pearce.

nicating with Christ in the Lord's supper is utterly inconsistent with communicating with devils in the idol-feasts. Burkitt.

—— the cup of devils:] In the heathen sacrifices the priests, before they poured the wine upon the victim, tasted it themselves, then carried it to the offerers, and to those who came with them, that they also might taste it, as joining in the sacrifice, and receiving benefit from it. "The table of devils," or of demons, means the sacrifice offered to them, which was eaten on a table in the demon's temple. Dr. Macknight.

22. Do we provoke the Lord to jealousy?] By joining devils in competition with Him? And that, notwithstanding He has expressed His jealousy in the second commandment, against those who admit any rival into their worship of Him, and has threatened to visit and punish them for it. Dr. Hammond.

23. All things are lawful for me, &c.] And whereas you plead thus for yourselves, All meats may lawfully be eaten; I answer, Be it so: but yet, &c. Dr. Whitby.

—— all things edify not.] To this edification it appears St. Paul had a great respect in all his actions and affairs. "We do all things, dearly beloved, for your edifying," 2 Cor. xii. 19. And he desireth that all other men would do so too, "Let every one of us please his neighbour for his good to edification," Rom. xv. 2: and that, in all the actions of their lives, "Let all things be done unto edifying," 1 Cor. xiv. 26. It is the very end for which Christ ordained the ministry of the Gospel, "the edifying of the body of Christ," Eph. iv. 12; and for which He endowed His servants with power and with gifts, to enable them for the work, "the power which the Lord hath given us for edification," 2 Cor. x. 8; xiii. 10. The word "edification" is metaphorical, taken from material buildings: but is often used by the Apostle in his Epistles, with application ever to the church of God, and to the spiritual building thereof. The church is "the house of the living God," 1 Tim. iii. 15. All Christians, members of this church, are so many stones of the building, whereof the house is made up. The bringing in of unbelievers into the church, by converting them to the Christian faith, is as the fetching of more stones from the quarries, to be laid in the building. The building itself, and that is "edification," is the well and orderly joining together of Christian men, as living stones, in truth and love; that they may grow together, as it were, into one entire frame of building, to make up the house strong and comely for the Master's use and honour. In these latter times, in the popular and common notion of this word, in the mouths and apprehensions of most men generally, "edification" is in a manner confined wholly to the understanding. But this is an errour. The building up of the people in the right knowledge of God, and of His most holy truth, is indeed a necessary part of the work; and no man, that wisheth well to the work, will either despise it in his heart, or speak contemptibly of it with his mouth: yet it is not the whole work, nor yet the chief part thereof. The Apostle expressly giveth charity the preeminence over it: "knowledge puffeth up, but charity edifieth," 1 Cor. viii. 1. And where he once speaketh of "edification" in his Epistles with reference to knowledge, he speaketh of it thrice with reference to peace, and brotherly charity or condescension. The truth is, that edification, which he so much urgeth, is the promoting and furthering of ourselves and others in truth, godliness, and peace, or any grace accompanying salvation, for the common good of the whole body. St. Jude speaketh of "building up ourselves," Jude, ver. 20; and St. Paul of "edifying one another," 1 Thess. v. 11. And this should be our daily and mutual study, to build up ourselves and others in the knowledge of the truth, and in the practice of godliness; but especially to the utmost of our powers, within our several spheres, and in those stations wherein God hath set us, to advance the common good, by preserving peace, and love, and unity in the church. Bp. Sanderson.

24. Let no man seek his own,] His own "wealth" or welfare only. Dr. Wells.

25. Whatsoever is sold in the shambles, that eat, &c.] Some portions of the heathen sacrifices were sold in the markets among other meat. It might be objected therefore, that if Christians might not eat what was offered to idols, they must not eat what they bought in the markets, and this would be a great retrenchment of their Christian liberty. The Apostle tells them they might lawfully eat whatever was there sold, not thinking themselves bound in conscience to inquire, whether what they there met with was a portion of an heathen sacrifice or not. Dr. Hammond.

26. For the earth is the Lord's, &c.] Such things are the creatures of God, made and sanctified for the use of man; and therefore may be eaten without scruple of conscience, when others are not scandalized at it, 1 Tim. iv. 4. Burkitt.

27. If any of them that believe not bid you &c.] Nay farther, if it be at an heathen's own table, where it is more probable that such portions of their sacrifices are to be met with, than in the shambles, yet there also ye may eat freely of all, and not think yourselves bound in conscience to inquire whether there be any portions of those sacrifices. Dr. Hammond.

28. — eat not for his sake that shewed it, and for conscience sake:] Lest you betray that man into the sin of idolatry, or confirm him in it, by your example not rightly understood by him; and so offend against a conscience. Dr. Hammond.

—— the earth is the Lord's, &c.] Who therefore can replenish thee out of other meats provided for thy food. Dr. Whitby.

29. — for why is my liberty judged of another man's conscience?] For why should I use my liberty with scandal, so that I should be condemned by another man's conscience: while I do that which he thinks damnable, though I think it lawful? Bp. Hall.

30. For if I by grace be a partaker, &c.] For, though I may lawfully eat of things sacrificed to idols, by the grace and privilege of my evangelical liberty, receiving the good creatures of God, though abused, with thanksgiving to God the author and giver of them; yet, why should I expose myself to the censures of men, and open their mouths against me, as if I were an idolater in doing it? Bp. Hall.

31. — do all to the glory of God.] By this precept the Apostle hath taught us, that our greatest duty is to promote the glory of God, by regulating all our actions according to His will; that in many particular actions we ought to have God's glory actually in view, and in all the rest habitually; and that by none of our actions we should dishonour God, either by committing sin ourselves, or by leading our weak brethren into sin. This great duty towards God, our Lord inculcated in the first petition of His prayer, "Hallowed be Thy name." Dr. Macknight.

If, instead of prescribing to ourselves indifferent actions as duties, we apply a good intention to all our most indifferent actions, we make our very existence one continued act of obedience, we turn our diversions and amusements to our eternal advantage, and are pleasing Him, whom we are made to please, in all the circumstances and occurrences of life. It is this excellent frame of mind, this holy officiousness, if I may be allowed to call it such, which is recommended to us by the Apostle in that uncommon precept, wherein he directs us to propose to ourselves the glory of our Creator in all our most indifferent actions, "whether we eat, or drink, or whatsoever we do." Addison.

33. Even as I please all men in all things,] That is, I endeavour to do it. By a very common way of speaking, St. Paul, in expressing the action, means only to express his design: it is certain that he did not in fact please all men, not even all the Corinthians; but he endeavoured to please them. Besides numerous other similar phrases, one occurs in Gal. v. 4. Bp. Pearce.

The sense of these three last verses is plainly this: That whenever Christians were invited to that sort of feasts he had been speaking of, not only as to their eating and drinking, but in all the other actions of their life, the great rule they were to walk by was this, of doing honour to God, and advancing His religion in the world. And therefore let them have a care of giving offence, or putting a stumblingblock before any: let them have a care of doing any action that might discourage the brethren in their profession of Christianity, or encourage the heathen to continue in idolatry, for all such actions were a dishonouring of God: but let them endeavour by all possible means, by their innocence and virtue, and their prudent and charitable behaviour, to adorn the doctrine of God in all things, and by that means to recommend it to all about them.

From hence now it appears pretty plain, that this precept of glorifying God in our actions, or doing our actions to the glory of God, hath this general sense and meaning; that we take care to live according to Christ's religion; and that none of our actions be contradictory to it, or cast a blemish upon it, and thereby hinder others either from continuing in it or coming over to it: but on the contrary, that we use our utmost diligence to frame our conversations in such a way as may both shew us to be sincere, conscientious Christians ourselves, and may likewise tend to the honour and advancement of Christianity in others. In a word, we then glorify God, according to St. Paul, when we are as good as we can be, and do as much good as we can do. Abp. Sharp.

Chap. XI. This chapter, in which St. Paul reproves the Corinthians for the disorders committed at their religious meetings, consists of two parts: in the first, he prescribes the manner in which men and women should behave in the church; he ordains, that the men should have their head uncovered when speaking of Divine things; but that the women should cover their head: and what he says is founded upon the rules of decency, which require that women should not appear in publick without being vailed, and their head covered; which was likewise the custom of the Jews, and other people at that time. In the second part, he reproves the Corinthians for their irreverence and disorder in celebrating the Lord's supper after their feasts of charity; and to induce them to correct those abuses, he relates the institution of this sacrament; he shews the use that should be made of it, tells the Corinthians that it was for the punishment of their indevotion in the participation of it that several of them were afflicted with sickness, and some were dead. Ostervald.

Ver. 1. Be ye followers of me, &c.] In a word, herein be ye followers of me, even as I am of Christ, who neglected Himself for the salvation of others. Dr. Wells. This verse plainly belongs to the last verse of the foregoing chapter. Pyle.

2. Now I praise you, brethren, &c.] This commendation must be restrained to the sounder part of the church of Corinth, or must be understood, as such general expressions usually are, as for the most part, or excepting those few things in which the Apostle afterwards finds reason to complain of their neglect, ver. 23, and chap. xv. 3. "The ordinances" alluded to here, and at 2 Thess. ii. 15, were rules delivered to those churches by the mouth of the Apostle concerning the publick worship of God. Dr. Whitby, Burkitt.

3. But I would have you know, &c.] St. Paul here resolves the case about the decent behaviour of men and women in church assemblies. Burkitt. As if he had said, It is fit for you to consider the subordination of persons in the church: namely, that as Christ, in respect of His office of Mediator, is under God, but above all men, so the man, being under Christ, is above all women, and consequently that their garb in the church must be proportionable to this. Dr. Hammond.

4. Every man praying or prophesying,] That is, performing any sacred office in the church, as prayer, and expounding the Scriptures, singing psalms, and the like. Burkitt.

—— having his head covered,] That is, with the covering of a vail, after the manner of women, which is a token of subjection. Burkitt.

Not only among the Jews, but among the Greeks and Romans also, it was customary for the women to be vailed when they went abroad and appeared in any publick assembly. Bp. Pearce.

—— dishonoureth his head.] Either Christ, ver. 3, who hath subjected women to men, and in particular hath authorized men to teach them, chap. xiv. 34, 35. Dr. Macknight. Or, his own head; that is, he disparages and dishonours himself, and acts against the liberty and dignity of his sex, by casting off that sign and semblance of superiority which he should maintain. Bp. Hall, Dr. Hammond.

6 For if the woman be not covered, let her also be shorn: but if it be a shame for a woman to be shorn or shaven, let her be covered.

7 For a man indeed ought not to cover his head, forasmuch as he is the image and glory of God: but the woman is the glory of the man.

5. But every woman that prayeth or prophesieth] From considering 1 Chron. xxv. 1, 2, and 1 Kings xviii. 29, many interpreters by the women's praying and prophesying understand their joining in the publick prayers and praises as a part of the congregation. Yet, as it is reasonable to think that this praying and prophesying of the women was of the same kind with that of the men, who acted as teachers, mentioned ver. 4, we may suppose the Corinthian women affected to perform these offices in the publick assemblies, on pretence of their being inspired: and though the Apostle in this place hath not condemned that practice, it does not follow that he allowed it, or that it was allowed in any church. His design here was, not to consider whether that practice was allowable, but to condemn the indecent manner in which it had been performed. For the women, when they felt or thought they felt themselves moved by the Spirit in the publick assemblies, throwing away their vails, prayed and prophesied with their heads uncovered, and perhaps with their hair dishevelled, in imitation of the heathen priestesses in their raptures. This indecency in their manner of praying and prophesying the Apostle thought proper to correct before he prohibited the practice itself, because it gave him an opportunity of inculcating upon women that subjection to the men, which is their duty, though many of them are unwilling to acknowledge it. The practice itself the Apostle afterwards condemned in the most express terms, chap. xiv. 34. We have an example of the same kind of teaching in chap. viii.; where he first points out the evil consequence of joining the heathens in their feasts in the idol temple, and thence takes occasion to inculcate the great Christian duty of taking care never to lead our brethren into sin, even by our most innocent actions, before he determines the general question of the lawfulness of joining in those feasts. Dr. Macknight.

—— dishonoureth her head:] That is, the man, by appearing in a garb that disowns her subjection to him. Dr. Wells. Or, dishonours herself, in doing that which is against the natural modesty, decency, and meekness of her sex. Bp. Hall, Dr. Hammond.

—— as if she were shaven.] It was highly disgraceful for the Grecian women to be shaven. The ancient Germans punished women who were guilty of adultery by shaving their heads. The Jews also punished adulteresses in the same manner. Dr. Macknight.

7. — forasmuch as he is the image and glory of God:] As having the government of the world committed to him by God. Dr. Whitby. The man is here said to be "the image of God," in respect of the dominion with which he is clothed. For in respect of mental qualities, the woman also is the image of God. Dr. Macknight.

—— glory of God:] That is, a beam or reflection of it. See 2 Cor. viii. 23. Bp. Fell.

—— the woman is the glory of the man.] As being taken from him, made for him, and put into subjection to him. Dr. Whitby.

10. For this cause ought the woman to have power on her head &c.] The mention of the order and end of the creation of man and woman seems to have suggested to the Apostle another reason why the woman should be covered: as if he had said, Moreover for this cause ought the woman to have "power" on her head; that is, a vail or covering, as a mark of the power the man has over her, because of her having been seduced by the prince of the evil angels, and the man by means of her; on which account she was by the express institution of God subjected to the man, Gen. iii. 16. This passage appears to be in a parenthesis: in the next verse the Apostle returns to what he was saying in the 9th. See the parallel place, 1 Tim. ii. 11—13. Drs. Wells, Whitby, and Macknight.

The word "power" in this passage is rightly explained in the margin by "a covering in sign that she is under the power of her husband." It is no unusual thing in the Bible for the signs and tokens of things to be called by the names of the things themselves; as in Gen. xvii. 10, 13. Bp. Pearce. See the passage, and the note on it.

11. Nevertheless neither is the man without the woman, &c.] Not that the man ought to insult upon the weakness of the woman, and pride himself upon his own superiority: but must consider that God hath matched them together, so that neither of them can have their being without the other. Bp. Hall.

12. For as the woman is of the man, &c.] As the woman was first made of the man, so is the man, ever since, conceived and born of the woman; and God is the Author and Maker of both. Bp. Hall.

14. Doth not even nature itself teach you, &c.] Either the general dictates of natural reason; or the particular law of nature concerning the distinction of the sexes; or usage and common custom, which is a second nature. Burkitt. Or the word "nature" may be taken in its strictest sense; for women have naturally longer hair than men. Bp. Pearce.

16. — we have no such custom, &c.] Neither we here in Judea, nor any of the other churches of God, whether planted by me or by any of my brethren. Drs. Doddridge and Macknight.

17. Now in this that I declare unto you &c.] The Apostle here enters upon a new subject; namely, to reprove the abuses which were crept in among the Corinthians, in their administration of the holy sacrament of the Lord's supper. Burkitt.

18. —that there be divisions among you;] There are some of you, who divide from the rest, and eat separately. Dean Stanhope. "Divisions," literally schisms; by this word we are here to understand, not a separation from the unity of the catholick church, but sects and divisions in the church. Though we do not separate from the communion of the church, yet if we occasion groundless division and dissension in it, we justly fall under the imputation of schism. Dr. Whitby, Burkitt. See the note from Dr. Nott, on chap. i. 10.

——and I partly believe it.] Or, I believe it to be true of some part of you. Dr. Whitby, Dean Stanhope.

As for other reasons, so for this particularly, that they, who are truly good men, may hereby have opportunity of shewing it, and of distinguishing themselves from the bad. Dean Stanhope.

20. When ye come together therefore into one place, &c.] When therefore you meet in such a disorderly manner, this is not behaving yourselves like men who come to the Lord's supper: for that is a feast of love, in which every person in the congregation hath an equal right to communicate. Dean Stanhope.

21. For in eating every one taketh before other his own supper: &c.] The Apostle here reproves the Corinthians for the abuses found in their "Agapæ," or love-feasts. It was an early custom in the church, before receiving the sacrament, to have a feast, to which all the poor were invited at the charge of the rich, as an expression of their mutual love and charity. In these feasts the Corinthians did not observe due order and decency. For every one sitting down to eat what he had brought in company of his own party, without regarding others, this feast of charity was celebrated, neither at the same time by all, nor with the unanimity that it was intended to represent: but whilst the poor were excluded and sent home "hungry," the rich were feasted, and drank to excess. Burkitt.

22. What? have ye not houses to eat and to drink in? &c.] If ye have a mind to feast yourselves, and make choice of your guests, have ye not your own private houses to eat and drink in? Why do ye defile the church of God with these partial and immoderate banquets? Why do ye despise and shame the poor, who have not wherewith to feast with you? Bp. Hall.

23. For I have received of the Lord] By immediate revelation. Dr. Macknight. Concerning the institution of the sacrament of the Lord's supper, see the passages in the margin, and the notes upon them.

24. —this is my body, which is broken for you:] That is, He declared the bread to be a representation of His body, to be broken on the cross. Dean Stanhope.

——this do in remembrance of me.] The Apostle's argument runs thus: Christ gave an equal distribution of the sacramental bread to every one at the table, in token that He died equally for all; and He appointed them all to eat together of it at one common table, in remembrance of His love to them all: can you then eat every one separately his own supper, excluding those, to whom He equally distributed the sacred bread, from any share of your's, leaving them hungry and in want of bread, and yet conceive that you worthily eat the Lord's supper, and duly participate of, and thankfully commemorate, this great feast of love? Dr. Whitby.

25. —This cup is the new testament in my blood:] That is, He declared the wine contained in it to be a memorial of His blood, shed for the ratification of the new covenant between God and man. Dean Stanhope.

26. For as often &c.] The following words are St. Paul's; who discourses from hence to the end of the chapter, upon the true manner of receiving the sacrament worthily, and the danger arising from the contrary behaviour. Bp. Pearce.

—For as often as ye eat this bread, &c.] Thus you see, that the end of this sacrament is, thereby to commemorate the death of our blessed Lord, and to keep Him in our minds, during His absence from us: in which memorials consequently every Christian, of what degree or condition soever, hath an equal right to partake; because every one is equally concerned in the mercy, remembered and represented by them. Dean Stanhope.

Hence it appears, that the receiving of this sacrament is a necessary and a perpetual duty, incumbent upon all Christians. For it is expressly commanded by our Saviour; and the reason of the command extends to all persons and to all ages of the world. For if it be a perpetual duty to remember Christ, if it be a perpetual duty to shew forth His death till He come, then it must of necessity be a duty to make use of those symbols and ceremonies, that He hath appointed to remember Him, and to shew forth His death by; and it must be a duty thus to do, to the world's end, because Christ is not to come till then. Abp. Sharp.

——ye eat this bread,] That therefore, which is eaten in the Eucharist, is still bread. This text of itself may be considered as decisive against the doctrine of transubstantiation, which thus appears to be, as the 28th article of our Church states, "repugnant to the plain words of Scripture:" besides, the expression which follows, "Ye do shew the Lord's death till He come," is another proof that the institution was figurative of the death of Christ. Bp. Tomline.

——ye do shew the Lord's death till he come.] That is, ye do significantly express it, ye do solemnly publish and declare it. Indeed both the sacraments, that of baptism, and this of the Lord's supper, as they derive their efficacy from the cross of Christ, so do they carry in them some resemblance of His death; baptism, of His death and resurrection jointly; the Eucharist, of His death only; being instituted for this very end and purpose, to imprint on our minds, by the symbols of bread broken, and wine poured out, a lively image of the great sacrifice of the cross, and to inspire us by that means with such holy thoughts and affections, as a good Christian would have, if he were really an eyewitness of the passion of Christ. Often therefore ought we to resort to this mysterious repast, even as often as we have occasion, (and when have we not occasion?) to raise our gratitude, and improve our devotion, and inflame our love towards God, for the abundant mercies bestowed on us, in the sufferings and death of our Saviour. Nor can we abstain from this table of the Lord without forgetting, indeed without so far renouncing, our relation to Christ crucified, and thereby declaring ourselves utterly unworthy of that holy name whereby we are called. "Verily, verily, except we eat the flesh of the Son of man, and drink His blood, we have no life in us," John vi. 53. Bp. Atterbury.

27. Wherefore whosoever shall eat this bread, &c.] So that to offend in this kind against this institution of this feast, by doing contrary to the universal charity designed therein, is to sin against the body and blood of Christ. Dr. Hammond. Is to be guilty of a dreadful profanation of that sacred body and blood of Christ, which is in this sacrament exhibited and tendered unto him. Bp. Hall.

It is clear from the whole of the Apostle's argument, that the particular unworthiness charged upon the Corinthians neither is, nor possibly can be, ours. Still a man may be under the danger of receiving the sacrament unworthily upon other accounts as well as this. Every notorious offence against, every wilful failure in, those habits and dispositions, which belong to a good Christian, does without doubt render him unworthy. But how does St. Paul proceed on this occasion? By his expressions in the 25th and 26th verses he abundantly intimates, that this is a duty which ought frequently to be performed. Again, after mentioning the danger of unworthy communicants, he does not exhort them to consult their own safety by abstaining altogether from this so clear a duty; but, as it follows in the next verse, by "examining themselves," and so eating of that bread and drinking of that cup. Dean Stanhope.

The danger of the unworthy performing of this so sacred an action is no otherwise a reason to any man to abstain from the sacrament, than it is an argument to him to cast off all religion. He, that unworthily useth or performeth any part of religion, is in an evil and dangerous condition: but he, that casteth off all religion, plungeth himself into a most desperate state, and does certainly damn himself to avoid the danger of damnation; because he that casts off all religion throws off all the means whereby he should be reclaimed and brought into a better state. I cannot more fitly illustrate this matter than by this plain similitude. He, that eats and drinks intemperately, endangers his health and life: but he, that to avoid this danger will not eat at all, I need not say what will certainly become of him in a very short space. Abp. Tillotson.

28. But let a man examine himself, &c.] As if he had said, Before every approach to this sacrament, it is fit that a man see into, and be satisfied with, the disposition of his own mind; that he come with due reverence for so holy an ordinance, and with charity to all those, for whom the death commemorated in it was undergone. By so doing he will partake of this sacrament worthily. Dean Stanhope.

29. — eateth and drinketh damnation to himself,] Rather, 'judgment to himself:' meaning hereby, that he who thus affronted our Lord's institution, by "not discerning the Lord's body," that is, by making no distinction between the bread of the sacrament and common food, did by this his profaneness draw down severe judgments from God upon his own head: as it follows, "for this cause many are weak and sickly among you, and many sleep;" that is, they have been visited by diseases, of which some still languish, and others are dead. These words manifestly restrain the "damnation" spoken of before to bodily distempers and temporal punishments: and the same appears from the 32d verse, where this is called "a chastening of the Lord," to prevent some worse condemnation. Abp. Sharp, Dean Stanhope.

There is so great danger of the word "damnation" being understood here in too strong a sense, that it would be much safer and exacter to translate it (as it is often translated elsewhere, and once in a few verses after this passage, and from what follows ought undeniably to be translated here) 'judgment,' or 'condemnation;' not to certain punishment in another life, but to such marks of God's displeasure as He sees fit; which will be confined to this world, or extended to the next, as the case requires. For receiving unworthily may, according to the kind and degree of it, be either a very great sin, or comparatively a small one. But all dangerous kinds and degrees may with ease be avoided, if we only take care to come to the sacrament with proper dispositions, and, which will follow of course, to behave at it in a proper manner. Abp. Secker.

It is material to observe, that the word "damnation," when the Bible was translated, meant no more than condemnation; any sentence of punishment whatever, without a particular reference to the eternal torments, to which the impenitently wicked will be consigned at the last day. Bp. Tomline.

—— not discerning the Lord's body.] To "discern" or distinguish "the Lord's body" means to look on the action of receiving this holy sacrament as one of no common nature, but as the religious memorial of our blessed Saviour's dying for us, and by His death establishing with us a covenant of pardon, grace, and everlasting felicity on God's part, and of faith and holiness on our's. Abp. Secker.

31. For if we would judge ourselves, &c.] If we would look carefully into our own hearts, we should prevent these punishments from God. Bp. Hall, Dean Stanhope.

32. But when we are judged, &c.] But when God thus chastises us with temporal affliction, weakness, sickness, and the like, He intends that these should be warnings to us; that so, repenting of the faults which have provoked Him to send them upon us, we may escape the eternal punishments, which await the wicked, and profane, and impenitent hereafter. Dean Stanhope. This passage is a demonstration that the word, rendered "damnation" in the 29th verse, does not signify eternal and certain damnation. Pyle.

33, 34. Wherefore, my brethren, &c.] The Apostle concludes his discourse with exhorting them to let his foregoing arguments persuade them all to eat this solemn feast in a sober, unanimous, and charitable manner; and to eat for hunger or for pleasure at home, but not in the assemblies of the church, for fear of incurring a just judgment from God. Pyle.

The latter part of this chapter is perverted to a very wrong use, when made the pretence of keeping men from the holy communion of Christ's body and blood. Those, who are alarmed by the judgments of God denounced against unworthy communicants, have no other security than by examining and judging themselves, and so communicating worthily. This is the direction of the Apostle, ver. 28. And in the same manner our Church argues; 'If any man say, I am a grievous sinner, and therefore am afraid to come; wherefore then do ye not repent and amend?' In short, he that comes not, and he that comes unworthily, are both of them in a dangerous state. The former, because he will not use his best remedy; the latter, because he profanes and abuses it. And there is but one way for both to be safe; which is by coming as often and as well prepared as they can; and then God will not fail to forgive, and kindly to accept them. Dean Stanhope.

Chap. XII. The design of St. Paul in this chapter is to instruct the Corinthians about the gifts of the Holy Ghost, and the use that is to be made of them, and to prevent divisions in the church on that account; for which purpose he does two things. First, he takes notice, that as they had renounced heathen idolatry, God had poured on them the gift of the Holy Spirit; that God granted to the ministers of His Church, and even to several of the believers of that time, divers extraordinary gifts; such as the gift of instructing others, of speaking and interpreting divers languages, of healing the sick, of prophecy, and the like; that all these gifts proceeded from the same Author; but that they were different, and that all those who had received the Spirit of God did not possess the same gifts, nor in the same degree.

Secondly, he shews that these gifts proceeded all from the same Spirit; and since believers compose together but one body, they ought to be employed to the common advantage and edification of the church. This St. Paul illustrates by the comparison of a human body; and observes, that although all the members have not the same functions nor the same dignity, they are all notwithstanding necessary, and do all contribute to the good of the body. By this St. Paul would convince the Corinthians, that these gifts of the Holy Ghost, which were given them for the publick good, and to unite them to each other, should not be the occasion of divisions amongst them. Ostervald.

Ver. 1. — concerning spiritual gifts, — I would not have you ignorant.] The Apostle begins this chapter with the resolution of another case concerning the nature and right use of spiritual gifts. Burkitt.

2. Ye know that ye were Gentiles, &c.] These gifts of the Spirit are advantages, of which the religion you have now embraced, when compared with the idolatry you have left, should give you a very high esteem. The object of their former worship was senseless and dumb idols; such as were falsely pretended to give out their dark oracles, but were in truth altogether incapable, either of uttering any themselves, or of dictating any to others. Whereas now they had embraced the doctrine of a God indeed; One, who had not only taught the truth Himself, but had enabled His servants to reveal and propagate it in the most astonishing manner, and with powers altogether supernatural. Dean Stanhope.

—— even as ye were led.] By education, or custom, or the artifices of your priests. Dr. Macknight.

3. Wherefore I give you to understand, &c.] The Apostle's object here seems to have been, to fortify the Corinthians against the seductions of some, who boasted that they were actuated by the Spirit. Such were the Jewish exorcists in particular. Against them, and all impostors whatsoever, he gives one general rule, namely, that of observing their doctrines with respect to our blessed Saviour's own person and authority. If any spoke in derogation of Him, insinuating that He was a deceiver, and as such to be shunned and abhorred, even supposing that preacher to work wonders, yet were they to be looked upon as lying wonders, and not operations of the Holy Ghost. On the other hand, if any person made it his business to inculcate the truth as it is in Jesus; if he taught men to believe, to obey, and to serve, and to submit to Him, and entirely to depend upon Him for their salvation; whatever miracles should be wrought in confirmation of such an one's authority, these, they might be assured, were wrought by God's own Spirit, and the preacher working them might be safely adhered to. Dean Stanhope.

4. — the same Spirit.] The word "Spirit" is in this passage to be understood directly of the Holy Ghost, the third Person in the ever-blessed Trinity. For first, in ver. 3, that which is called "the Spirit of God" in the former part, is in the latter part called "the Holy Ghost." Again, that variety of gifts, which, in ver. 4, is said to proceed from "the same Spirit," is said likewise in ver. 5, to proceed from "the same Lord," and in ver. 6, to proceed from "the same God:" and therefore such a Spirit is meant, as is also Lord and God; and that is only the Holy Ghost. And again in ver. 11, the Apostle ascribeth to this Spirit the collation and distribution of such gifts according to the free power of His own will and pleasure: which free power belongeth to none but God alone, "who hath set the members every one in the body, as it hath pleased Him," ver. 18. Yet this ought not to be understood of the Person of the Spirit, as if the Father or the Son had no part or fellowship in this business. For all the actions and operations of the Divine Persons, those only excepted which are of intrinsecal and mutual relation, are the joint and undivided works of the whole three Persons, according to the common judgment, constantly and uniformly received in the catholick church. And as to this particular, concerning gifts, the Scriptures are clear. Wherein, as they are ascribed to God the Holy Ghost in this chapter, so are they elsewhere ascribed to God the Father, Jam. i. 17; and elsewhere to God the Son, Eph. iv. 7. Yea and it may be, that for this very reason in these three verses these three words are used, "Spirit" in ver. 4, "Lord" in ver. 5, and "God" in ver. 6, to give us intimation that these spiritual gifts proceed equally and undividedly from the whole three Persons: from God the Father, and from His Son Jesus Christ our Lord, and from the eternal Spirit of them both, the Holy Ghost, as from one entire, indivisible, and co-essential agent. Bp. Sanderson.

4—6. — gifts, — administrations, — operations,] That is to say, the miraculous gifts of the Spirit; offices in the church, to which this diversity of gifts belongs; works performed by these officers in the church, by virtue of these gifts. Dr. Whitby, Dean Stanhope, Parkhurst.

The Apostle does not content himself with affirming in general terms, that God is the Author of these endowments, but he diversifies his expression in such a manner, as may be reasonably thought done with design to intimate the personality and divinity of the Holy Ghost, the Trinity of Persons in unity of the Godhead, and the joint acting and equal concern of Father, Son, and Spirit, in matters of this nature: an operation, common to all Three Persons, however the Scriptures, in condescension to our capacities, do sometimes, as here in particular, appropriate some actions and effects to one or other Person in the Deity, in more special manner, or more frequently, than to the rest. Dean Stanhope. These "gifts," being in the nature of spiritual faculties or habits, are very properly ascribed to that Spirit, who animates the Christian, and by whom he lives the new life: these 'ministries' or "administrations," as properly to the Lord Christ, whose ministers and servants the Apostles, Prophets, teachers, and others, are in the propagation of the Gospel: and these "operations," being miraculous, and far exceeding the power of any creature, are as fitly ascribed to the Creator of all things. Dr. Whitby.

The mighty works, wrought within a Christian, are so many proofs of the divinity of the power by whom they are wrought, and not only justify, but require worship from him to the Divine Author. It is certainly our duty to look up to the hand from which we receive such benefits, and begin our grateful and devout acknowledgments, as St. Paul does, by mentioning first the immediate Giver, "there are diversities of gifts but the same Spirit." Let us beseech Him that He would continue and make His abode with us, beautify our souls with every virtue, enlighten them with every grace, cleanse them from all filthiness and corruption, and strengthen them to immortality! Yet let us not rest here, since the same Spirit teaches us for whose sake and by whose purchase, and according to whose will, as the economy of salvation requires, these gifts and graces are administered: "there are differences of administrations, but the same Lord." And as "through Him by the Spirit we have access unto the Father," from whom originally comes "every good and perfect gift," all Divine power and efficacy, "there are diversities of operations, but it is the same God which worketh all in all:" therefore with a due sense of this great honour and privilege, as sons of God, let us address ourselves to Him for pardon, and admission to our heavenly inheritance, "O God the Father of heaven, have mercy upon us miserable sinners!" But as we have no deserts of our own, no works of righteousness to claim His favour by, and are entitled only through the sufferings and satisfaction of Christ, let us beseech Him to intercede for us, and plead His merits with the Father, "O God the Son, Redeemer of the world, have mercy upon us miserable sinners!" And since the benefits of His merits are applied, and our pardon sealed, and ourselves enabled to render an acceptable service, only by the operations and assistance of the Holy Spirit, let us implore His aid also, "O God the Holy Ghost, proceeding from the Father and the Son, have mercy upon us miserable sinners!" Yet remembering that, how various soever the economy may be, salvation is the one sole undivided end and work of all, therefore, to them, as the one sole undivided cause of all, let us address our earnest prayers and invocations, as to the great power to whom we have consecrated ourselves and services, "O holy, blessed, and glorious Trinity, three Persons and one God, have mercy upon us miserable sinners!" Dr. Glocester Ridley.

7. But the manifestation of the Spirit &c.] The exercise of these spiritual gifts, whereby the Spirit manifests Himself to be in any man, is designed still for some benefit of the church, and therefore those powers, that tend to no advantage in the church, are to be suspected not to come from the Spirit of God. Dr. Hammond.

8—10. For to one is given by the Spirit &c.] It is difficult to fix the true import of all these spiritual gifts: their meaning is probably as follows. "The word of wisdom," may mean the wisdom given to the Apostles to reveal the Gospel to the world: "the word of knowledge," the gift of understanding mysteries, or things concealed, more especially the mystical sense of the Scriptures of the Old Testament: by "faith" we may understand a miraculous faith, enabling them to do things most difficult, but chiefly a peculiar impulse that came upon them when any difficult matter was to be performed, which inwardly assured them God's power would assist them in the performance of it: "the gifts of healing" appear to denote a general power of curing diseases, both of body and of mind; and "the working of miracles" that of silencing and casting out devils, of inflicting diseases and death on incorrigible sinners; or more especially the wonderful power of raising the dead: "prophecy" may signify teaching and the interpretation of Scripture, when done by particular inspiration, but rather the prediction of things future, in order to the exhortation to some duty, exercised also by foretelling who would be fit persons to do good service in the church: "the discerning of spirits" not only imports the faculty of discerning betwixt false and true prophets, and betwixt the lying wonders of evil spirits and the power of the Holy Ghost, but also a power of discerning the spirits of other men, whether they were qualified for particular offices in the church, and accordingly choosing them out for such works; as also a power of discovering the inward purposes of men's thoughts and hearts: "divers kinds of tongues" denote the ability of speaking languages without having learned them: and "the interpretation of tongues" signifies the power of interpreting strange languages to such in the congregation as had not understood the language that was spoken. These extraordinary and miraculous gifts of the Holy Spirit were bestowed upon the church in her infant state, but withdrawn as she grew up, and became capable of subsisting without these extraordinary helps and supplies. Dr. Whitby, Burkitt.

To allege the Apostles as instances of illiterate preachers, is of all fallacies the grossest. Originally perhaps they were men of little learning; fishermen, tent-makers, publicans: but when they began to preach, they no longer were illiterate; they were rendered learned in an instant, without previous study of their own, by miracle. The gifts which we find placed by an Apostle himself at the head of their qualifications were evidently analogous to the advantages of education. Whatever their previous characters had been, the Apostles, when they became preachers, became learned: they were of all preachers the most learned. It is therefore by proficiency in learning, accompanied with an unreserved submission of the understanding to the revealed word, but it is by learning, not by the want or neglect of it, that any modern teacher may attain to some distant resemblance of those inspired messengers of God. Bp. Horsley.

11. — severally as he will.] Here seems to be a plain argument for the personality of the Holy Ghost, because a will is here ascribed to Him. Dr. Whitby.

12. — so also is Christ.] That is, saith St. Chrysostom, the body of Christ, or the church; all the members of which, though they be many, and adorned with different gifts, make but one mystical body, united to their head Jesus Christ. Dr. Whitby.

14—17. For the body is not one member, &c.] As the body is made up of several members for several uses, so is the church of Christ; each of them profitable for some end: and therefore though one be inferiour to some others, yet hath that no reason to envy them. Dr. Hammond.

23. And those members of the body, which we think to be less honourable, &c.] It seems as if he had said, The face, on which the image of God is particularly stamped, we leave uncovered: but as for those parts, which decency or custom teaches us to conceal, we contrive not only to cover them, but also as far as we conveniently can to adorn by covering. Dr. Doddridge.

25. That there should be no schism in the body; &c.] That there may be no separation of interests or desires in the body, and so likewise in the church; but that the several members may be as solicitous, every one for another member, as for itself. Whence it follows, ver. 26, that as in the body all the members have a fellow feeling with each other, so all true members of the church have the same common interests and concernments, whether of suffering or of rejoicing. Dr. Hammond.

How great a lover of agreement and harmony the Holy Spirit is, what an enemy to dividing and separating, we may learn from His making the congregation the seat where He delights to dwell. His most extraordinary effusion was, when the whole Christian church was met together on the day of Pentecost, when the disciples "were all with one accord in one place," Acts ii. 1. He accompanies the sacrament of water, to "baptize us into one body," ver. 13. He blesses the sacramental bread, that "we being many may" by partaking of it "be one bread (one loaf) and one body," chap. x. 17. Dr. Glocester Ridley.

Since, as the Apostle argues, "by one Spirit we are all baptized into one body;" as, in the natural body, "the eye cannot say unto the hand, I have no need of thee," nor any one member to the rest, "I have no need of you," but even "the more feeble and less honourable members are necessary;" so, in the spiritual body, they who, in any respect may seem to excel others, ought by no means to despise them; since every good Christian is, in his proper degree and place, both a valuable and an useful "member of Christ." And again, as in the natural body there is a connexion and sympathy of the several parts, by which the good state of one preserves the others in health and ease, or its bad state gives them pain and disorder; so should there be in the spiritual body, and there is in all true members of it, a mutual caution not to do harm to each other, and a mutual desire of each other's benefit. "If one member suffer, all the (other) members" should by a compassionate temper "suffer with it;" and "if one member be honoured, all" the rest should sincerely "rejoice with it." We should think then, whether we feel in our hearts this good disposition, as a mark of being members of Christ? If not, we should study to form ourselves to it without delay. Abp. Secker.

27. Now ye are the body of Christ, &c.] The Apostle, having finished his elegant and excellent comparison between the members of the natural and those of the mystical body, comes now to make a particular application of it to the Corinthian believers; who are, being considered altogether, the church, though not the church universal, yet a special part thereof, the church of Corinth, and so the mystical body of Christ; and the several persons among them members of that body, that particular church. Burkitt, Dr. Hammond.

inspired with the knowledge of future things. "Teachers," who having received the doctrine of faith from the Apostles, preached it for the conversion of others, and so "laboured in the word and doctrine," 1 Tim. v. 17. "Miracles," that is, persons endued with the power of working them. "Gifts of healings," that is, persons endued with an extraordinary power of healing diseases. "Helps," or deacons, who assisted in ministering to the poor, and in holy things also, particularly in baptizing and distributing the Eucharist. "Governments," the rulers of the church and spiritual guides. "Diversities of tongues," or persons enabled to speak divers languages without the help of study. Burkitt, Dr. Whitby.

We find the Apostle in this epistle blaming the Corinthians for some faults which they had committed, amongst which this is particularly mentioned, that they had not always made the best and most discreet use of spiritual and miraculous gifts: he directs them how to exercise these gifts: and he tells them that charity, that is, the love of our fellow-creatures, and a study to promote peace, happiness, and virtue amongst men, is a more excellent thing than any miraculous power whatsoever: which, by the way, is not the language of an enthusiast. In his next epistle, he commends the respect and obedience which they had paid to him; and to convince some of them still further that he deserved such regard, he reminds them of the miracles, which he had wrought amongst them: "I ought to have been commended of you," &c. see 2 Cor. xii. 11, 12. Now if the Corinthians had no such supernatural gifts, and if St. Paul had never wrought any miracles amongst them, it is impossible to think that they would have retained any regard to him and to his doctrine. If we think so, we must suppose them to have been persons, who lived in a polite country, and had not the sense of savages; men, who had nothing of men besides the outward shape and resemblance; men, of a different kind from any that the world ever saw before or since: for the most enthusiastick sect would forsake their founder and teacher, if he should write them long and grave epistles, full of matters of fact, which they all knew to be false; appealing to miracles, which he had never wrought; and directing them to a discreet use of powers, which themselves never had. Dr. Jortin.

If indeed the Apostle had told the Corinthians, that they were inspired by the Spirit of God in some ineffable manner, which they alone could understand, but which did not discover itself by any outward distinct operations, they might mistake the impulse of enthusiasm for the inspiration of the Holy Ghost: but they could not believe against the conviction of their own minds, that they spoke languages they did not speak, or healed distempers they did not heal, or worked other miracles when they worked none: undoubtedly if the Corinthians were not fully assured, that such miraculous powers had been and were still exercised amongst them, they must have regarded the author of this Epistle as a wild and frantick visionary, instead of revering him as an Apostle of God. Lord Lyttleton.

29. Are all apostles? &c.] As if he had said, Thus do the several offices and gifts in the church belong to several persons, and not one to all; and each is to be content with his lot, and use it to the benefit of the church. Dr. Hammond.

31. But covet earnestly the best gifts: &c.] The Apostle concludes the chapter with this advice, that they desire the best, that is, the most beneficial and edifying gifts, such as are most advantageous to the church: yet withal intimating to them, that there is still a more excellent way of ministering to the welfare of the church, and of edifying their own souls, even the grace of true Christian love one towards another. Burkitt.

Chap. XIII. The Apostle, having treated of miraculous and supernatural gifts, teaches, that how great and excellent soever these are, they are of no value without charity. He then proceeds to set forth the excellent acts and properties of charity, which render it the true end and life of all spiritual endowments; and he shews it to be in itself preferable to them; and even to excel the graces of faith and hope. Ostervald, Pyle.

Ver. 1. Though I speak with the tongues of men and of angels,] Though I could speak the languages of all nations, or knew how to converse with angels. Dr. Whitby.

As if he had said, You may beg of God that He would confer upon you those gifts which are most useful: for to serve Him in this manner is an honourable employment, and to desire it is a laudable ambition: but remember, that there is a grace of more value in the sight of God, and more beneficial to men; more glorious therefore, and more desirable than all these extraordinary gifts, than all abilities of the mind; and that is, charity. Hence we may learn not to regret the withdrawing of those gifts, nor to think ourselves on that account less regarded of God, in these latter ages. If any one amongst us hath charity in its due extent, he will surpass some of the earliest Christians who seem to have been deficient in this most excellent virtue. We are apt to think highly of them because of the miraculous powers which they possessed: but a judicious examiner will judge that nothing is more to be admired in the primitive Christians, than the charity, the zeal, the patience, and the perseverance which so eminently appeared in so many of them. Dr. Jortin.

——charity,] Charity, properly so called, is that affection of the mind, whereby we love God for His own sake, and our neighbour for God's sake. This is the principle, which distinguishes it from such a love, as either the tenderness of nature, or nearness of blood, or friendship and acquaintance, or convenience and interest, are apt to dispose us to. And how essential this principle is, the Apostle here informs us, when he supposes that a man may "give" even "all his goods to feed the poor," without any true Christian love to his brethren; and his "body to be burned," without any true love of God. Hence it follows, that the grace, here so highly recommended, consists, not in any outward acts, but in the inward disposition of the heart: and that those acts are no farther of any value, than as they proceed from, and are sanctified by, this disposition. Dean Stanhope.

Charity, in common speech at present, almost constantly signifies, either judging favourably of the actions and intentions of others, or relieving their distresses: whereas, in the New Testament, it never signifies these particularly, and scarce ever any single virtue, but that general benevolence of disposition, which prompts us on all occasions to mild thoughts, and beneficent deeds; and on which, wrought in us by the grace of our Redeemer, depends their true worth and acceptance with God. The seeds of this inward principle of universal kind affection, are sown in that constitutional goodness of nature, of which, notwithstanding our lamentable degeneracy by the fall, every man hath some remaining degree; the larger the happier, if we manage it with due care. Abp. Secker. See the second note from Bp. Sherlock on 1 Pet. iv. 8.

2. — I am nothing.] That is, nothing worth in the sight of God. Burkitt, Dr. Whitby.

3. — though I bestow all my goods to feed the poor,] Alms, being but one branch of love or charity, without the rest mentioned below, profits us not. We may give plentiful alms out of vainglory, not charity. We may do good to some poor, and oppress others. We may do good to all the poor; and yet be full of envy, debate, detraction, pride, against others. For there are many things that are matter of contention, besides wealth; and much almsgiving is done without charity. Bp. Fell.

Still, relieving the bodily wants of our fellow-creatures is both by our Saviour and by His Apostles represented as a considerable part of charity; and such it plainly is, as not only the spirit of Christianity, but the social nature and inclinations of man, the unequal distribution of things, the uncertainty of worldly possessions, and the public welfare evidently prove. Dr. Jortin.

—— give my body to be burned,] Or become a martyr for my religion. Pyle.

—— it profiteth me nothing.] It is not necessary to suppose, that St. Paul here puts a case which ever yet happened; that any Christian ever had so many supernatural gifts, so much faith, so much liberality, so much religious knowledge, and such a persevering zeal, as to die for the Gospel; and yet was void of charity. But it is no uncommon thing to make extraordinary or even impossible suppositions or conceptions, with a view to strengthen the argument: as when it is said by our Saviour, "If a man should gain the whole world, and lose his own soul," he would make but a bad exchange. St. Paul hath an impetuous kind of eloquence, he is vehement and lively in his style, and expresses himself with warmth and energy. His meaning in the passage before us, and the doctrine delivered by him, is plain enough. It is this: If a man have not charity, whatsoever he may do that appears great and commendable, and whatsoever gifts of the Holy Spirit he may possess, he cannot deserve the name of a good man. Thus St. Paul, in few words, but those the most striking and expressive that could be chosen, declares the necessity of performing this great duty. Dr. Jortin.

4—7. Charity suffereth long, &c.] St. Paul having hinted in the foregoing verse, that the connexion between those outward instances, which appear to be most perfect in their kind, and that grace which they so nearly resemble, is not so close and necessary as will warrant us from the former certainly to infer the latter, here proceeds to assign some characters, which may prevent any dangerous mistakes in judging of this matter. So that where these are found, we may be confident the face of religion, which such behaviour carries, is genuine; and where these are not, how specious soever the appearance may be, we may assure ourselves it is but counterfeit. This is the use to be made of the properties specified in these four verses; not so much for the judging of other people and the state of their souls, as for the prevention of any false confidences, and setting us right in the notions of our own. Dean Stanhope.

5. — seeketh not her own,] That is, her own praise, profit, or pleasure, to the hurt of others, but inclines men to seek the good of others, 1 Cor. x. 24. Dr. Whitby. Is not self-interested. Dr. Wells.

—— thinketh no evil;] Either meditates no mischief to others, or suspects no ill of them. Dean Stanhope.

6. Rejoiceth not in iniquity, &c.] That the word rendered "iniquity" signifies falsehood, appears from "the truth" to which it is opposed. Now "falsehood" and a "lye," both in the Old and in the New Testament, often signify a false religion, or a religion containing a false object of worship. See Hab. ii. 18; Isai. xliv. 20; Jer. xxiii. 14; Rom. i. 25; 2 Thess. ii. 10, 11. And "the truth" in the New Testament, is emphatically put to signify the Gospel, or the Christian faith. See 2 John ver. 3, 4; 3 John ver. 3, 4. So that the import of these words may be, Charity will not permit us to rejoice, but rather cause us to be troubled, to find men still continue in their false worship, as the Gentiles, or in opposition to the Gospel delivered to them, as the Jews do; but it rejoiceth to see men walking according to the truth of the Gospel. Dr. Whitby. Or the sense may be, Charity rejoices with others when they do well; and, when any thing is amiss, is troubled. Locke.

7. Beareth all things,] As this is the meaning of the phrase "endureth all things," at the end of the verse, the former may be better rendered 'covereth,' or 'concealeth all things,' that is, all the ill of another, unless when it is greater charity to reveal it: so Prov. x. 12, "Love covereth all sins." The sentence then goes on, "believe thall things," that is, all things, that are said for the excuse or mitigation of a fault; and when nothing is said in defence or excuse, yet "hopeth" the best that the matter is capable of. Dr. Hammond.

—— endureth all things.] By "all things," in this as well as in the former instances, are meant, not simply all, but all such as are agreeable to the measures and end of charity. For there are times and circumstances, which render the covering or the suffering of men's faults an injury to themselves, or to others, or to both. And therefore these are terms to be restrained according to the exigencies of the case; and so to be applied to the benefit of the party concerned, as not to interfere with his own greater good, or with the good of the publick. Dean Stanhope.

8. Charity never faileth:] It was the design of the Apostle to shew how justly he gave the superiority to this virtue, when he declared it "more excellent" than all those boasted gifts of the Spirit, which the Corinthians were tempted to covet so much rather. To this purpose he proceeds to observe the perpetual use and necessity of charity, whereas the rest were bestowed only upon certain occasions and emergencies: and the continuance and use of this, even in our future and perfect state, whereas all else were only helps and reliefs to our present imperfections. Dean Stanhope.

9, 10. For we know in part, &c.] For the utmost we know, even when enlightened by these extraordinary gifts of prophecy, &c. is very imperfect and short of that which we shall know hereafter. And therefore when that imperfection, and those occasions, to which such assistances of the Spirit are vouchsafed, shall be at an end, there shall be an end of them too. So that they are plainly temporary, and never meant, as charity is, to continue always. Dean Stanhope.

Divine truths are at present seen by us but obscurely and imperfectly. Our knowledge of God, of His nature and properties, of the scheme of His providence and the method of His government, is short and incomplete. But in heaven we shall not be less wise than happy; we shall then know many things which are now in a great measure hidden from us; we shall know them as we ourselves are known of God, that is, clearly and perfectly. Dr. Jortin.

13. And now abideth faith, hope, charity,] All great and excellent virtues, and superiour to the spiritual gifts, which you so highly value: but "the greatest of these is charity," both for duration, as continuing when faith shall end in vision, 2 Cor. v. 7, and hope in enjoyment, Rom. viii. 23, 24; and for perfection, as rendering us more like to God, and more beneficial to man. Dr. Whitby.

Whatever degree of religion any persons may pretend to, unless they have this grace of charity, so highly commended by the Apostle, it shall profit them nothing. For nothing we are, if we have not charity; and charity we have not, if we have not these apostolical marks to shew for it. The most specious professions, the most austere practices, of religion, will not avail, when destitute of this comprehensive grace, this indispensable condition of salvation. Wisely therefore doth our Church instruct us to pray to God, and zealously ought we to pray, and never to leave off praying, till our petition be granted, that He "would send His Holy Ghost, and pour into our hearts that most excellent gift of charity, the very bond of peace and of all virtues," lest living "without this," we be at last "counted dead before Him." Hear us, O Lord, and, whatever Thou deniest us, deny us not this one thing so necessary for us, for Jesus Christ's sake. Amen. Dean Stanhope.

Chap. XIV. The Apostle continues his advice to the gifted persons in the Corinthian church, particularly with respect to their inspired performances in the publick assemblies of Divine worship. Pyle. He tells them, that of all spiritual gifts, that of prophecy, that is to say, the gift of teaching, exhorting, and explaining Scripture, was of most service in the edification of the church. This he confirms, by observing how useless, and even absurd it was, to speak strange languages, if those who heard did not understand them. 2dly, He orders next, that those who spoke those languages, or who had any revelation, should proceed in order, and after one another, and that there should always be somebody to interpret what they said; he directs farther, that women should keep silence in the church; and that all should be done with decency and order. Osterwald.

Ver. 1. Follow after charity, &c.] Follow then principally after charity, but yet also desire other spiritual gifts: but of all the rest let it be your chief desire, that ye may be enabled by the Spirit of God to teach and declare those things, which may be to the edification of the church. *Bp. 11. —a barbarian,] The Greeks, after the custom of the Egyptians, called all those 'barbarians,' who did not speak their language. In process of time the Romans joined the Greeks in calling all 'barbarians,' who did not speak either the Greek or the Latin language. Afterwards, 'barbarian' signified any one who spake a language which another did not understand. Thus the Scythian philosopher Anacharsis said, that among the Athenians the Scythians were 'barbarians,' and among the Scythians the Athenians were 'barbarians.' The Apostle here uses the word in this sense. Dr. Macknight. Compare Acts xxviii. 1, and see the note there.

It is observable how strongly the Apostle here pleads the necessity of all the publick offices of religion being performed in a language known and understood by all the congregation. We hence see the impiety and absurdity of the church of Rome in appointing their publick offices to be performed in Latin, a language, which is not understood by the common people of any Roman Catholick countries, nor is it now the mother-tongue of any nation under heaven. Burkitt.

—— with the understanding also.] So using my spiritual gifts that I may be understood by others. Dr. Whitby.

The meaning is, that every person endowed with supernatural abilities, of this or any other sort, was to think himself bound to employ them in so discreet a manner, that all around him might be instructed and benefited, as much as possible. Abp. Secker.

Some persons apprehend, that there is such a gift or spirit of prayer, bestowed by the Holy Ghost on true Christians, and peculiarly on all that are worthy to be ministers of God's word, as enables them to address themselves to heaven on all occasions copiously, and suitably, in unpremeditated words of their own: which they think ought not to be restrained by appointing forms, even for the publick use of congregations. And sometimes this text is quoted in support of this opinion. But plainly, so far as it relates to words, it relates to words inspired; to which, in the strict sense, but few of these persons themselves lay any claim: for indeed it would be equalling their own compositions to the holy Scriptures. And excepting this miraculous gift of inspired prayer, the word of God mentions no gift of ready expression in prayer: nor have we the least ground to consider it as coming from above, any otherwise than as "every good gift," every natural ability, which God hath conferred upon us, and every improvement, which He qualifies us to make by our own industry, "is from above," Jam. i. 17. For evidently this talent is one of that sort; depending, partly on the fluency of speech, to which people are born; partly on the art and diligence, which they use to increase it; and varying, as their health and spirits vary. Nor therefore is there any more harm in restraining this faculty, if good reasons require it, than in restraining any other. Even the extraordinary gifts of the Spirit were frequently put under some restraints; much more then may one of our ordinary powers. And they who call it limiting and stinting the Spirit, have no Scripture warrant, either for the phrase, or the thing which they understand by it. Nay, supposing the Holy Ghost did ever so peculiarly assist in directing the words of prayers, why should we not think Him as likely to have assisted in the drawing up of the established forms, as in the extemporary performances of those who reject forms, and trust to the sudden dictates of their own fancy?

"The spirit of prayer," and "praying in" or "by the Spirit," are indeed Scripture terms; but, so far as they belong to the present age, they signify, not being furnished with variety of phrases in prayer, but a much more valuable blessing, having religious affections breathed into us by the Holy Ghost for the exercise of this duty. And "quenching the Spirit," 1 Thess. v. 19, in the only sense which can be applied to us, means extinguishing such affections by indulging sin, or suffering them to die away through negligence. 21 In the law it is [a] written, With men of other tongues and other lips will I speak unto this people; and yet for all that will they not hear me, saith the Lord.

22 Wherefore tongues are for a sign, not to them that believe, but to them that believe not: but prophesying serveth not for them that believe not, but for them which believe.

Anno DOMINI 59.

23 If therefore the whole church be come together into one place, and all speak with tongues, and there come in those that are unlearned, or unbelievers, will they not say that ye are mad?

24 But if all prophesy, and there come in one that believeth not, or one unlearned, he is convinced of all, he is judged of all:

25 And thus are the secrets of his heart made manifest; and so falling down on his face he will worship God, and report that God is in you of a truth.

26 How is it then, brethren? when ye come together, every one of you hath a psalm, hath a doctrine, hath a tongue, hath a revelation, hath an interpretation. Let all things be done unto edifying.

27 If any man speak in an unknown tongue, let it be by two, or at the most by three, and that by course; and let one interpret.

28 But if there be no interpreter, let change of expressions, than with a repetition of the same; nor will be ever weary of a devout soul, for want of new language. Common reason pronounces this, and the Bible confirms it. We find several forms of prayer, prescribed on several occasions in the law of Moses, Numb. vi. 22, 23, &c.; x. 35, 36; Deut. xxi. 7, 8; xxvi. 13—15. We find afterwards a whole book of forms, the Psalms of David. We find our Saviour frequenting the Jewish synagogue, which constantly used a form, and, generally speaking, a very mean one. We find Him enjoining His disciples a form of His own composing for them; "When ye pray, say, Our Father," and so on. Nay, at the very time, when the gift of inspired prayer was common, there is a strong appearance in the fourth chapter of the Acts, that the Apostles and their followers used a form, there set down. For how else could they "lift up their voice, and say it with one accord," as ver. 24 assures us they did? Probably the very next age after them practised this method of publick worship, at least in a good measure: and for more than 1400 years it hath been without question almost universally the only one. There is not at this day any body of Christians in the world, but what uses in part of their service, if not throughout it, forms of human composition; unless it be the Scotch presbyterians, who had one immediately upon the reformation, though it afterwards fell into disuse; and the dissenters from our own church, many of whom, notwithstanding, sing in their assemblies hymns, that are forms of human composition, without scruple. Yet if extemporary prayers are required, extemporary praises are too. For it is equally said, "I will pray with the spirit," and, "I will sing with the spirit." Abp. Secker.

16. —say Amen] The Apostle's question implies, that it was the custom in the Christian church from the beginning, for all the people, in imitation of the ancient worship, to signify their assent to the publick prayers by saying Amen at the conclusion of them. Of this custom in the Jewish church we have many examples. See Deut. xxvii. 15; Nehem. viii. 6; 1 Esdr. ix. 47. Dr. Macknight. See the note on Deut. xxvii. 15. Agreeably to the practice of the Jewish church, and of the Christian in the Apostles' days, the subsequent ecclesiastical writers shew, that it used to be pronounced audibly and fervently; each person expressing his own faith or desire, and animating that of his fellow-worshippers. We should therefore by no means neglect to give this proof, amongst others, that we not only hear the service with attention, but join in it with earnestness. Abp. Secker.

19. —with my understanding,] That is, with my understanding so employed that I may teach others also. Dr. Whitby.

20. Brethren, be not children in understanding:] That you should childishly make ostentation of the gift of those tongues, which others understand not. Bp. Hall.

——in malice] By this term is probably to be understood every sort of ill temper of mind, contrary to the gentleness and innocence of childhood; and, in particular, their emulation and strife about the exercise of their gifts in their assemblies. Locke.

——but in understanding be men.] Act as persons of mature judgment, who know what is fitting to be done. Dr. Whitby.

21, 22. In the law it is written, &c.] The Apostle here tells the Corinthians, that "in the law," that is, in the writings of the Old Testament, particularly Isai. xxviii. 11, it is declared, that because the people of Judah would not be instructed by the plain preaching of the Lord's Prophets, therefore He would cause them to be spoken to in an unknown language, namely, by foreign enemies and armies, whose language they should not understand. Whence he infers, that this strange tongue being threatened as a plague to God's people, there was no reason that they should glory in that, which was menaced as a judgment upon their forefathers: adding, that the strange tongues now given were intended for another use, even to be for a sign of the marvellous power of God's Spirit, for the conviction of those that believe not the Gospel, and not so much for the benefit of those that do believe already: whereas prophesying, or interpreting the Scriptures, serves not for infidels who believe not, but for Christians who are already converted to the faith. Burkitt, Bp. Hall.

23. —the whole church] A society of Christians and none else. Dr. Hammond.

24. But if all prophesy,] And interpret the Scriptures, by course. Bp. Hall. One after another, ver. 31. Dr. Whitby.

——he is convinced of all, he is judged of all:] He is made to judge or discern aright his own state and condition. Dr. Wells.

26. How is it then, brethren? &c.] What then is to be done? When ye come together, let every one of you, who is endued with any special gift, make use of it to the benefit of the church. Bp. Hall.

27. —let it be by two, or at the most by three,] That is, let this gift be exercised by no more than two or three at one meeting; "and that by course," or severally, one after another. Dr. Wells.

29 Let the prophets speak two or three, and let the other judge.

30 If any thing be revealed to another that sitteth by, let the first hold his peace.

[b] Gen. 3. 16.

35 And if they will learn any thing, let them ask their husbands at home: for it is a shame for women to speak in the church.

36 What? came the word of God out from you? or came it unto you only?

37 If any man think himself to be a prophet, or spiritual, let him acknowledge that the things that I write unto you are the commandments of the Lord.

38 But if any man be ignorant, let him be ignorant.

39 Wherefore, brethren, covet to prophesy, and forbid not to speak with tongues.

40 Let all things be done decently and in order.

CHAP. XV.

3 By Christ's resurrection, 12 he proveth the necessity of our resurrection, against all such as deny the resurrection of the body. 21 The fruit, 35 and manner thereof, 51 and of the changing of them, that shall be found alive at the last day.

MOREOVER, brethren, I declare unto you the gospel which I preached

28. — let him speak to himself, and to God.] Mentally "to himself," and "to God" in prayer and thanksgiving. Dr. Whitby.

29. — two or three,] Only two, or at most three, at one meeting; "and let the others," that have the same gift, "judge," that is, examine and discuss what is delivered by the former. Dr. Wells.

30. — let the first hold his peace.] Or cease, before the other utter his revelation. Dr. Whitby.

32. And the spirits of the prophets are subject to the prophets.] "The spirits of the Prophets," that is, their spiritual gifts, "are subject to the Prophets," or, it is in their power to restrain them, and consequently they may prophesy the one after the other. Dr. Whitby.

It was in their choice, when they would use the power of speaking with divers tongues; and on what occasions they would produce the prayers and hymns, with which they were inspired. Abp. Secker.

33. For God is not the author of confusion, &c.] For the Spirit of God is not a violent, extatical, impetuous, but a quiet, gentle Spirit, as appears by the effects in all well-tempered, constituted churches. Dr. Hammond.

The word, here and commonly rendered "confusion," and sometimes "tumult," not unfitly for the sense, literally importeth a kind of unstableness rather, or unsettledness, when a thing doth not stand fast, but shaketh, and tottereth, and is in danger of falling. And this St. Paul here opposeth to "peace;" "God is not the author of confusion," or unstableness, "but of peace:" by that very opposition intimating, that it is mostly for want of peace that things do not stand fast, but are ready to fall into disorder and confusion. St. James speaketh out what St. Paul but intimateth; and telleth us plainly, that this unstableness is the effect of discord, and that contention is the mother of confusion. "For where envying and strife is," saith he, "there is" inconstancy, unsettledness, "confusion and every evil work." The builders make very ill work, where the building is not like to stand, but threateneth ruin, and is ready to drop down again by the time it is well up. And yet such ill work doth "envying and strife" ever make: it is concord only and unity that maketh good work, and buildeth strong. Let Jerusalem be built "as a city that is at unity in itself;" and Jerusalem will be like to stand the faster, and to stand up the longer. Bp. Sanderson.

34. Let your women keep silence in the churches: &c.] In that of Corinth women not only prophesied in the church, but they did it with the head uncovered, chap. xi. 5. The latter indecency the Apostle corrects there; and the former here. See 1 Tim. ii. 12. Dr. Whitby.

——for it is not permitted unto them to speak;] By way of teaching or prophesying, but only by joining with the church in prayer and psalmody. Dr. Whitby.

36. What? came the word of God out from you? &c.] The Apostle means, that the Corinthians were not to pretend to act in a manner contrary to his injunctions, or to the methods of other churches, as if they had been planters of the Gospel, or as if the Apostles had given directions to none but them. Dr. Hammond.

37. — let him acknowledge &c.] He cannot but acknowledge that my precepts are the commandments of the Lord, and necessary to be observed. Bp. Hall.

38. — let him be ignorant.] He that will not, I have no more to say to him: let him take the effects of his obstinate and wilful ignorance. Pyle.

39. — covet to prophesy, and forbid not to speak with tongues.] The Apostle concludes the whole by exhorting them to endeavour earnestly after the gift of prophesying, and not to forbid the use of the gift of tongues, provided the foregoing rules and directions were observed; that so in their publick assemblies all things relating to religious worship might be performed with that becoming gravity, decency, and regularity, which conduce most to the glory of God, and the edification of the church. Burkitt.

Chap. XV. The Apostle here replies to the next question of the Corinthians concerning the absolute certainty of the future state and of the resurrection of the body. Some Jewish converts were perplexed with objections against the former by their teachers, that had been of the Sadducaical part. The Gentile converts were attacked with difficulties about the latter, by the speculations of their philosophical teachers. The Apostle establishes the truth of both these points, upon the fact of Christ's resurrection, laying down the evidences that prove it. The disbelief of a future state is utterly inconsistent with the belief of Christ's resurrection, and with the nature and design of our baptismal profession, and disannuls the faith, and frustrates all the sufferings of Christian people. This is alleged against the Sadducaical Christians, to ver. 35. Then he answers the philosophical objections against the resurrection of the body, to ver. 45, where he turns to the Jewish objectors again, shewing the necessity of believing this point, from the analogy of the first and second Adam, to ver. 51. Then he declares the glorious change which the bodies of good Christians shall undergo at the resurrection, in order to qualify them for the heavenly and immortal state. Pyle.

Ver. 1. — the gospel which I preached unto you,] Particularly the doctrine of the resurrection of the body, which was a great point of that Gospel. Burkitt.

—— wherein ye stand;] That is, the best and greatest part of you are firm to your former profession, though some are fallen away. Burkitt.

2. By which also ye are saved, &c.] They, who by embracing the Christian faith, were brought into that way, which leadeth to salvation, and in which if they persevered, they would assuredly be saved, are styled in Scripture, "the saved," according to the original of Acts ii. 47; 1 Cor. i. 18; and are said "to be saved," Rom. viii. 24; 2 Tim. i. 9; 1 Pet. iii. 21. See the notes on Acts ii. 47; Eph. ii. 5, 8; and on Tit. iii. 5. So here the phrase signifies, You are at present in a state of salvation, and will assuredly enjoy it, if you retain and live suitably to the faith delivered to you. Dr. Whitby.

3, 4. For I delivered unto you first of all &c.] Or among the principal doctrines of faith. Dr. Whitby. As if he had said, Now the foundation, on which that faith was built, I laid in the death of Christ, the end and purpose of that death, and the certainty of His resurrection: all of them exactly agreeable to the prophecies relating to that matter, and confirmed by unquestionable evidence. Dean Stanhope.

3. — died for our sins according to the scriptures;] Namely, all the scriptures of the Old Testament which relate to the sufferings of Christ; all the sacrifices and institutions of the law, which are applied to Christ; particularly that remarkable chapter, the 53d of Isaiah, where it is said, that He was "wounded for our transgressions," &c. Leslie.

4. — and that he rose again the third day according to the scriptures:] The Scriptures, which foretold the resurrection of Christ on the third day, and to which St. Paul refers, are Ps. xvi. 10, which St. Peter, Acts ii. 31, expressly affirmed to be a prediction of that event. Also Jonah i. 17, which our Lord Himself hath told us, is a typical prophecy of His continuing "three days and three nights in the heart of the earth," and of His subsequent resurrection. The Apostle makes this reference to the prophecies concerning the Messiah, because by the circumstance of their accomplishment, as well as by His resurrection, our Lord was demonstrated to be the Messiah. Dr. Macknight.

5. — then of the twelve:] That is, the whole society of Apostles, consisting formerly of twelve persons, and again afterwards of the same number; and therefore so called still, John xx. 24; though in strictness of speech they were but eleven, when St. Thomas was with them, and ten in his absence, Matt. xxviii. 16; Luke xxiv. 33. Drs. Hammond and Whitby.

6. — of above five hundred brethren at once;] St. Matthew seems to hint at this appearance, where he informs us, that Jesus after His resurrection said to the women, "Go, tell My brethren, that they go into Galilee, and there shall they see Me;" and that, in obedience to His order, "the eleven went away to a mountain in Galilee, where Jesus had appointed them," Matt. xxviii. 10, 16. Having therefore appointed a particular mountain for shewing Himself to His disciples, and having previously fixed the time of His appearing, it is reasonable to suppose that the joyful tidings would be quickly spread among the brethren, and that a great number of them would assemble at the time and place appointed. The greatest part of our Lord's disciples lived in Galilee. Thus, besides His Apostles, numbers, who had often attended Him during His ministry there, and who were well acquainted with His person, could satisfy themselves by the testimony of their own senses concerning the truth of His resurrection, and attest it to others on the surest evidence. These may have been "the five hundred brethren," of whom the Apostle speaks. Dr. Macknight.

See the notes from Bp. Horsley at the end of St. Mark's Gospel, and from Bp. Porteus at the end of St. John's Gospel.

—— are fallen asleep.] Are dead. It was doubtless with a view to the joyful hope of a resurrection both of body (see Matt. xxvii. 52.) and of soul, that the departed saints in the Old Testament, as well as in the New, are said to fall asleep, to sleep, to sleep with their fathers, &c. Parkhurst.

7. — James;] Surnamed the Just, the brother, that is, kinsman of our Lord, according to the tradition of the church. Drs. Hammond and Whitby.

8. — last of all he was seen of mè also,] About two years after His ascension, and several times after that. Pyle.

—— as of one born out of due time.] He thus speaks of himself as one wholly unworthy of the name of an Apostle. The Hebrews were wont to compare vile and mean persons to abortions; the Romans too had a similar expression of reproach. Schleusner.

9, 10. For I am the least of the apostles, &c.] In these two verses St. Paul hath left us an example of the following virtues. 1. Of humility and a mean opinion of our own performances, even when highly useful and commendable, in allowing to others their just praises, and esteeming them better than ourselves: "I am the least of the Apostles." 2. Of a frequent recollection even of those faults, from which it is our happiness to be perfectly reclaimed, which is an admirable expedient for correcting spiritual pride, and exciting caution and vigilance: "I am not meet to be called an Apostle, because I persecuted the church of God." 3. Of a very extraordinary diligence and zeal, to make reparation by the following part of our lives for former omissions, neglects, or notorious crimes: "I laboured more abundantly than they all." 4. Even when this change and reparation shall be made, of arrogating no merit to ourselves, but ascribing the whole to God's goodness, and the operations of His blessed Spirit: "By the grace of God I am what I am;" and again, "Yet not I, but the grace of God which was with me." Dean Stanhope.

10. — I laboured more abundantly than they all:] The other Apostles confined their preaching for the most part to the Jews, Gal. ii. 9. But St. Paul preached the Gospel to all the Gentile nations "from Jerusalem round about unto Illyricum," Rom. xv. 19; and also to the Jews who lived in those countries; and by his labours he converted great numbers both of the Jews and Greeks. Moreover as his success in spreading the Gospel exceeded the success of the other Apostles, so probably his labours greatly exceeded theirs likewise. See 2 Cor. xi. 23—28. Dr. Macknight.

not I, but the grace of God which was with me.

11 Therefore whether it were I or they, so we preach, and so ye believed.

12 Now if Christ be preached that he rose from the dead, how say some among you that there is no resurrection of the dead?

13 But if there be no resurrection of the dead, then is Christ not risen:

14 And if Christ be not risen, then is our preaching vain, and your faith is also vain.

15 Yea, and we are found false witnesses of God; because we have testified of God that he raised up Christ: whom he raised not up, if so be that the dead rise not.

16 For if the dead rise not, then is not Christ raised:

Anno DOMINI 59.

17 And if Christ be not raised, your faith is vain; ye are yet in your sins.

18 Then they also which are fallen asleep in Christ are perished.

19 If in this life only we have hope in Christ, we are of all men most miserable.

20 But now is Christ risen from the dead, and become the firstfruits of them that slept.

21 For since by man came death, by man came also the resurrection of the dead.

22 For as in Adam all die, even so in Christ shall all be made alive.

23 But every man in his own order:

—— not I, but the grace of God which was with me.] That is, not I by my own strength, but by the grace of God: it is by that I laboured more abundantly than others; it is by that I am what I am, and do what I do: but still it is I that am and do so. He ascribes the glory of all he did to the grace of God, yet nevertheless he was the person who did it by that grace: as, although it be the heat and influence of the sun, which by God's blessing upon it causeth the earth to fructify, yet it is "the earth itself that bringeth forth herbs meet for them by whom it is dressed," as the Apostle speaks, Heb. vi. 7. Bp. Beveridge.

St. Paul drops in this commendation of himself, to keep up his credit in the church of Corinth, where there was a faction labouring to discredit him. Locke.

11. Therefore whether it were I or they, &c.] But, whether it were my labour or theirs, all comes to the same thing. Christ hath been by us preached, so to have died and so to have risen; and accordingly by you believed. Bp. Hall.

12. — how say some among you that there is no resurrection of the dead?] St. Paul probably refers to the philosophers among them. For Corinth abounding in such persons, who looked upon the resurrection of the flesh as a thing both impossible and absurd, see the note on ver. 35, they might put a new construction on the doctrine of the resurrection, saying that it imported only a renovation of manners, or a resurrection from the death of sin unto a life of righteousness, and so was performed already in that baptism in which we are raised with Christ from the dead, Col. ii. 12. Dr. Whitby.

13. But if there be no resurrection of the dead,] That is, if that doctrine be in the general altogether incredible, "then is Christ not risen." Dr. Doddridge. To say that there can be no resurrection, and yet to hold that Christ is actually risen, is a contradiction. Pyle. See the note on ver. 20.

17. — ye are yet in your sins.] Your faith is in vain settled upon a dead and perished Redeemer; and so ye are yet under that woful condemnation which is due to your sins, from which only the resurrection of Christ can acquit and discharge you. Bp. Hall.

18. — which are fallen asleep in Christ] Who have died in or for this faith in Christ. Dr. Wells.

19. — we are of all men most miserable.] "We," that is, the same persons denoted by the word the last time he used it, but a few lines before: namely, the witnesses of Christ's resurrection, and the preachers of His Gospel; who then suffered many afflictions on account of it in this life; and were wretched indeed if they had no prospect of being the better for it in another; as were certainly in proportion also their first followers. For in that age, all that lived godly in Christ Jesus suffered persecution, 2 Tim. iii. 12; and even as the Apostle reminds them, that they were appointed thereunto, 1 Thess. iii. 3. Abp. Secker.

20. But now is Christ risen from the dead,] The proof of the resurrection of the dead lies chiefly in verses 12—19; the rest of the chapter is taken up in illustrating, vindicating, and applying it. The proof is indeed very short, but most solid and convincing: that which arose from Christ's resurrection. For that not only proved a resurrection to be in fact not impossible, but, which was much more, as it proved Him to be a Divine teacher, it proved the doctrine of a general resurrection, which He so expressly taught. Dr. Doddridge.

—— and become the firstfruits of them that slept.] So that our resurrection is a certain consequence of His. St. Paul alludes here to the nature and design of the firstfruits under the law, Lev. xix. 24; Deut. xxvi. 12, &c. All the harvest was consecrated and sanctified by the firstfruits being offered. Pyle, Dr. Wells.

Christ is said to be "risen from the dead, and become the firstfruits of them that slept;" not that He was the first that was raised from the dead; for Elijah and Elisha raised some, and so did our Saviour Himself in His lifetime: but the Apostle here alludes to the firstfruits among the Jews, which were a pledge and an earnest of a future harvest. In like manner the resurrection of Christ is called "the firstfruits of them that slept," because it is an earnest of that general harvest, which shall be at the end of the world, when "the angels, the reapers, shall come to gather the elect from the four winds." But the resurrection of others before Christ was no earnest of this, because they were raised, but Christ is said to "rise from the dead by His own power." And in this sense He is truly said by St. John, Rev. i. 5, to be "the firstbegotten from the dead." And this secures our resurrection to eternal life, because He, who hath promised to raise us up, did "raise Himself from the dead," John ii. 18, 19. Abp. Tillotson.

21. — by man came also &c.] The wisdom of God so ordering it, that the same nature which had lost life and immortality, should regain them. Dr. Whitby.

22. For as in Adam all die, &c.] As the death of all mankind came by Adam, so the resurrection of all mankind comes by Christ. The wicked shall be raised by His power, as their Lord and Judge; the righteous shall be raised by virtue of their union with Him as their head. Burkitt.

The coming of Christ, when He did, was no hardship to those, who lived before it. For though His personal appearance was late, yet that doth not hinder, but the earliest ages may have been greatly the happier for it: we learn indeed from Scripture, that "there is no salvation in any other." But we learn also, that the salvation procured by Him extends from the beginning of time to the end of it: that "as in Adam all die, even so in Christ shall all be made alive:" that good persons in the first ages, as well as in the following, were redeemed by His blood, who being foreordained from eternity to be "manifested in due time," is therefore in the efficacy of His death, "the Lamb slain from the foundation of the world." Abp. Secker.

26 The last enemy that shall be destroyed is death.

27 For he hath put all things under his feet. But when he saith, all things are put under him, it is manifest that he is excepted, which did put all things under him.

24. Then cometh the end, &c.] That is, the end of the world, when Christ will deliver up His kingdom to God the Father; namely, His mediatorial kingdom, which, as Mediator, He received from His Father; not His natural and essential kingdom, which, as God, He had with His Father from eternity; this shall never be delivered up, for of this His kingdom there shall be no end: but at the end of the world, Christ having subdued all His and His church's enemies, and put down all rule, authority, and power both in the world and in the church, He shall deliver up His mediatorial kingdom to His Father, and reign no longer as Mediator, and as deputed by His Father; but He shall still reign, eternally reign, as God equal with the Father; for His kingdom is an everlasting kingdom, and His dominion endureth to eternal ages. Burkitt. The full manifestation of that dominion, which Christ in His human nature acquired, by dying, and rising, and living again, (for which manifestation every other act of His regal authority is opening the way," will be in that hour when He shall "come with the holy angels to sit upon the throne of His glory, and all nations being gathered before Him," shall sentence the wicked, both men and devils, to everlasting punishment, but bestow on the righteous life eternal. After which, the ends of this whole dispensation being now accomplished, He shall "deliver up His kingdom" of grace "to God, even the Father," in whose kingdom of glory He "shall" still "reign," with Him and the Holy Spirit, over His saints and angels, "for ever and ever," Rev. xi. 15. Abp. Secker.

Lest we should imagine that Christ should ever cease to be King, the ancient Fathers at Constantinople, in the year 381, added those words to the Nicene Creed "whose kingdom shall have no end," against the heresy which then newly arose, denying the eternity of the kingdom of Christ. Bp. Pearson.

25. For he must reign, till he hath put all enemies under his feet.] To this purpose was the promise made to Christ, Ps. cx, that His spiritual kingdom on earth should last so long, till God had brought all the world to be subject to Him. Dr. Hammond.

26. The last enemy — is death.] Which accordingly shall at this time be universally destroyed by the universal resurrection, as of the just, so also of the wicked. Dr. Wells.

27. For he hath put all things &c.] See Ps. viii. 6; and the introductory note from Poole upon that psalm.

—— But when he saith,] That is, when the Psalmist saith. Dr. Wells.

28. — then shall the Son also himself] Lay down His kingly office in governing His church; and as man "be subject unto Him that put all things under Him, that God," the Father, Son, and Holy Ghost, "may be," without the intervention of a Mediator, "all in all," by a full communication of Himself to all His saints, and an intimate union with them. Drs. Whitby and Hammond.

29. Else what shall they do] The Apostle reverts to the subject of the 23d verse, all the intermediate passage being in a parenthesis. Dr. Hammond.

—— why are they then baptized for the dead?] That is, who are baptized in the faith and profession, as of other articles of the Creed, so of this in particular of the resurrection of the dead, and consequently in hope of the resurrection. As if the Apostle had said, As for those among you in the church of Corinth, who are baptized persons, and yet deny the resurrection of the dead, I would demand of them, why they have in their baptism made a profession of believing the article of the resurrection? why were they baptized in this faith, if they now renounce it? To be a baptized Christian, and yet to deny the resurrection, is a flat and plain contradiction. Dr. Hammond, Burkitt. This appears to be the undoubted sense and design of the phrase, though there is a difficulty in the precise construction of the original. Pyle.

30. And why stand we in jeopardy every hour?] Why do we Christians expose our very lives to continual danger for the sake of the Gospel, if there be no resurrection to a future state of retribution? Dr. Wells.

31. I protest by your rejoicing &c.] Either I protest by all that joy which I have in your conversion to Christianity; or I protest by all that rejoicing which I have in common with you and all Christians under the heaviest sufferings, for the sake of Christ Jesus our Lord. Burkitt, Dr. Whitby.

—— I die daily.] I hardly pass a day but I am in danger of death, for the sake of my Christian profession. Pyle.

32. If after the manner of men I have fought with beasts at Ephesus,] Slaves and the greatest malefactors were sometimes condemned to fight with wild beasts in the amphitheatres, as a punishment for the most heinous crimes. Grotius and others interpret these words metaphorically, as if St. Paul spoke of his contests with impious and ferocious men, who are often compared to wild beasts on account of their savage and brutish manners: the reason of this interpretation is, that there is no mention found, in the Acts of the Apostles or elsewhere, of this combat of the Apostle with beasts. However, since there is express notice here taken of the place, which was the scene of this combat; since in other places there were not wanting very bitter enemies, to oppose the Apostle; and since it was not unusual for the professors of the Christian faith to be cast by tyrants to wild beasts; it seems most correct to interpret this passage of a combat, properly so called, wherein the Apostle fought with beasts in the theatre at Ephesus. Schleusner. That this was a real, not a metaphorical, combat with beasts, may be collected from what the Apostle tells the Corinthians, 2 Cor. i. 8; and from the phrase, "manner of men," which means the barbarous custom of the men of that age. The fighting, here alluded to, in all probability happened in some tumult, of which there is no mention in the history of the Acts, previous to the riot of Demetrius, related in Acts xix. Dr. Macknight.

may be called the Epicurean's manual or creed, hath been the favourite maxim of the sensual and profane in all ages. Accordingly Isaiah tells us, that the wicked, in derision of his prophecy concerning the destruction of Jerusalem by the Chaldeans, said to one another, "Let us eat and drink; for to morrow we shall die," Isai. xxii. 13. The author of the book of Wisdom likewise hath very well expressed the sentiments of the wicked in his time, chap. ii. 1—9; from which it appears that by dying they meant their own utter annihilation. Dr. Macknight.

33. Be not deceived:] By such speeches and discourses as these; such atheistical temptations to sensuality upon pretence of there being no future state. Dr. Hammond.

34. —for some have not the knowledge of God:] Such of the Corinthians as denied the resurrection and a future state, shewed great ignorance both of God's character as moral Governour of the world, and of His perfections, especially His power and goodness set forth in the works of creation. Dr. Macknight.

35. —How are the dead raised up? and with what body do they come?] The Apostle, having proved the doctrine of the resurrection in the former part of the chapter, proceeds in this place to answer two objections to it. The first, that it seems impossible the dead should rise; the second, relating to the sort of bodies with which they should rise. Burkitt.

36. Thou fool, that which thou sowest &c.] He answers the first objection by observing, that it is as possible for the dead to rise, as it is for corn sown in the earth to be quickened after it dies in the earth: and the second, ver. 37, 38, by saying that our bodies shall arise the same in substance, though not in quality, as corn sown rises, not in the same figure, but in the same nature, in which it was sown. Burkitt. The philosophers judged it a thing unworthy of God to raise the body and unite it again to the soul, whose happiness consisted in being delivered from it: the Apostle gives a full and satisfactory answer to the objection by showing the happy change which shall pass upon the raised body. Dr. Whitby, Burkitt.

——except it die:] To illustrate the possibility of the resurrection, the Apostle appeals to a thing which men every day behold, and which is little less wonderful than the resurrection itself: the reproduction of grain from seed sown, which does not grow unless it be rotted in the ground. But after its body is destroyed, something springs out of it, which, by a wonderful process, the effect of the power of God, acts in the reproduction of the same kind of grain, not bare as it was sown, but richly adorned with blades, stalk, and ear. Dr. Macknight.

39—41. All flesh is not the same &c.] The Apostle here by several illustrations, drawn from the animal creation, and from earthly and heavenly bodies, further sets forth the great difference there will be, as to their glory and excellency, between our animal bodies here, and our spiritual bodies hereafter. Burkitt, Dr. Wells.

41. There is one glory of the sun, &c.] The Apostle here represents the different degrees of glory, which good men shall be invested with at the resurrection, by the different glory and splendour of the heavenly bodies. "There is one glory of the sun, and another glory of the moon, and another glory of the stars: for one star differeth from another star in glory. So also is the resurrection of the dead." So that the more any man suffers for God, and the more patiently he suffers, the more holily and virtuously, the more charitably and usefully he lives in this world; the more good works will accompany him into the next, and the greater and more glorious reward he may hope to receive there: which, as the Apostle reasons in the conclusion of the chapter, ought to be a mighty encouragement to every one of us, not only to be "stedfast and unmoveable," that is, fixed and resolute in the profession and practice of our religion; but "abounding likewise in the work of the Lord; forasmuch as we know that our labour is not in vain in the Lord." Abp. Tillotson.

42. So also is the resurrection of the dead.] This is evidently to be understood of the resurrection of the righteous, since their bodies alone will undergo the happy change here described; although the arguments produced to prove that there shall be a resurrection of the dead, apply both to the righteous and to the wicked. Burkitt, Dr. Macknight.

——It is sown in corruption; &c.] St. Paul here contrasts the qualities of the body in its present and future state, in four particulars: in its present state, it is subject to death and dissolution, to disgrace and deformity, to infirmity, decay, and impotence; and it is "a natural," or an animal "body," suited to the wants of this lower, sensible, animal state, in which we now live: in its future state it will be incorruptible, glorious, vigorous, and spiritualized by an exemption from its present imperfections, and by the acquisition of numerous perfections, which it will continually employ in subjection to the soul. Burkitt.

45. And so it is written, &c.] And as we read in Gen. ii. 7, that Adam, the first man, from whom we all received our weak and animal bodies, was made "a living soul;" so is it as true, that Christ, the second Adam, has not only life, but life in Himself, and a power to raise others to life; (Pyle;) and to make their bodies spiritual like His. Dr. Whitby. See John i. 4; v. 21, 26.

46. —but that which is natural;] So that we must first receive

48 As is the earthy, such are they also that are earthy: and as is the heavenly, such are they also that are heavenly.

49 And as we have borne the image of the earthy, we shall also bear the image of the heavenly.

50 Now this I say, brethren, that flesh and blood cannot inherit the kingdom of God; neither doth corruption inherit incorruption.

51 Behold, I shew you a mystery; We shall not all sleep, but we shall all be changed, 52 In a moment, in the twinkling of an eye, at the last trump: for the trumpet shall sound, and the dead shall be raised incorruptible, and we shall be changed.

Anno DOMINI 59.

53 For this corruptible must put on incorruption, and this mortal must put on immortality.

our elementary and natural body, ere we can receive our spiritual and incorruptible. Bp. Hall.

47—49. The first man is of the earth, earthy: &c.] The sense of these three verses may be thus given: Weak and mortal we must needs be here, being extracted from one that was himself so. But when we shall be begotten again from the dead by Christ, the second Adam, our heavenly Saviour, our bodies shall also partake of the heavenly and immortal qualities of His, and live eternally without sickness, decay, or death. Pyle.

The first man, in whom all the rest were contained, and therefore fell with him and in him; he was formed out of the dust of the ground, and so was a mere man, and no more. But the second man came down from heaven, and was the Lord, the Lord of hosts, the Almighty God there, before He came from thence, yea, from all eternity. He was "the Lord from heaven," and came from thence in a way suitable to His own divine glory, by being conceived of the Holy Ghost, and born of a pure virgin, so as to become man, and yet be God too in the same person. And being thus God as well as man, He was every way qualified to repair the loss that mankind sustained by the fall of the first Adam, and to restore them to their first estate as perfectly as if they had never fallen from it. Bp. Beveridge.

50. Now this I say, brethren, &c.] The Apostle sums up his reply to those who ask, "with what bodies the dead shall come," ver. 35, by affirming that at the resurrection we shall not have such bodies as we now have, for "flesh and blood," that is, our bodies in their present natural, decaying, mortal state, are not adapted to taste or enjoy the spiritual pleasures of heaven. Dr. Wells, Burkitt.

——neither doth corruption inherit incorruption.] Our present corruptible bodies are not fitted to that state of incorruptibility. Dr. Wells.

51. Behold, I shew you a mystery;] A secret not yet discovered to you: that, with respect to those who are found alive at the day of judgment, though they do not die at all, yet must they all be changed before they go to heaven. Dr. Hammond.

52.—the dead shall be raised incorruptible, and we shall be changed.] At that instant the dead bodies of the saints shall be raised up to a glorious and immortal constitution, and those that are then alive shall be transformed into the same brightness and immortality. Pyle.

54.—Death is swallowed up in victory.] Or, is so perfectly conquered, that there shall be no death any more. Dr. Wells. See Isai. xxv. 8, and the note there.

56. The sting of death is sin; &c.] Sin was the first and baneful cause, and is the only terrour of death; and the malignancy of sin is from this, that it is the transgression of a just and righteous law of God. Pyle.

58. Therefore, my beloved brethren, be ye stedfast, &c.] The Apostle concludes his discourse on this great subject, the doctrine of the resurrection of the body, with an exhortation to Christian duty. "Be ye stedfast," that is, in the faith of the Gospel in general, and in the belief of this particular article of our Christian faith: "unmoveable," by any temptations or tribulations, either from the faith and hope of the Gospel, or from obedience to its precepts: "always abounding in the work of the Lord," with a zeal and activity in God's service proportioned to the steadfastness and firmness of your faith: "forasmuch as ye know that your labour is not in vain in the Lord," but shall be plentifully recompensed by Him at the resurrection of the just. Burkitt.

It ought to be no objection to the doctrine of the resurrection that several particulars relating to it exceed our comprehension. "How the dead are raised," it is sufficient that God knows; and by no means wonderful that we do not: for we scarce know how any one part of the course of nature is carried on. And as to the inquiry that follows this in St. Paul, "with what bodies do they come?" we are taught they shall be so far the same bodies, that every one shall have properly his own, and be truly the same person he was before: but so far different, that those of good persons will be subject to none of the sufferings, none of the infirmities, none of the necessities of this life. For to use the same Apostle's words, "What is sown in corruption, shall be raised in incorruption: what is sown in dishonour, shall be raised in glory: what is sown in weakness, shall be raised in power: what is sown a natural body, shall be raised a spiritual body." But the particular nature of spiritual bodies, or the distinction that shall be made in them, between the more eminent in goodness and their inferiours, "as one star differeth from another star in glory;" these things we are not qualified in our present state to understand. And it is some degree of weakness even to ask questions about them: but would be much greater to attempt to give answers. I shall therefore only add, that such of the good as are found "alive at the coming of the Lord, shall not sleep," or die, and therefore cannot rise again; "but shall be changed" into the same likeness with those who do: as the Scripture hath plainly taught us. But what the appearance and condition of the bodies of wicked persons will be at the resurrection, it hath not, I think, afforded us the least knowledge, further than is implied in the description of their punishment: and let us be so wise as to dread the terrours that are thus concealed from us. Abp. Secker.

If with St. Paul we believe that there shall be a resurrection, both of the just and of the unjust, we must like him apply ourselves to preserve a conscience void of offence towards God and towards man. St. Paul says, that, without the hope of another life, Christians would be most miserable. But there is a state more miserable than this, and far worse than the prospect of annihilation; and that is the state of one, who thinks that he shall rise again to the resurrection of condemnation. Therefore he, who expects to rise again, must purify himself, that he may rise to his own profit and joy. This hope should be the regulating principle of our lives, and guide us in the paths of innocence and virtue: and then it will be our stay and support in all conditions. The first Christians experienced severer trials than usually fall to our lot: and yet this hope supported them. When we consider ourselves as mortal creatures, melancholy reflections arise: diseases within, calamities without, a body which of itself decays, sometimes swiftly, sometimes slowly, but still is decaying, and will fall to pieces, and lose its contexture, when the machine is worn out. Let us be thankful that our views are not bounded within the poor narrow circle of this perishing life. When we die, we die to this world, but not to God. He who made us will take care of us, and preserve us safe to the great day. He who redeemed us hath disarmed death of its sting, and the grave of its dominion. "Blessed" therefore "be the God and Father of our Lord Jesus Christ, which according to His abundant mercy hath begotten us again unto a lively hope by the resurrection of Jesus Christ from the dead, to an inheritance incorruptible and undefiled, and that fadeth not away, reserved in heaven for us!" 1 Pet. i. 3, 4. Dr. Jortin.

Let the consideration of that unspeakable reward, which God hath promised to good men at the resurrection, encourage us to obedience and a holy life. We serve a great Prince, who is able to promote us to honour; a most gracious Master, who will not let the least service we do for Him pass unrewarded. This is the inference which the Apostle makes from his large discourse of the doctrine of the resurrection in this chapter: "therefore, my beloved brethren, be ye stedfast, unmoveable, always abounding in the work of the Lord, forasmuch as ye know that your labour is not in vain in the Lord." Nothing will make death more welcome to us, than a constant course of service and obedience to God. "Sleep," saith Solomon, "is sweet to the labouring man:" so after a great diligence and industry in "working out our own salvation," and, as it is said of David, "serving our generation according to the will of God," how pleasant will it be to fall asleep! And, as an useful and well-spent life will make our death to be sweet, so will it make our resurrection to be glorious. Whatever acts of piety we do to God, or of charity to men; whatever we lay out upon the poor, and afflicted, and necessitous; will all be considered by God for Christ's sake in the day of recompence, and most plentifully rewarded to us. Abp. Tillotson.

Since the faith of the resurrection is not only a principal article of a Christian's belief, but also the article which chiefly concerns us at the burial of our friends, as well to allay our sorrow for the deceased, as to prepare us freely to follow when God shall call us; therefore the church has chosen this chapter to be read at the funeral service, as containing the fullest account of the resurrection of the dead, that the whole Scripture affords: that article being here so strongly proved, so plainly described, and so pertinently applied, that nothing could have been more suitable to that purpose; for which reason we find it always to have been used in this office of the church. Wheatley.

Chap. XVI. The Apostle exhorts the Corinthians to contribute to a collection that was making for the churches of Judea. He promises to come to see them in a little time. He recommends to them Timothy and some other persons. He concludes with salutations and good wishes, and by declaring, that those who did not love the Lord Jesus Christ sincerely, were exposed to the judgment of God, and ought not to be looked upon as members of the church. Osterwald.

Ver. 2. Upon the first day of the week] Which was the day of their publick assemblies, the day on which our Lord rose again from the dead. Burkitt. See the note on Acts xx. 7.

3. —whomsoever ye shall approve by your letters,] The letters, of which the Apostle speaks, seem to be from the Corinthians to the brethren in Jerusalem, informing them that the persons who presented these letters were appointed by them to attend the Apostle when he delivered the collections at Jerusalem. The meaning would be more clearly conveyed, if the clause were rendered, 'Whomsoever ye shall authorize by letters.' Dr. Macknight.

4. —they shall go with me.] To be witnesses of the distribution of your charity. Dr. Whitby.

5. —when I shall pass] Or, shall have passed through Macedonia. Dr. Whitby.

9. For a great door and effectual is opened unto me, &c.] The door of a house being the passage into it, 'the opening of a door' in the Eastern phrase signified the affording of an opportunity to a person of doing a thing. The phrase occurs in other passages of Scripture. See Col. iv. 3; Hos. ii. 15. The Apostle's long abode at Ephesus was owing to his great success in converting the Ephesians and such strangers as had occasion to resort to that metropolis. But about the time this Epistle was written, his success was greater than common. For many who used "curious arts," the arts of magick and divination, were converted, and burned their books, containing the secrets of these arts, Acts xix. 17—20. This so enraged the idolaters at Ephesus, but especially the craftsmen, that they raised the great tumult described, Acts xix. 23—41. Dr. Macknight.

10. —without fear:] That is, without fear of disturbance from the factious. Dr. Whitby. At this time Timothy being young and extremely attached to the Apostle, there was some reason to fear that the faction would treat him ill, more especially if he reproved them for their disorderly practices. Dr. Macknight.

13 Watch ye, stand fast in the faith, quit you like men, be strong.

14 Let all your things be done with charity.

15 I beseech you, brethren, (ye know the house of Stephanas, that it is the first-fruits of Achaia, and that they have addicted themselves to the ministry of the saints,)

16 That ye submit yourselves unto such, and to every one that helpeth with us, and laboureth. Anno DOMINI 59.

17 I am glad of the coming of Stephanas and Fortunatus and Achaicus: for that which was lacking on your part they have supplied.

18 For they have refreshed my spirit and your's: therefore acknowledge ye them that are such.

19 The churches of Asia salute you. Aquila and Priscilla salute you much in the Lord, with the church that is in their house.

20 All the brethren greet you. Greet ye one another with an holy kiss.

21 The salutation of me Paul with mine own hand.

22 If any man love not the Lord Jesus Christ, let him be Anathema Maran-atha.

---

11. Let no man therefore despise him:] This charge is not given concerning any other messenger, whom St. Paul sent; and in the different Epistles many such messengers are mentioned. In 1 Tim. iv. 12, it is found that Timothy was a young man, younger probably than those who were usually employed in the Christian mission; and that St. Paul, apprehending lest he should on that account be exposed to contempt, urges on him the caution which is there inserted, "Let no man despise thy youth." Archdeacon Paley.

—— but conduct him forth in peace,] Bring him on his journey in a kind and friendly manner. Dr. Wells.

—— for I look for him with the brethren.] Namely, Erastus, who had been sent with Timothy to Corinth, Acts xix. 22; and Titus, who carried this letter; and another brother, whose name is not mentioned; see 2 Cor. xii. 17, 18: perhaps also some of the Corinthian brethren, whom the Apostle had desired Titus to bring with him to Ephesus. Dr. Macknight.

12. — his will was not at all to come at this time;] Perhaps because he would not by his presence countenance a faction begun under his name. Dr. Whitby, Burkitt. St. Jerome says, Apollos actually went to Corinth after the disturbances had ceased. Dr. Macknight.

13, 14. Watch ye, &c.] The Apostle draws his advice to a conclusion with charging them, to be upon their guard against the designing heads of their factions; to stand firm to the doctrines at first delivered to them; to behave themselves with manly courage and resolution; and to let all their actions, both in publick assemblies and in private conversation, be conducted with a constant eye to the good of their brethren, and to the peace of the church. Pyle.

The Apostle's main design being to put an end to the faction and division among them, it is no wonder that we find unity and charity so much and so often pressed in this and the other Epistle. Locke.

15. — it is the firstfruits of Achaia, &c.] They received the Gospel at the first preaching of it in Achaia, and have ever since been very bountiful to all the poor Christians. Dr. Hammond.

16. That ye submit yourselves unto such, &c.] That you honour and reverence them, and such as they, and all that join with them in the propagation of the Gospel and faith of Christ. Dr. Hammond. The word, rendered "submit yourselves," is not to be understood here in its strict sense of being subject to, but only as implying an obsequious readiness to perform all offices of love. Parkhurst.

17. — Fortunatus] This worthy man survived St. Paul a considerable time; for it appears from the Epistle of Clement to the Corinthians, that he was the messenger of the church at Corinth to that of Rome, by whom Clement sent back that invaluable Epistle. Dr. Doddridge.

—— for that which was lacking on your part they have supplied.] They have given me a much fuller account of the state and disposition of your church, than I should otherwise have had. Pyle.

18. For they have refreshed my spirit] With their presence and discourse; "and yours" also, by taking upon them to come and bring me this account. Burkitt, Dr. Wells.

—— acknowledge ye them that are such.] Own their services, and honour them for the same. Burkitt.

19. The churches of Asia] Of the lesser Asia. See the note on Acts ii. 9.

Asia, throughout the Acts of the Apostles and the Epistles of St. Paul, does not mean the whole of Asia Minor or Anatolia, nor even the whole of the proconsular Asia, but a district in the anterior part of that country, called Lydian Asia, divided from the rest much as Portugal is from Spain, and of which district Ephesus, whence St. Paul wrote this Epistle, was the capital. Archdeacon Paley.

—— Aquila and Priscilla] They had formerly made some abode at Corinth, and there St. Paul's acquaintance with them commenced, Acts xviii. 1, 2. It is therefore no wonder they were particular in their salutations. Dr. Doddridge.

—— the church that is in their house.] That is, their Christian family. The phrase seems to signify a family consisting wholly of Christian converts, as was the jailor's, Acts xvi. 31, 32; and that of Crispus, Acts xviii. 8. When the family was not entirely converted, the Apostle uses a different phrase. See Rom. xvi. 10, 11, 14, 15; Col. iv. 15. Dr. Whitby.

20. — an holy kiss.] See the note on Rom. xvi. 16.

21. — with mine own hand.] The rest of the Epistle being written by his amanuensis. See Rom. xvi. 22; 2 Thess. iii. 17. Pyle.

The Apostle when using a person to write for him in the rest of the Epistle, subscribed something at the end thereof with his own hand; to give them more solemnly his benediction; as likewise, the more to assure them, that the Epistle came from him, and was not forged. See 2 Thess. iii. 17; Col. iv. 18. Bp. Fell.

22. — let him be Anathema Maran-atha.] That is, accursed when the Lord comes to judgment. Dr. Whitby. The Greek word "Anathema" signifies execrable; the Syriack word "Maran-atha," the Lord cometh. Burkitt. The imperative is here put for the future. Dr. Macknight.

THE SECOND EPISTLE OF PAUL THE APOSTLE

CORINTHIANS.

INTRODUCTION.

IT appears from the history of St. Paul, that soon after the tumult occasioned by Demetrius, St. Paul left Ephesus, went to Troas, and thence into Macedonia, where he met Titus, who was just come from Corinth, whither he had been sent by St. Paul with his first epistle, and with directions to inquire into the state of the church in that city. From Titus St. Paul learned that his letter was well received by the Corinthian Christians; that the greater part of them had expressed much concern for their past behaviour; that they had given full proof of their attachment to him, and in particular that they had, in obedience to his commands, excommunicated the person who had been guilty of an incestuous marriage; but that some of them still adhered to the false teachers, who continued to deny St. Paul's apostolical mission, and used every other means in their power to lessen his credit with the Corinthians. St. Paul's former letter having produced these good effects among the Corinthians, he thought it expedient to write to them again, for the purpose of confirming them in their right conduct, and to give them some farther advice and instruction, especially with reference to the attempts which were still making to pervert their faith, and of which he had lately received a circumstantial account from Titus.

This second epistle to the Corinthians was written from Macedonia, within twelve months after the first, and probably in the beginning of the year 57; and it was sent to Corinth by Titus, who with other persons was returning thither to forward the collections in Achaia for the poor Christians of Judea.

St. Paul writes in his own name, and in that of Timothy, who was now with him in Macedonia; and addresses not only the Christians of Corinth, but of all Achaia: he begins with speaking of the consolations which he had experienced under his sufferings, and of the sincerity and zeal with which he had preached the Gospel; he explains the reason of his not having performed his promise of visiting the Corinthians, and assures them the delay had proceeded, not from levity or fickleness, as perhaps his enemies had represented, but from tenderness towards his converts at Corinth, to give them time to reform, and that there might be no occasion for treating them with severity when he saw them; he notices the case of the incestuous person, and on account of his repentance desires that he may be forgiven, and restored to communion with the church; he mentions the success with which he had preached; he enlarges upon the importance of the ministerial office, the zeal and faithfulness with which he had discharged his duty, and the excellence of the Gospel doctrines; he cautions them against connexions with unbelievers; he expresses great regard for the Corinthians; declares that he had felt much anxiety and concern, on account of the irregularities which had prevailed among them; and that he rejoiced very much upon being informed of their penitence and amendment; and he exhorts them to contribute liberally to the relief of their poor brethren in Judea. In the latter part of the epistle he again vindicates his character as an Apostle, and enumerates the various species of distress and persecutions which he had undergone in the cause of Christianity. He concludes with general exhortations, and the well known benediction in the name of the Father, the Son, and the Holy Ghost. Bp. Tomline.

CHAP. I.

3 The apostle encourageth them against troubles, by the comforts and deliverances which God had given him, as in all his afflictions, 8 so particularly in his late danger in Asia. 12 And calling both his own conscience and their's to witness of his sincere manner of preaching the immutable truth of the gospel, 15 he excuseth his not coming to them, as proceeding not of lightness, but of his lenity towards them.

Anno DOMINI 60.

PAUL, an apostle of Jesus Christ by the will of God, and Timothy our brother,

Chap. I. The Apostle presents himself to the Corinthians as a despised and suffering Apostle. He blesseth God for His support under, and deliverance from, his afflictions, as being of great benefit both to himself and them: comforts himself under the Divine protection, and his own sincerity: returns upon their factious teachers for misinterpreting his not coming to Corinth so soon as he proposed: shews himself consistent in what he said and taught, and gives the true reason of his not seeing them at the time appointed. Pyle.

1. — Timothy our brother,] "Brother," that is, either in the common faith, and so he frequently calls all the converted, as Rom. i. 13, and in other places; or "brother" in the work of the ministry, see Rom. xvi. 21; 1 Cor. xvi. 12. To which we may add, that St. Paul may be supposed to have given Timothy the title of brother here, for dignity's sake, to give him a reputation above his age amongst the Corinthians, to whom he had before sent him, with some kind of authority, to rectify their disorders. Locke.

unto the church of God which is at Corinth, with all the saints which are in all Achaia:

2 Grace be to you and peace from God our Father, and from the Lord Jesus Christ.

3 Blessed be God, even the Father of our Lord Jesus Christ, the Father of mercies, and the God of all comfort;

4 Who comforteth us in all our tribulation, that we may be able to comfort them which are in any trouble by the comfort, wherewith we ourselves are comforted of God.

5 For as the sufferings of Christ abound in us, so our consolation also aboundeth by Christ.

6 And whether we be afflicted, it is for your consolation and salvation, which ‖ is effectual in the enduring of the same sufferings which we also suffer: or whether we be comforted, it is for your consolation and salvation.

‖ Or, is wrought.

7 And our hope of you is stedfast, knowing, that as ye are partakers of the sufferings, so shall ye be also of the consolation.

8 For we would not, brethren, have you ignorant of our trouble which came to us in Asia, that we were pressed out of measure, above strength, insomuch that we despaired even of life:

Anno DOMINI 60.

9 But we had the ‖ sentence of death in ourselves, that we should not trust in ourselves, but in God which raiseth the dead:

‖ Or, answer.

10 Who delivered us from so great a death, and doth deliver: in whom we trust that he will yet deliver us;

11 Ye also helping together by prayer for us, that for the gift bestowed upon us by the means of many persons thanks may be given by many on our behalf.

12 For our rejoicing is this, the testimony of our conscience, that in simplicity and godly sincerity, not with fleshly wisdom, but by the grace of God, we have had our conversation in the world, and more abundantly to you-ward.

13 For we write none other things unto you, than what ye read or acknowledge; and I trust ye shall acknowledge even to the end;

14 As also ye have acknowledged us in —— unto the church of God &c.] See the note on 1 Cor. i. 2.

—— in all Achaia:] The province, of which Corinth was the metropolis or chief town. Dr. Wells.

5. — the sufferings of Christ] That is, our sufferings for, or on account of, Christ. Drs. Hammond and Wells.

6. — which is effectual] That is, which is effectually wrought. Bp. Hall. The Apostle says, that his sufferings and afflictions have had upon the Corinthians the good effect of encouraging them to suffer patiently after his example: and that his blessings and comforts are so many arguments to them, for depending steadily and joyfully upon the same infinite wisdom and power as he did. Pyle.

8. — our trouble which came to us in Asia,] Many interpreters here refer to the commotion raised against St. Paul by Demetrius at Ephesus, Act xix. 26, to the end. But we do not read that in that commotion any hands were laid upon the Apostle, or that he suffered any thing. He therefore had no occasion for the strong expressions, which he uses in these three verses, and which seem rather to signify, that he was in danger of being torn in pieces by the wild beasts with which he fought at Ephesus on another occasion, mentioned 1 Cor. xv. 32. See the note there. Drs. Whitby and Macknight.

9. But we had the sentence of death in ourselves,] I made full reckoning of my present death, as utterly inevitable. Bp. Hall. "The sentence of death" is that, which the Apostle, when ordered to fight with wild beasts, pronounced on himself in his own mind. Dr. Macknight.

11. — that for the gift bestowed upon us &c.] That is, the gracious deliverance. Dr. Wells. The sense is, Then as you all contribute towards my safety and protection, you may all have the pleasure of rejoicing and giving thanks for it along with me. Pyle.

12. For our rejoicing is this, &c.] The connexion of this with the former verse seems to be, And there is good reason why you should thus pray for us, who have acted with such sincerity towards you, and so much to your advantage. Dr. Whitby.

—— the testimony of our conscience, &c.] The judgment of a man's own heart is of greater regard than the censures of all the men in the world besides. Better the world should condemn us, if our own hearts acquit us; than that our hearts should condemn us, and all the world acquit us. "This is our rejoicing," saith St. Paul, "the testimony of our conscience." The approbation of men may give some accession to the rejoicing, the other being supposed; but the main of it lieth in "the testimony of the conscience." This is the highest tribunal under heaven: but not absolutely the highest: there is one in heaven above it. St. Paul, who thought it safe for him to appeal thither from the unjust censures of men, yet durst not think it safe for him to rest here, but appealeth from it to a higher court, to the judgment of the great God. It was "a very small thing with him to be judged of man's judgment," 1 Cor. iv. 3; so long as he "knew nothing by himself," so long as his own heart condemned him not, he regarded not much the censures of men. Yet durst he not justify himself in the acquittal of his own heart. He knew there was much blindness and deceitfulness in the heart of every sinful man; and it were no wisdom to trust to that which might fail. He would have recourse therefore to a higher and an unerring Judge, who neither could deceive, nor could be deceived: and that was the Lord. "I judge not mine own self," saith he, "but He that judgeth me is the Lord." Bp. Sanderson.

—— by the grace of God,] Influencing me to despise such fleshly wisdom, and enabling me to perform miracles for the propagation of the Gospel. Dr. Wells.

—— and more abundantly to you-ward.] The powerful operations and gifts of the Holy Ghost seem to have been more abundantly exercised by the Apostle in the Corinthian church. Dr. Whitby. Also, his working with his own hands for his maintenance among the Corinthians, Acts xviii. 3; 1 Cor. ix. 15, which he did not do every where, must be a convincing proof of what he here says. Dr. Doddridge.

13. For we write none other things unto you, &c.] That is, we have no other design or meaning in what we write unto you, than what lies open and is legible in "what you read, or" than what ye even "acknowledge" to be so: "and I trust" I shall always so behave myself that "you shall acknowledge" the same simplicity and sincerity in me "even to the end." Dr. Wells.

14. As also ye have acknowledged us in part,] That is, some of you have acknowledged. Dr. Wells.

part, that we are your rejoicing, even as ye also are our's in the day of the Lord Jesus.

15 And in this confidence I was minded to come unto you before, that ye might ‖ Or, grace. have a second ‖ benefit;

16 And to pass by you into Macedonia, and to come again out of Macedonia unto you, and of you to be brought on my way toward Judea.

17 When I therefore was thus minded, did I use lightness? or the things that I purpose, do I purpose according to the flesh, that with me there should be yea yea, and nay nay?

‖ Or, preaching. 18 But as God is true, our ‖ word toward you was not yea and nay.

19 For the Son of God, Jesus Christ, who was preached among you by us, even by me and Silvanus and Timotheus, was not yea and nay, but in him was yea.

Anno DOMINI 60.

20 For all the promises of God in him are yea, and in him Amen, unto the glory of God by us.

21 Now he which stablisheth us with you in Christ, and hath anointed us, is God;

22 Who hath also sealed us, and given the earnest of the Spirit in our hearts.

23 Moreover I call God for a record upon my soul, that to spare you I came not as yet unto Corinth.

24 Not for that we have dominion over your faith, but are helpers of your joy: for by faith ye stand.

CHAP. II.

1 Having shewed the reason why he came not to them,
6 he requireth them to forgive and to comfort that ——even as ye also are our's] Are at present, and much more will be ours, in the day when Christ shall come to reward his faithful servants. Drs. Whitby and Hammond.

15. And in this confidence] Of your love and esteem for me. Dr. Wells.

——that ye might have a second benefit;] That, as ye received one main benefit by my first coming, which was your conversion, so ye might receive a second benefit by my coming again, even your confirmation in the Gospel. Bp. Hall.

17. When I therefore was thus minded,] And yet did not accordingly perform it, was it out of any levity, or inconstancy and unsteadiness to my own resolutions? or do I contrive my purposes and determinations out of carnal respects, that according to the occasion of more profit or ease I should alter them? and that I should say and unsay at pleasure, promising and retracting as advantage served? Bp. Hall.

18. But as God is true, our word toward you was not yea and nay.] No surely: but I call the only true God to witness, that neither this purpose and engagement of mine, nor any word of my preaching among you, hath been false, double, variable, deceitful. Bp. Hall. "Yea" is as much as to affirm, "nay" to deny. For a man to have his yea yea, and his nay nay, is to be true and faithful: but to be yea and nay at the same time is to be false and contradictory. Pyle.

19. For the Son of God, Jesus Christ, &c.] For, as to the doctrine of the Gospel, which is of the greatest concern, &c. Dr. Wells. "Christ preached" is here put instead of preaching concerning Christ: the sense of the passage is, The word concerning the Son of God preached by me, Timothy, and Silvanus, was still the same without any variance: we did not one while affirm of Him that which another while we denied; but we ever continued immoveable and unchangeable in the same doctrines. Dr. Whitby, Bp. Hall.

20. For all the promises of God in him are yea, &c.] Otherwise we should not have faithfully delivered this holy errand that is committed to us; for certainly all the promises of God in the Gospel, which are the matter of our message, are in Him fully and immutably performed; and so are proclaimed and justified to the world by us, to the glory and praise of God. Bp. Hall.

To the glory, both of His mercy and truth, which no where shines forth so gloriously as in making and performing such gracious and wonderful promises to mankind. Bp. Beveridge.

"Yea" was the word used by the Greeks for affirming any thing: "Amen" was the word used by the Hebrews for the same purpose. Dr. Macknight.

21.—in Christ,] That is, in the doctrine of Christ. Dr. Whitby.

——and hath anointed us,] With the Holy Ghost. Dr. Whitby.

22. Who hath also sealed us, &c.] As if he had said, Who has also sealed the truth of what is preached by us, by the miraculous gifts of the Holy Ghost, vouchsafed not only to myself, but to you also upon your receiving my doctrine; "and given the earnest of the Spirit in our hearts," that is, given not only to me, but also to you on receiving my doctrine, His Spirit as the earnest of eternal life. The argument of the Apostle appears to be, that these things being so, as the Corinthians could not but acknowledge, they afforded a sufficient evidence that he, being thus approved by God, could not possibly be such a deceitful self-interested person as his adversaries represented him, and could not reasonably be suspected of dealing fraudulently with them in any thing relating to his ministry. Dr. Wells.

An earnest is part of a sum, given in assurance of receiving the whole afterwards. So the Spirit of God within us is given us by way of "earnest," to assure us that in due time we shall receive from God all those other good things, and that full glory and bliss, which He hath promised us; always provided we keep our earnest, and do not throw it back to the Giver, or by resisting the motions of the Spirit provoke Him to take it again from us. Bp. Bull.

23. Moreover I call God for a record &c.] St. Paul, having argued against the charge of fickleness, now proceeds to state the true cause of his not having come to Corinth. Dr. Wells. The words are a solemn imprecation of the vengeance of God upon himself, if he departed from the truth in what he was about to write. With this imprecation he begins his apology for altering his resolution. And as he continues it to the fifth verse of the next chapter, either that chapter ought to have begun here, or this should have ended there. Dr. Macknight.

——to spare you] Lest, finding matters amiss and yet unreformed, I should have been forced to use my Apostolical authority amongst you in such severity, as would have seemed very harsh unto you. Bp. Hall.

24. Not for that we have dominion over your faith, &c.] Not as if we would be imperious and overrule you in matter of faith and religion at our pleasure, but only that we would endeavour your reformation, and therein be helpers forward of your joy. Bp. Hall.

——for by faith ye stand.] Or, 'for ye have stood in the faith.' The Apostle acknowledges, that they had generally stood firm in the profession of the Christian faith; and accordingly declares it to be the design of his threat to excite them to cure their divisions and contentions, and reform their gross miscarriages, chap. xii. 20, 21: that so he might not be found towards them "such as they would not," nor create them any farther trouble, but might be a promoter of that joy, which they would find in such a reformation of themselves. Dr. Whitby.

excommunicated person, 10 even as himself also upon his true repentance had forgiven him, 12 declaring withal why he departed from Troas to Macedonia, 14 and the happy success which God gave to his preaching in all places.

BUT I determined this with myself, that I would not come again to you in heaviness.

2 For if I make you sorry, who is he then that maketh me glad, but the same which is made sorry by me?

3 And I wrote this same unto you, lest, when I came, I should have sorrow from them of whom I ought to rejoice; having confidence in you all, that my joy is the joy of you all.

4 For out of much affliction and anguish of heart I wrote unto you with many tears; not that ye should be grieved, but that ye might know the love which I have more abundantly unto you.

5 But if any have caused grief, he hath not grieved me, but in part: that I may not overcharge you all.

6 Sufficient to such a man is this ‖ punishment, which was inflicted of many.

7 So that contrariwise ye ought rather to forgive him, and comfort him, lest perhaps such a one should be swallowed up with overmuch sorrow.

‖ Or, censure.

8 Wherefore I beseech you that ye would confirm your love toward him.

9 For to this end also did I write, that I might know the proof of you, whether ye be obedient in all things.

10 To whom ye forgive any thing, I forgive also: for if I forgave any thing, to whom I forgave it, for your sakes forgave I it ‖ in the person of Christ;

‖ Or, in the sight.

11 Lest Satan should get an advantage of us: for we are not ignorant of his devices.

12 Furthermore, when I came to Troas to preach Christ's gospel, and a door was opened unto me of the Lord,

13 I had no rest in my spirit, because I found not Titus my brother: but taking Chap. II. The Apostle proceeds to shew the reason of his not coming to Corinth, so soon as he intended, to be his real clemency toward the scandalous offenders. He expresseth his tenderness towards them all, desires that even the incestuous person should be received into the church again upon his repentance, and declares his own sincerity, and the difficult charge of the Apostolical office; with a reflection upon their new teachers that oppose him. Pyle.

Ver. 1. — in heaviness.] That is, so as to make you sad, if I could possibly avoid it. Dr. Whitby.

2. — who is he then that maketh me glad,] St. Paul's chief joy in his sufferings were his converts, for whose salvation's sake he suffered. Bp. Fell.

—— but the same which is made sorry by me?] The Apostle, knowing that the sincere part of the church would be made sorry by his punishing their disobedient brethren, wished not to distress his friends by punishing his enemies. Dr. Macknight.

3. And I wrote this same unto you, &c.] I have therefore written you my mind beforehand, that, by a timely reformation of the disorders of your church, I might not have the trouble and vexation of punishing instead of congratulating, when I come to visit you. Pyle.

—— my joy is the joy of you all.] Either the Apostle is speaking of the sincere part of the Corinthian church, or the word "all" must be taken in a qualified sense. Dr. Macknight.

4. — not that ye should be grieved,] Not out of any pleasure that I take to censure or afflict you. Dr. Hammond.

5. But if any have caused grief, &c.] The Apostle here alludes to the incestuous person, the author of all this sadness and severity. Dr. Hammond. Mr. Locke very well observes the great tenderness, which the Apostle uses to this offender; he never once mentions his name, nor does he here so much as mention his crime; but speaks of him in the most indefinite manner, that was consistent with giving such directions as his case required. Dr. Doddridge.

—— he hath not grieved me, but in part:] Namely, in respect only of those that defended what he had done. Dr. Wells. As if St. Paul had said, The sorrow, which I have had for the sin and scandal of this notorious offender, I am very far from charging upon the whole church: I dare not load you all with that imputation, as if you were involved in the guilt of it. Burkitt.

6. Sufficient to such a man is this punishment, &c.] Since he hath been censured according to my order, and hath professed his serious repentance, let this punishment be sufficient, which was inflicted upon him publickly in the congregation. Bp. Hall.

A very striking instance of St. Paul's mildness and tenderness presents itself in the Apostle's language to the Corinthians, amongst whom the most atrocious incest had been committed, and allowed to continue with impunity. On such an occasion a violent enthusiast would have instantly thundered forth a ban of eternal condemnation, certainly against the individual offender, probably against the whole society; no expressions would have seemed too bitter, no violence too great. Not so the Apostle; he exposes in strong, but calm and dignified language, the enormity of the crime, the contagion of the example, and the danger of impunity. He commands them "to put away from among themselves that wicked person, and to deliver him unto Satan for the destruction of the flesh, that the spirit may be saved in the day of the Lord Jesus." But when his exhortation had produced the desired effect, when the sinner had been punished and reduced to a due sense of shame and sorrow for his enormous crime, and when the authority of virtue, and the sacredness of religion had been thus restored, with what inimitable tenderness does the Apostle speak pardon and peace to the penitent offender, and consolation to the humbled church! Dr. Graves.

9. — whether ye be obedient in all things.] Whether you are as ready upon my appointment to restore penitents, as to inflict punishment upon offenders. Dr. Hammond.

10. — in the person of Christ;] As St. Paul delivered the incestuous person to Satan "in the name of the Lord Christ," 1 Cor. v. 4; so in His person and by His authority he relaxes the sentence. Dr. Whitby.

11. Lest Satan should get an advantage of us:] By hurrying him into despair; or representing the church discipline as that which tendeth to men's ruin, and so tempting him to apostasy. Dr. Whitby.

12. Furthermore, &c.] The Apostle proceeds to give the Corinthians a further instance of his real concern for them, and a proof that his not coming to them at the time appointed was not occasioned by fickleness or disrespect towards them. Pyle.

—— Troas] See the note on Acts xvi. 8.

14 Now thanks be unto God, which always causeth us to triumph in Christ, and maketh manifest the savour of his knowledge by us in every place.

15 For we are unto God a sweet savour of Christ, in them that are saved, and in them that perish:

16 To the one we are the savour of death unto death; and to the other the savour of life unto life. And who is sufficient for these things?

‖ Or, deal deceitfully with.

CHAP. III.

Anno DOMINI 60.

1 Lest their false teachers should charge him with vainglory, he sheweth the faith and graces of the Corinthians to be a sufficient commendation of his ministry. 6 Whereupon entering a comparison between the ministers of the law and of the gospel, 12 he proveth that his ministry is so far the more excellent, as the gospel of life and liberty is more glorious than the law of condemnation.

DO we begin again to commend ourselves? or need we, as some others, epistles of commendation to you, or letters of commendation from you?

2 Ye are our epistle written in our hearts, known and read of all men:

3 Forasmuch as ye are manifestly declared to be the epistle of Christ ministered by us, written not with ink, but with the Spirit of the living God; not in

---

—— into Macedonia.] Hoping to find him there, where he arrived, and gave me a very comfortable account of you. Dr. Whitby.

14. Now thanks be unto God, &c.] The Apostle takes occasion, from the happy success of his former Epistle, reported to him by Titus, to bless God, who had prospered him in the propagation of the Gospel, and by him had made piety and the Christian faith well reputed of in every place. Dr. Hammond.

—— maketh manifest the savour &c.] Causes the knowledge of His religion by means of us to spread in every place, like the odour of a grateful perfume. Schleusner.

—— the savour of his knowledge] Dr. Whitby remarks, that these expressions are agreeable to the phraseology of the Jews, who say of the law, that 'it is to Israel a savour of life, but to the nations of the world a savour of death,' of which the Apostle seems here to give the reverse, in speaking of the Gospel; namely, that it was to them, as being the rejecters of it, "the savour of death;" but to the Gentiles, who embraced it, "the savour of life." Considering St. Paul's rapid transitions, it may seem, that in the 14th verse he had in his view the incense fumed at the Roman triumphs; and that having there mentioned "a savour," he was reminded of the Jewish phrases, "a savour of death," and "a savour of life," which he applies at ver. 16. Parkhurst.

15. For we are unto God a sweet savour of Christ, &c.] He means that, whatever be the success of his ministry, though some men refuse the evidences of the Christian religion, and perish by their wilful obstinacy, whilst others embrace and are saved by it, yet are his sincere endeavours acceptable to God in respect to all. Pyle.

The Gospel is "the savour of life or of death" to all that hear it. Those who are careful to improve by it God will bless with further improvements; those who are not he will leave in His just judgment to grow worse and worse: or, to speak the language of our Saviour, "Whosoever hath, to him shall be given: and whosoever hath not, from him shall be taken even that which he seemeth to have." Abp. Secker.

16. — And who is sufficient for these things?] This is a weighty employment, and unless God did particularly enable us, we could never be fit for it. Dr. Hammond.

17. — which corrupt the word of God:] Here is an allusion to those hucksters of whom the Prophet Isaiah speaks, saying, according to the Greek version, 'Thy vintners mix wine with water,' Isai. i. 22: and so the meaning of the words is this, We do not adulterate the sincerity of the word, as your false apostles do; but as men "of sincerity," as persons inspired and commissioned "of God," and as "in the sight" and more immediate presence "of God," do we preach the Gospel of Christ. This verse is connected with the 15th, and expresses the reason why the service of the Apostle in the Gospel was well pleasing to God. Drs. Whitby and Wells.

Chap. III. St. Paul represents to the Corinthians, that their conversion to the Christian religion was a sufficient proof of his calling, and that he stood in need of no other recommendation to them, than the testimony of their conscience, and the gifts of the Holy Spirit, which had been bestowed on them abundantly; but he acknowledges at the same time, that the efficacy of his ministry proceeded only from God. He shews in the next place, that the ministry of the Gospel is much more excellent than that of the law, forasmuch as this last was imperfect, incapable of giving life, and was not to continue always; whereas that of the Gospel was spiritual and eternal, giving life. From whence St. Paul concludes, that those, who adhered to the ceremonies and law of Moses, remained in ignorance and misery; and that none but those who cleave to the Gospel are truly enlightened, and enjoy the glorious liberty of the sons of God. The Apostle says all this to defend himself against certain teachers that opposed him, and made a shew of great zeal for the law of Moses. Ostervald.

Ver. 1. Do we begin again to commend ourselves? &c.] By thus insisting upon my own sincerity, chap. ii. 17, I would not have any of you imagine I wanted any recommendations to your church, or needed your good word to set me off to any other Christian churches; as I find some of your new teachers get themselves recommended to you. Pyle. The "epistles of commendation" here mentioned allude to an ancient custom in the Apostolical primitive church, which commonly gave their testimonies to all Christians travelling from one place to another, and recommended them to an hospitable reception. Dr. Hammond.

2. Ye are our epistle &c.] We need no letters of commendation to you, for we well know, and have continually in remembrance, how powerfully God wrought with us for your conversion; see 1 Cor. ix. 2; 2 Cor. xii. 12: so that you are our best letters commendatory to yourselves. Nor need we letters of commendation from you to others; the fame of your conversion by us, and of the gifts, which we with the Gospel imparted to you, being spread throughout the world. Dr. Whitby.

3. — the epistle of Christ] His commendatory epistle, declaring and commending His power in your conversion, by such signs and gifts of the Holy Ghost imparted to you and exercised by us among you, as He enabled us to do: and this epistle is written in the fleshly tables of your hearts; that is, in your hearts made soft, pliable, and ready to obey the word by the operation of the Holy Spirit, according to the promise, "I will take away the stony heart out of your flesh, and I will give you an heart of flesh," Ezek. xi. 19; xxxvi. 26. Dr. Whitby.

—— not in tables of stone,] As were the Ten Commandments. Dr. Whitby. By the comparison between the legal and Gospel dispensations, it appears that the Apostle's argument for vindicating his apostolical ministry in this chapter was levelled at their teachers of the Judaizing faction, and is continued on through the fourth and fifth chapters. Pyle.

tables of stone, but in fleshy tables of the heart.

4 And such trust have we through Christ to God-ward:

5 Not that we are sufficient of ourselves to think any thing as of ourselves; but our sufficiency is of God;

6 Who also hath made us able ministers of the new testament; not of the letter, but of the spirit: for the letter killeth, but the spirit ‖ giveth life.

‖ Or, quickeneth.

7 But if the ministration of death, written and engraven in stones, was glorious, so that the children of Israel could not stedfastly behold the face of Moses for the glory of his countenance; which glory was to be done away:

8 How shall not the ministration of the spirit be rather glorious?

9 For if the ministration of condemnation be glory, much more doth the ministration of righteousness exceed in glory.

Ann DOMINI 60.

10 For even that which was made glorious had no glory in this respect, by reason of the glory that excelleth.

11 For if that which was done away was glorious, much more that which remaineth is glorious.

12 Seeing then that we have such hope, we use great ‖ plainness of speech:

‖ Or, boldness.

13 And not as Moses, which put a vail over his face, that the children of Israel could not stedfastly look to the end of that which is abolished:

14 But their minds were blinded: for until this day remaineth the same vail untaken away in the reading of the old testament; which vail is done away in Christ.

15 But even unto this day, when Moses is read, the vail is upon their heart.

4. And such trust have we through Christ to God-ward:] That He will still thus efficaciously assist our ministry. From the experience of former success in his ministry, the Apostle encourages himself with the hope of God's blessing for his future success. Dr. Whitby, Burkitt.

5. Not that we are sufficient of ourselves &c.] This insufficiency, acknowledged by the Apostle in his own name and that of his fellow-workers in the propagation of the Gospel, manifestly relates to bringing men over to the faith by the force of human art and reasoning. An attempt, which, generally speaking, they of all men living were farthest from being qualified for; because visibly destitute both of those natural and acquired accomplishments, which are fittest to work such an effect. The defects therefore both of parts and study were to them abundantly supplied and compensated by such miraculous inspirations and powers, as are called with great propriety of speech "the demonstration of the Spirit," 1 Cor. ii. 4. These were operations accommodated to the circumstances of a religion as yet unsettled. But, though the condition of it, as now received and established, have rendered the continuance of them needless to succeeding ages; yet, wheresoever we see the same effect, it certainly proceeds from the same cause, though working in a manner less apparent and surprising. Dean Stanhope.

6. Who also hath made us able ministers &c.] It is He that animates and blesses our labours in propagating this new covenant, which does not only declare men's duty, but assist them in it. For the law, which did the former only, left men obnoxious to death; but the Gospel, which entitles them to the graces of God's good Spirit, does thereby entitle them to life eternal. Dean Stanhope.

It is evident from the whole of this chapter, that by "the letter" the Apostle understands the law "engraven in stones," ver. 3, 7; the law, as delivered by Moses, and as at first administered with an appearance of the glory of the Lord; and by "the Spirit," the Spirit of Christ, ver. 17, or the Holy Spirit, given to the Apostles, to enable them to preach the Gospel, and conferred on those who believed it. Dr. Whitby, Burkitt.

7. —the ministration of death,] This is an elliptical expression, which must be supplied by adding the words "of the testament" or 'covenant' from ver. 6, so as to make this sentence 'if the administration of the covenant of death,' &c. This ministration consisted in Moses' bringing down from the mount the tables, on which was written the covenant of the law, called here the covenant of death, because it subjected every sinner to death without mercy by its curse. Dr. Macknight.

——which glory was to be done away:] The glory of Moses' countenance ceasing after a while, or at his death; and the glory of the law ceasing also at the coming of Christ and the Gospel. Bp. Fell.

8. —the ministration of the spirit] That is, the office of preaching the Christian religion, called below, chap. v. 18, "the ministry of reconciliation," or the office, the purpose of which is, that men be reconciled. Schleusner. This ministry of the covenant of the Spirit consisted in the Apostles' publishing that covenant, and building the Christian church thereon, by the miracles which they wrought in confirmation of their preaching. Dr. Macknight.

The Apostle's argument is, that the perfect and unchangeable dispensation of the Christian religion being much more excellent than the imperfect and temporary dispensation of the law delivered by Moses, so the Christian ministry must be proportionably more honourable than the Mosaical. Pyle.

9. —the ministration of condemnation—the ministration of righteousness] That is, the ministry of the covenant, which brought condemnation on sinners; and the ministry of the covenant, which bringeth righteousness to believers. Dr. Macknight.

10. For even that which was made glorious &c.] That is, was made glorious at the first administration of it. Dr. Whitby. St. Paul here contends, that the glory and excellency of the law was so inferiour to that of the Gospel, as that the former was perfectly eclipsed by the surpassing brightness of this subsequent dispensation. The glory of the latter, he says, must needs exceed the glory of the former; both on account of its effects, which are more beneficial, and, ver. 11, on account of its duration: for "that is done away," but "this remaineth." Dean Stanhope.

12. Seeing then that we have such hope, &c.] The Apostle here draws an inference from the foregoing discourse: that seeing himself and the other Apostles had such hope that their ministry was thus glorious, they used great plainness, freedom, and boldness of speech in preaching and publishing the Gospel; and (ver. 13.) did not imitate Moses, the minister of the law, who put a vail over his face, which was a sign of the obscurity of the legal dispensation, and of the blindness of the Jews, who could not see the end and accomplishment of that ceremonial and typical administration, which was to be abolished by Christ and His Gospel. Burkitt.

14, 15. But their minds were blinded: &c.] As if he had said, Nor indeed do their posterity yet understand those types and prophecies of the Old Testament, which are no way to be perfectly apprehended and fulfilled, but as they relate to Jesus Christ. And by their obstinate disbelief of Him as their true Messiah, the vail is, as it were, still upon their minds; and they can no more understand the true intent of their law and Prophets, that are read to them every sabbath day, than they could see the face of Moses when he gave them the law. Pyle.

16. Nevertheless when it shall turn to the Lord, &c.] When Moses turned from the people to go into the tabernacle before the Lord, he took the vail from off his face, Exod. xxxiv. 34; whereby he received a new irradiation from the glory of the Lord. In allusion to that part of the history, and perhaps to shew its emblematical meaning, the Apostle told the Corinthians, that when the vailed heart of the Jews shall turn to the Lord Christ, when they shall believe the Gospel, the vail shall be taken from their heart; their prejudices shall be dispelled by the light which they shall receive from the Lord. Dr. Macknight. The word "it" means the Jewish nation; concerning which, the Apostle here plainly takes for granted that a time will come when it shall turn to the Lord, or be converted to the Christian faith; and so looking on Christ as the end of the law, and being enlightened by His Spirit, shall clearly discern the spiritual sense of the law, and the true meaning of their own prophecies concerning the Messiah. Dr. Whitby.

17. Now the Lord is that Spirit:] That is, Christ is that quickening and life-giving Spirit, who takes away the vail from off our hearts. Burkitt. The possessor, fountain, donor of that Spirit. Bp. Fell. "The Lord" is here said to be "the Spirit," as He is "the way, the life," John xiv. 6; "the resurrection and the life," xi. 25; namely, as being the Author and Giver of them. He it is who "baptizeth with the Spirit and fire," Matt. iii. 11; who giveth this good Spirit to all believers, and sends Him to them from the Father, John vii. 38, 39; xv. 26; xvi. 7. He is "the Lord," who ministers to His church all the gifts and operations of the Spirit; 1 Cor. xii. 5; Eph. iv. 8. Dr. Whitby.

——there is liberty.] Either the same with that freedom and "plainness of speech," mentioned ver. 12; or else freedom from the Jewish ceremonies. Pyle.

18. But we all, with open face &c.] As if he had said, And it is not with us as it was with the Jews; for they only saw the face of Moses shining through the vail, but received no impression from or derivation of His glory upon themselves: "but we all" under the Gospel "with open" and unvailed "face beholding as in a glass the glory of the Lord" Jesus, "are changed into the same image" with Him, &c. Dr. Whitby.

As the ancient mirrours were made of metal highly polished, it must necessarily happen that the person who looked on his image in them would have his face strongly illuminated by the reflected rays. To this circumstance the Apostle refers in the expressions, 'we are transformed into the same' resplendent 'image, from one degree of glory or splendour to another.' Parkhurst.

——the glory of the Lord,] All His truth, last will, and design, John i. 17, 18; all His attributes, sanctity, and righteousness, justice and mercy, meekness and patience; all His benefits to mankind, as well in their redemption as in their creation, &c. See John xiv. 7. Bp. Fell.

——even as by the Spirit of the Lord.] The same Spirit of Christ working in us an imitation of His purity here, and leading us to eternal glory hereafter. Dr. Hammond.

Chap. IV. This chapter, together with a considerable part of this Epistle, is in the way of apology: the Apostle vindicates in it his office and dignity from the prejudices, which either his sufferings in the dispensation of it, or the suggestions of his enemies, might have raised against him. He compares himself with his opponents, and without vanity or vain-glory prefers himself before them in point of fidelity and sincerity in the work of the ministry, as also in point of diligence in the service, to which he was in special mercy called. Burkitt.

Ver. 1. —as we have received mercy,] Or special favours from God in committing to us this ministry. Burkitt.

2. But have renounced the hidden things of dishonesty, &c.] As if he had said, In the performance of which office I scorn to make use of those private and unwarrantable practices that some of your new teachers have recourse to, in order to exalt themselves and depress me. I desire to recommend myself by nothing but the plainness and purity of my doctrine, which will stand the test both of God and of all well-disposed men. Pyle. The word, which we render "renounced," does not imply that the Apostle ever had any thing to do with these things. Dr. Doddridge.

3. But if our Gospel be hid, &c.] That is, be yet obscure, notwithstanding the plainness of our preaching, it is so only among obdurate obstinate unbelievers. Dr. Hammond.

4. —the god of this world] Satan is so called, not properly, but because the honour and homage of a god is challenged by him, and by a multitude of sinners given to him. He is called by our Saviour "the prince of this world," and by the Apostle "the ruler of the darkness of this world," because he ruleth over a great part of this world, and they are his subjects, or rather his slaves. Burkitt.

Though the devil hath no power of his own over us, we may give him as much as we will; and become slaves and vassals to him as long as we please. In this sense, his empire is very large: and on account of it the Scripture calls him the "prince of the power of the air," Eph. ii. 2; Col. i. 13; and in this passage even "the god of this world." For he was, and is still in great propriety of speech, the god of many heathen nations; who, instead of the righteous and good Maker of heaven and earth, worship deities of such vile and mischievous characters as we justly ascribe to the evil one. And even where faith in the true Deity is professed: yet pretended arts of magick, witchcraft, conjuring, fortune-telling, and such like wicked follies, approach more or less to the same crime. Indeed lies of all kind are peculiarly the works of him, who was a liar, as well as a murderer from the beginning. And other sins mentioned in Scripture, as more especially diabolical, are, pride, envy, malice, false accusations. Whosoever therefore allows himself in any of these things, "is of his father the devil, and the lusts of his father he doeth," John viii. 44. Abp. Secker.

——hath blinded the minds of them which believe not,] Satan blinds the understandings of men by the efficacy of divers lusts, which are bred up and nourished in their hearts. Burkitt.

Christ, who is the image of God, should shine unto them.

5 For we preach not ourselves, but Christ Jesus the Lord; and ourselves your servants for Jesus' sake.

6 For God, who commanded the light to shine out of darkness, hath shined in our hearts, to give the light of the knowledge of the glory of God in the face of Jesus Christ.

14 Knowing that he which raised up the Lord Jesus shall raise up us also by Jesus, and shall present us with you.

15 For all things are for your sakes, that the abundant grace might through the thanksgiving of many redound to the glory of God.

16 For which cause we faint not; but though our outward man perish, yet the inward man is renewed day by day.

—— Christ, who is the image of God,] He is so in two senses. 1st, His substantial and essential image, being God of God, very God of very God. Christ, considered with respect to His Divine nature, is the express image of His Father's person. 2dly, He is His image as Mediator, and with respect to the Gospel, in which He has given us glorious demonstrations of the power and wisdom, of the grace, the holiness, the mercy, and goodness of God. Burkitt. He seems to be styled so here in the latter sense. Dr. Whitby.

5. For we preach not ourselves,] As aiming at our own glory or profit in this work. Dr. Whitby. Not setting up myself for a head of a party for any private advantage, but preaching Jesus Christ, as the common Lord and head of all Christians. Pyle.

—— ourselves your servants for Jesus' sake.] Ministers under Christ, and ready to do any kind of services for your edification in His religion. Pyle. "Servants" to the souls of men, but not to their humours: "servants for Jesus' sake," or in order to the promoting of His honour and His church's interest. Burkitt.

6. — to give the light of the knowledge of the glory of God in the face of Jesus Christ.] Here seems to be an allusion to the shining of the face of Moses, after he had seen the glory of God. See Exod. xxxiii. 16, 19; xxxiv. 29, 30. This now, saith St. Paul, belongs to us Apostles; the glory of God shining more gloriously in the face or person of Jesus Christ, than ever it did in Moses; and we "beholding with open face the glory of the Lord," chap. iii. 20, whereas the children of Israel "could not steadfastly behold the glory of the face of Moses." Dr. Whitby.

7. But we have this treasure in earthen vessels,] That is, in bodies subject to be broken with continual pressures. Dr. Whitby. Here is probably an allusion to the ancient method of hiding treasures of money in earthen vessels or pots. Dr. Macknight.

—— that the excellency of the power may be of God,] That all the good success we have in our Apostleship may be imputed to Christ. Dr. Hammond.

8, 9. We are troubled on every side, &c.] The Apostle confirms his argument by a reference to that wonderful providence that attended him under all the difficulties of his ministry, not suffering him to despair or sink under the hardest calamities. Pyle. He appears to speak with peculiar regard to his own case, yet not so as to exclude that of his brethren, which undoubtedly very much resembled it. Compare 1 Cor. iv. 9. Dr. Doddridge.

The particular terms employed seem to have an allusion to the ancient customs in the Grecian games, before noticed on 1 Cor. ix. 24. Drs. Hammond and Whitby.

10. — the dying of the Lord Jesus,] That is, a representation of His sufferings. Dr. Wells. We suffer in the body the same persecution and affliction with Him. Dr. Macknight.

—— that the life also of Jesus might be made manifest in our body.] It being a certain demonstration that Christ is risen and still lives, that we, who persuade others to believe this, are enabled to do such mighty wonders in His name, and patiently and constantly to suffer such fiery trials by His grace. Dr. Whitby.

11. — are alway delivered unto death for Jesus' sake,] Dying daily, or standing in jeopardy of it every hour, whilst we are ministering the Gospel unto you, 1 Cor. xv. 30, 31. Dr. Whitby.

—— in our mortal flesh.] Which is still exposed to death by our enemies, but still preserved in life by the power of Christ. Dr. Whitby. The Apostle appears to be here assigning a reason why God exposed him and the rest continually to death; namely, that the power of God might be manifested in their preservation. Dr. Macknight.

12. So then death worketh in us, &c.] That is, the preaching of the Gospel exposes us to death, but unto you it brings eternal life. Burkitt.

13. We having the same spirit of faith, &c.] As if he had said, For our courage and constancy under these sufferings is founded upon the same principle with that of the Psalmist; namely, a religious and solid faith in the truth and power of God. Pyle. See Ps. cxvi. 3, 9, 10. The words are here applied by the Apostle in a spiritual sense to the resurrection, thus: As David, notwithstanding Saul's persecution of him, believed he should be preserved and raised to a temporal kingdom; so we Apostles believe, that, after all our sufferings for the Gospel, we shall be raised and advanced to an heavenly kingdom. Dr. Whitby.

15. For all things are for your sakes, &c.] That is, For your good we preach and suffer all this, that your faith may be more confirmed, and that so the mercy of God, extending to more persons, may by their blessing God for it abound, and tend more to the glory of God. See chap. i. 11. Dr. Hammond.

16. — our outward man — the inward man] The former term signifies the body; the latter, the mind or spirit which is in man. Dr. Whitby. As if the Apostle had said, Though our body decay and languish, by reason of our many pressures and afflictions, yet our spirit daily gathers more strength and resolution. Bp. Hall.

God proportioneth comforts suitable to our afflictions, to preserve us from drooping, and to sustain our souls in the midst of our greatest sufferings. For, as the smallest temptation would foil us, if God should withhold from us His grace; but if He vouchsafe us the assistance of that, we are able to withstand the greatest; so the least afflictions would overwhelm our spirits, if He should withhold His comforts from us; but if He afford them to us, we are able to bear up under the greatest. The testimony of a good conscience from within, and the light of God's favourable countenance from above, put more true joy into the heart, than any outward thing can sorrow. And by these "our inward man" is so renewed and strengthened, that "yet we faint not," whatsoever becometh of "the outward man;" no, not though it should perish. David had troubles, multitude of troubles, troubles that touched him at the very heart: but the comforts of God in his soul gave him more refreshing than all those troubles could work him vexation, Ps. xciv. 19: and St. Paul found, that still as his sufferings increased, his comforts had withal such a proportionable rise, that where those abounded, these did rather superabound, chap. i. 4. Bp. Sanderson.

17. — a far more exceeding and eternal weight of glory;] It is hardly possible in any translation to express the force of this passage as it stands in the original. The Apostle, describing the happiness of the righteous in heaven, calls it, not "glory" simply, but "a weight of glory," in opposition to "our light affliction;" and "an eternal weight of glory," in opposition to our "affliction which is but for a moment;" and "a far more exceeding and eternal weight of glory," as beyond comparison greater than all the dazzling glories of riches, fame, power, pleasure, or any thing which can be procured in the present life. And after all, it is a glory yet to be revealed; it is not yet fully known. Dr. Macknight.

After the example of the Apostles, it is not only lawful, but laudable, in our actions and sufferings, to have respect to this recompense of reward, which is by the wisdom of the Holy Ghost propounded as our encouragement to do and suffer these things. Dr. Whitby. And such meditation well digested would work in us an holy indifference towards temporal things; it would moderate our esteem for them, our delight in them, our grief for the want and loss of them: and it would sweeten all those troubles and trials, all those sufferings and afflictions, which we meet with in our passage through time unto eternity. Burkitt.

Chap. V. The same argument continued. The prospect of future happiness, and the full assurance of it by the gifts of the Holy Spirit, animates the Apostle in his suffering for the Gospel; and makes him earnestly, though not impatiently, wish to be dissolved from the troubles of the present life. He justifies his behaviour against the Judaizing faction; answers their prejudices against him on account of his embracing the Gentile converts as equally a part of the Christian church with themselves; and proves the reasonableness of his so doing. Pyle.

Ver. 1. — our earthly house of this tabernacle] That is, our body, which is the tabernacle wherein our soul dwells here upon earth, as in its house. Dr. Wells.

—— a building of God, &c.] That is, a celestial body provided for us by God, wherein our soul shall likewise dwell as in an house, and which shall not, like houses made with hands, come at last to decay, but shall remain eternal in the heavens. Dr. Wells.

2. — desiring to be clothed upon with our house which is from heaven:] The Apostle represents the future bodies raised incorruptible, as clothed with an immortal covering, 1 Cor. xv. 53, 54. Dr. Whitby.

3. If so be that] "Being clothed," namely, at the resurrection, "we shall not be found naked," as the wicked, but clothed with a body not subject to death. Dr. Whitby.

4. — not for that we would be unclothed, but clothed upon, &c.] Not desiring to put off these bodies, to part with them finally, how weary soever we are; but desiring another sort of body and another sort of life, an eternal immutable life instead of that mortal one, subject to afflictions and even death itself, which we now live. Dr. Hammond.

5. Now he that hath wrought us for the selfsame thing &c.] He that hath appointed and prepared us for this glorious change, and hath filled our souls with a longing for this immortal state, is God; who hath also given us by His Spirit those holy affections, fervent desires, and faithful endeavours, which are "the earnest" of heaven, before we enjoy it. Burkitt. See the note on chap. i. 22.

6. Therefore we are always confident,] Howsoever nature is ready to shrink at the thought of dissolution, yet we are confident always to undergo it cheerfully and resolutely. Bp. Hall.

—— whilst we are at home in the body, &c.] Knowing that our life is in this case a true pilgrimage, in that while we are present in this body of ours, we are absent from the Lord. We account indeed our body to be our home; but it is a short, uncertain, imperfect, and miserable home; heaven is our true home and country, as being our Father's house. Bp. Hall.

7. (For we walk by faith, not by sight:)] That is, we regulate our conduct by the hope and expectation of the invisible things of the world to come, not by the enjoyment of the visible things of this world. Dr. Wells.

As brute beasts live by sense, and men by reason, so a Christian, as such, lives by faith, which raiseth up his mind so far above all sensible objects, that they have little or no force or power at all over him: and this is that which distinguishes a Christian from all other men, that whilst others live by sense or sight, so as to be wholly taken up with the affairs of this life, and those sensible objects they meet with here below; he, that is a true Christian, a true disciple of the blessed Jesus, he lives by faith: as the Apostle here speaks in the name of all true Christians, "we walk," saith he, "by faith, not by sight." Bp. Beveridge.

14 For the love of Christ constraineth us; because we thus judge, that if one died for all, then were all dead:

15 And that he died for all, that they which live should not henceforth live unto themselves, but unto him which died for them, and rose again.

16 Wherefore henceforth know we no man after the flesh: yea, though we have known Christ after the flesh, yet now henceforth know we him no more.

17 Therefore if any man be in Christ, ‖ he is a new creature: [a] old things are passed away; behold, all things are become new.

‖ Or, let him be.

diate consequence of death, and "far better" than life, as well as from some other passages of Scripture, Luke xvi. 22, 25; xxiii. 43, it appears that the state of those, "who die in the Lord," is now a state, not of insensibility, but happiness: wherein they "are blessed," in "resting from their labours," Rev. xiv. 13; and doubtless "rejoice with joy unspeakable and full of glory," 1 Pet. i. 8, in the prospect of that completer felicity, which the righteous Judge of all will hereafter give them. Abp. Secker.

9. — whether present or absent,] Whether we live or die. Bp. Hall.

10. — may receive the things done in his body,] That is, the reward of the things. Dr. Wells. The belief of a future judgment being the strongest of all motives to induce men to strive earnestly to behave in such a manner as to be acceptable to God, the Apostle insists upon it particularly, as what animated him, and what should animate every person, to do his duty conscientiously. Dr. Macknight.

11. — we persuade men;] To a conscientious fear and obedience: and for us, we are careful to be approved of God in our sincerity and faithfulness to Him in our ministry; and I trust also, ye yourselves, in your own consciences, cannot but allow and give testimony thereof. Bp. Hall.

12. For we commend not ourselves again unto you, &c.] As if he had said, We commend not ourselves unto you upon our own account, but only to give you occasion to vindicate us, and to glory to others on our behalf, when need requires; that you may be able to answer the calumnies of the false apostles, who gloried much in outward appearance of piety and zeal, but not in purity of heart and upright intentions. Burkitt.

From this place, and several others in this Epistle, it cannot be doubted, but that his speaking well of himself had been objected to him as a fault. And in this lay his great difficulty how to deal with his people. If he answered nothing to what was talked of him, his silence might be interpreted guilt and confusion: if he defended himself, he was accused of vanity, self-commendation, and folly. Hence it is that he uses so many reasons to shew that his whole carriage was upon principles far above all worldly considerations: and tells them here, once for all, that the account he gives of himself, is only to furnish them who are his friends and adhered to him, with matter to justify themselves, in their esteem of him, and to reply to the contrary faction. Locke.

13. For whether we be beside ourselves,] As our opposers pretend. Dr. Wells. 'Beside myself,' that is, in speaking well of myself, in my own justification. He that observes what St. Paul says, chap. xi. 1, and 16—21; chap. xii. 6 and 11, will scarce doubt but that the speaking of himself as he did was by his enemies called glorying, and imputed to him as folly and madness. Locke.

—— it is to God:] It is for our fervent love to God and His Gospel. Bp. Hall.

14. For the love of Christ constraineth us;] Thus to promote His glory and to seek your good. Dr. Whitby.

—— if one died for all,] Thus St. Paul elsewhere teaches us, that Christ "gave Himself a ransom for all," 1 Tim. ii. 6; and St. John, that He was "a propitiation for the sins of the whole world," 1 John ii. 2. And this appears from its being said, that "the Word was made flesh," John i. 14; flesh, or man in general, as the word signifies when applied to men. It does not signify any one or more particular man; but mankind in general, the whole human nature; that which all men are of, who proceed from the first man Adam, in whom it was all contained. And so it is in "the Word made flesh," who is therefore called "the last Adam," 1 Cor. xv. 45; and "the second man," ver. 47; because next to the first, who had the whole manhood in him. Hence it is, that when the Word was made flesh, and died in it, "He died for all," and "for every man," Heb. ii. 9; because He died in that nature which is common to all and every man alike. So that all men and every man may now be saved by Him whom God sent into the world to be made flesh, "that whosoever believeth in Him should not perish but have everlasting life," John iii. 16. Bp. Beveridge.

—— then were all dead:] That is, obnoxious to eternal death, and condemned to it for sin. Drs. Whitby and Wells.

15. — that they which live] That is, by His death attain to a state of eternal life. Dr. Wells.

—— should not henceforth live unto themselves, &c.] Seeking only their own private advantage; but "should live unto Him," by employing their lives in promoting His Gospel and kingdom. Dr. Wells.

16. Wherefore henceforth know we no man after the flesh:] We regard no man in respect of any worldly advantages: "yea, though we have known Christ after the flesh," though we formerly before our conversion expected and desired the coming of the Messiah, as a temporal king, and hoped for advancement in His kingdom, "yet now henceforth know we Him" so "no more;" that is, now we serve Him out of no temporal ends, as knowing that His kingdom is not of this world. Drs. Wells and Whitby.

17. — be in Christ,] Truly a Christian. Dr. Wells. Be ingrafted into Christ by the Spirit of Christ received in his regeneration by baptism. See this more fully expressed, Rom. vi. 3. Bp. Fell.

—— old things are passed away;] His former affection to the things of this world, and his former designs to promote his worldly interest, are ceased. Drs. Whitby and Wells.

—— all things are become new.] He is become a new or quite different man in all these respects, setting his affection on things above, and pursuing his spiritual advantage. Dr. Wells.

19. — that God was in Christ,] United to Him, and manifesting Himself by Him. Dr. Doddridge.

20. Now then we are ambassadors for Christ,] This therefore is the nature of our present employment; to be, as our title of Apostles imports, proxies and negociators of Christ, we supplying the place of Christ on earth, and treating with men after the manner that Christ did when He was here. Dr. Hammond.

The character of the ministers of the Gospel is that of "ambassadours for Christ," which means "instead of Christ," as the same word is translated in the latter part of the verse. God sent His Son into the world, as the messenger of His covenant; the Person, by whom He notified His gracious promises, and the conditions of them to mankind. When He ceased to instruct them personally, His words to His Apostles were, "As the Father hath sent Me, even so send I you," John xx. 21. Nor did He send the twelve only, but gave to His church other pastors and teachers also, for "the work of the ministry, for the edifying of His body, till we all come unto the measure of the stature of the fulness of Christ," Eph. iv. 12, 13; and promised to be "with them alway even unto the end of the world," Matt. xxviii. 20. Such therefore the Apostles appointed in every city; deputed them to "work the work of the Lord as they themselves did," 1 Cor. xvi. 10; directed some of these to appoint others, as "feeders of the flock," under Christ "the chief Shepherd," 2 Tim. ii. 2, and 1 Pet. ii. 4; required them to "exhort and rebuke with all authority," Tit. ii. 15; and commanded Christians "to submit to them, as watchmen over their souls, who must give account," Heb. xiii. 17. Abp. Secker.

—— we pray you in Christ's stead, &c.] Whatever appears true to any man by his own reason, or to any Christian, by the word of God, he ought to observe, though no one reminded him of it. And whatever any one else proves to him, though absolutely unauthorized, he is bound to admit. But when God Himself, knowing man's need and yet unwillingness to be taught, hath expressly ordained a succession of persons to execute that employment: if either they neglect to give, or the people to receive instruction, it is a highly aggravated contempt of His authority, and of His mercy. "We have" indeed "this treasure in earthen vessels," 2 Cor. iv. 7: and too often add sins to our infirmities, by which we dishonour Him we represent, and shall bring down severe punishment on our own heads. But still as in temporal societies, officers, though bad and unfit men, must be duly obeyed, as far as their commission extends, in respect to the supreme power, under which they act; so in the spiritual one of the church, when you hear the truths of religion from the worst of us all, you are to receive them as the word of God, for such indeed they are, not as the word of men. And a message from Him deserves the utmost honour; let them who bring it deserve what they will. Abp. Secker.

—— be ye reconciled to God.] By due obedience to the precepts, and unfeigned belief in the truth, of the Gospel, as the terms of your reconciliation. Dr. Wells.

21. — to be sin for us,] That is, a sin-offering, or sacrifice for sin, as the word is continually used with application to the legal sacrifices: "that we might be made the righteousness of God in Him," might be justified by God, or made righteous in that manner which God hath ordained, through faith in Him. Dr. Whitby, Parkhurst. That, although we are not perfectly so in ourselves or actions, yet God might accept of us as righteous in Him, by virtue of that perfect obedience and righteousness which He performed in our nature and stead: who is therefore said to be our "righteousness," as well as our "sanctification," 1 Cor. i. 30: our sanctification to assist us in what we do, and our righteousness to make it acceptable to God, when it is done. But for both these purposes it is necessary that we actually believe in Him: for it is to our faith in Christ that the Scriptures all along ascribe, both our sanctification, and likewise the justification both of our persons and of our actions before God, Heb. xi. 6. Bp. Beveridge.

Chap. VI. This chapter, to which should be added the first verse of the following, consists of two parts. 1st, The Apostle says, that he had endeavoured to discharge his ministry with integrity, zeal, charity, and patience, in the midst of the afflictions and disgraces to which he had been exposed: and he conjures the Corinthians to make suitable returns to his great zeal and fervent love towards them. 2dly, He exhorts them to imitate his zeal and sincerity, by making a pure profession of Christianity, avoiding all intercourse with idolaters, either by marriage or by being present at their worship, and partaking of their feasts; and by becoming pure both in body and soul. Osterwald.

Ver. 1. — that ye receive not the grace of God in vain.] "The grace of God" in a general sense imports His affection and goodwill to men, and all those benefits which freely proceed from thence. In a more restrained sense it signifies the Gospel of Jesus Christ, the terms and privileges of which are the effect of God's infinite and undeserved goodness; and sometimes the inward workings of His Spirit in and with the minds of men. "The grace of God is received in vain," generally, when we do not entertain our blessings with thankfulness, nor use them with prudence, nor improve them to good purposes: specially, when the persons, to whom the Gospel is preached, do not act according to its precepts, "denying ungodliness and worldly lusts, and living soberly, righteously, and godly in this present world;" and when they do not attend to and comply with the suggestions and good motions, which the Spirit of God works in our minds. The Apostle is here speaking of the favour of God, dispensed by His ministers in the Gospel. Dean Stanhope.

3. Giving no offence in any thing, &c.] We contribute to your salvation, not by our doctrine only, but by example too; demeaning ourselves so as to give no just prejudice against our persons or our functions. Dean Stanhope.

4, 5. — in much patience, — in fasting;] That is, in constantly enduring all sorts of sufferings, and exercising all kinds of self-denial, for the Gospel's sake. Dr. Whitby.

6. — by knowledge,] By knowledge of the mysteries of God, or, as some explain it, by prudent carriage. Dean Stanhope.

—— by the Holy Ghost,] By the diligent and proper use of the various gifts of the Holy Spirit, for the real good and benefit of mankind. Pyle.

7. By the word of truth, &c.] By preaching the Gospel pure and uncorrupted; by the success and efficacy given by God to that preaching; by arming ourselves against all the temptations both of prosperity and of adversity. Dean Stanhope.

—— by the armour of righteousness on the right hand and on the left,] "Sword," Eph. vi. 17, and "shield," ver. 16: offensive and defensive, for the spiritual conquering of others, for the spiritual preserving of ourselves against men and evil angels. Bp. Fell.

8. By honour and dishonour,] Not moved from our duty by the different treatment we experience: not exalted when others speak well, nor discouraged when they speak ill of us. Dean Stanhope. The Apostle shewed a remarkable example of proper behaviour under "honour" at Lystra, when the priest of Jupiter was going to offer sacrifice to him as a god; and afterwards under "dishonour," when the people of Lystra, at the instigation of the Jews, stoned him as a magician, and left him for dead in the street. Dr. Macknight.

8, 9. — as deceivers, and yet true; As unknown, and yet well known;] Counted as deceivers, when yet we are most faithful dispensers of the truth of God; esteemed and looked on by some as if they knew us not, by others owned and valued. Dr. Hammond.

9. — as dying, and, behold, we live; &c.] We seem every day at the point of death, but still God preserves us. Our persecutions exercise us, but they do not destroy us. Dean Stanhope.

10. — alway rejoicing;] In the testimony of a good conscience, and in the spiritual comforts that we feel. Dr. Hammond, Dean Stanhope.

—— making many rich;] By conferring on multitudes that which is the true, the most valuable riches. Dr. Hammond.

—— possessing all things.] In contentedness of mind, Phil. iv. 18; in the favour of that God, who giveth all things richly to enjoy, 1 Tim. vi. 17; in Christ Jesus, who is all in all, Col. iii. 11; and in whom we are blessed with all spiritual blessings, Eph. i. 3; and in the promise to inherit all things, Rev. xxi. 7. Dr. Whitby.

11—13. O ye Corinthians, our mouth is opened unto you, &c.] These words are very pathetick, and expressive of St. Paul's most affectionate and ardent love towards the Corinthians, whom he had been the happy instrument of converting to Christianity. He tells them, "his mouth was open to them," to fill them with the treasures of Gospel-knowledge, and to express the good affections that he bore towards them; and "his heart enlarged" towards them in all affectionate love and holy desires of their good. If therefore they were straitened in affection towards him, it must be through mistakes and misapprehensions on their part. He therefore conjures them, in requital of his Christian and parental affection towards them, to bestow the same love upon him their spiritual father, which he had manifested to them his beloved children. Burkitt, Bp. Hall.

13. — a recompence in the same,] That is, in the same kind: the meaning is, shewing the same affection by way of recompense. Dr. Whitby.

14. Be ye not unequally yoked together with unbelievers:] As if the Apostle had said, Out of this tender love and care of mine I do advise and charge you, that ye do not make so unequal matches for yourselves, as to be joined in marriage with infidels. Bp. Hall.

By the law, animals of different kinds were not joined together in one yoke; see Deut. xxii. 10. But the phrase "unequally yoked" being used here to express the marriage of a believer with an infidel, it is perhaps an allusion to Lev. xix. 19. The Apostle's precept, besides prohibiting marriages with infidels, forbids also believers to contract friendships, or to enter into any kind of connexion with infidels, which requires much familiar intercourse, lest the believer should be tempted to join with the infidel in his wicked principles and practices. Dr. Macknight.

14—16. — for what fellowship — with idols?] The Apostle's meaning in these verses is, that righteousness and wickedness, light and darkness, Christ and the devil, the portion of believers and of unbelievers, the temple of God and the temple of idols, are not more inconsistent, than Christians and heathens are in their characters, inclinations, actions, and expectations. And therefore Christians should not of choice connect themselves intimately, by marriage or otherwise, with infidels, or wicked persons of any sort. See 1 Cor. v. 11, and the note. Dr. Macknight. Concerning "Belial," see the note on Deut. xiii. 13.

It is a general name for all the false gods, worshipped by the idolatrous Gentiles. Locke.

1 He proceedeth in exhorting them to purity of life, 2 and to bear him like affection as he doth to them. 3 Whereof lest he might seem to doubt, he declareth what comfort he took in his afflictions, by the report which Titus gave of their godly sorrow, which his former epistle had wrought in them, 13 and of their loving-kindness and obedience towards Titus, answerable to his former boastings of them.

HAVING therefore these promises, dearly beloved, let us cleanse ourselves from all filthiness of the flesh and spirit, perfecting holiness in the fear of God.

6 Nevertheless God, that comforteth those that are cast down, comforted us by the coming of Titus;

7 And not by his coming only, but by the consolation wherewith he was comforted in you, when he told us your earnest desire, your mourning, your fervent mind toward me; so that I rejoiced the more.

8 For though I made you sorry with a letter, I do not repent, though I did repent: for I perceive that the same epistle hath made you sorry, though it were but for a season.

17. Wherefore come out from among them, and be ye separate, &c.] See Isaiah, as cited in the margin. The Apostle argues, that as the privileges, conferred upon the Jews, obliged them to preserve themselves from all heathen conversation, and from the pollution of every unclean thing; much more highly must it oblige Christian people to separate from all impure and idolatrous worship. Pyle.

18. And will be a Father unto you, &c.] These words are not found exactly any where in the Old Testament. The passage which comes nearest to them, is 2 Sam. vii. 14, where speaking of David's seed, God said, "I will be His Father, and He shall be My Son." Now as that prophecy in its primary meaning related to Christ and His people, (see Heb. i. 5,) the promises contained in it were spoken to believers of all nations. Dr. Macknight.

What a powerful argument do these words minister to all Christians, to "cleanse themselves from all filthiness of flesh and spirit, perfecting holiness in the fear of God!" as they desire this Almighty Lord and Protector to be still present with them, and would avoid the dreadful woe which will certainly follow upon His departure, Hos. ix. 12; as they would have this God to be their God, which is a state of perfect bliss, for "blessed are the people, who have the Lord for their God;" as they would have Him stand to them in the relation of an heavenly Father, which relation secures to them the enjoyment of all blessings that they daily ask, Matt. vii. 11; lastly, as they desire to be "His sons and daughters," and by that glorious relation to be made "heirs of God, and joint-heirs with Christ," Rom. viii. 17, and to have "the Spirit of His Son in their hearts, crying, Abba, Father," Gal. iv. 6. Dr. Whitby.

Chap. VII. The first verse concludes the argument of the latter part of the foregoing chapter. The Apostle then desires the good opinion of their whole church: expresses his favourable thoughts and love toward them: and rejoices at their ready compliance with the orders of his former Epistle, and in the good effects it had on many of them as he understood by Titus, whose honourable reception among them gave him great satisfaction. Pyle.

This he did, as Locke observes, from modesty and from respect to the Corinthians. It has been supposed that the seven particulars, mentioned in this verse, are the characters of true repentance, and that they are to be found in every real penitent. But they seem rather to describe the repentance of different persons in different circumstances, according to the part they had respectively acted in the affair in question. *Drs. 12. —not for his cause &c.] Not so much for any particular man's cause, either the offender's or that of the party wronged. Bp. Hall. Or, not for any delight I took in punishing the incestuous offender, nor any partial kindness for the person injured; but from my sincere concern for the credit and good of your whole church. Pyle.

13. —in your comfort:] In those evidences and fruits of a true repentance, which you discovered, and which are matter of great comfort to you. Burkitt.

——because his spirit was refreshed by you all.] On observing your ready compliance with the directions in my former Epistle. Burkitt.

15. —how with fear and trembling ye received him.] With what reverence and awe of his ministry. Bp. Hall. Lest there should be found in you any thing that might offend him, or require my rod. Dr. Whitby.

Chap. VIII. The Apostle's design, in this and the following chapter, is to excite the Corinthians to a liberal contribution towards the poor saints in Jerusalem and Judea: and this he does by several arguments; namely, by the example of the Macedonians; by commendations of their former forwardness; by the example of Christ; and by the special benefits which would certainly redound to themselves in consequence. Burkitt.

Ver. 1. —we do you to wit of the grace of God] We make known to you the charitable contribution given in the churches of Macedonia, namely, Philippi, Thessalonica, Berea, &c.; to which they were excited by God's rich grace towards them. Charity is here called "the grace of God," because it is a gracious disposition wrought in the heart by God. Dr. Whitby, Burkitt.

2. How that in a great trial of affliction &c.] How they being very poor, and much afflicted, (Acts xvi. 20; xvii. 5, 13,) did notwithstanding, with great cheerfulness and joy, make a rich contribution towards the relief of their poor brethren in Judea. Dr. Whitby. By mentioning the poverty of the Macedonians, as the circumstance which enhanced their liberality, the Apostle in a very delicate manner intimated to the Corinthians, who were an opulent people, that it was their duty to equal, if not to exceed, the Macedonians, in the greatness of their gift, see ver. 14. From 1 Thess. ii. 14, it appears that the Christians in Thessalonica had been spoiled of their goods; so it is probable the Bereans must have been, Acts xvii. 13. In places of less note the disciples may have been few in number, and not opulent. Dr. Macknight.

3. —beyond their power] An animated expression, strongly descriptive of the generosity of the Macedonians. They were willing to give more than they were well able, considering the distresses under which they themselves laboured. Dr. Macknight.

us the fellowship of the ministering to the saints.

5 And this they did, not as we hoped, but first gave their own selves to the Lord, and unto us by the will of God.

6 Insomuch that we desired Titus, that as he had begun, so he would also finish in you the same grace also.

7 Therefore, as ye abound in every thing, in faith, and utterance, and knowledge, and in all diligence, and in your love to us, see that ye abound in this grace also.

8 I speak not by commandment, but by occasion of the forwardness of others, and to prove the sincerity of your love.

9 For ye know the grace of our Lord Jesus Christ, that, though he was rich, yet for your sakes he became poor, that ye through his poverty might be rich.

10 And herein I give my advice: for this is expedient for you, who have begun before, not only to do, but also to be †forward a year ago.

11 Now therefore perform the doing of it; that as there was a readiness to will, so there may be a performance also out of that which ye have.

12 For if there be first a willing mind, it is accepted according to that a man hath, and not according to that he hath not.

13 For I mean not that other men be eased, and ye burdened:

Anno DOMINI 60.

14 But by an equality, that now at this time your abundance may be a supply for their want, that their abundance also may be a supply for your want: that there may be equality:

15 As it is written, [a] He that had gathered much had nothing over; and he that had gathered little had no lack.

[a] Exod. 16. 18.

16 But thanks be to God, which put the same earnest care into the heart of Titus for you.

17 For indeed he accepted the exhortation; but being more forward, of his own accord he went unto you.

18 And we have sent with him the brother, whose praise is in the gospel throughout all the churches;

19 And not that only, but who was also chosen of the churches to travel with us with this ‖grace, which is administered by us to the glory of the same Lord, and declaration of your ready mind:

‖ Or, gift.

20 Avoiding this, that no man should blame us in this abundance which is administered by us:

21 Providing for honest things, not only in the sight of the Lord, but also in the sight of men.

5. And this they did, not as we hoped,] That is, far beyond our hope: first, giving themselves over to the Lord, and then, yielding themselves to be swayed and disposed of by our ministry, according to the will of God. Bp. Hall. By this surrender of themselves to the Apostle, to be employed in such services as he should think fit, it seems that the Macedonians were ready to assist the poor Christians as well with their persons as with their contributions. Burkitt.

6. Insomuch that we desired Titus, &c.] The Apostle says, that this noble example of the Macedonians put him upon ordering Titus, during his stay with the Corinthians, to use it as a proper argument for quickening and enlarging their collections for the same purpose. Pyle.

7. —in every thing,] In every other grace and virtue. Bp. Hall.

8. I speak not by commandment,] Because works of charity ought to be voluntary. Dr. Macknight.

——the sincerity of your love.] To Christ, by imitating Him in your love to the poor brethren. Dr. Wells.

9. —though he was rich, yet for your sakes he became poor,] These words are most naturally interpreted by the language of the same Apostle, Phil. ii. 7, 8. See the passage. If Christ thus emptied Himself of His glory, that we might be spiritually rich, it becomes us, in imitation of His great example, to part with our temporals in order to supply the exigencies of His needy and afflicted members. Dr. Whitby.

10. —for this is expedient for you,] It would not be for your credit, or the reputation of your bounty, to fall short of your former purpose. Dr. Hammond. The Apostle had exhorted them to this contribution in his former Epistle, chap. xvi. 2; and they in obedience to his directions had begun to lay up in store willingly this charity, which he now exhorts them to consummate. Dr. Whitby.

14. But by an equality,] That is, that Christian charity be managed by an equality. This is not to be understood, as if Divine Providence had ordained the making of all men equal in their portion of the good things of this life. But so far Christianity seems to require this equality, that we should not suffer others to lack the necessaries of this life, whilst we abound in them. Dr. Whitby, Burkitt.

15. As it is written, &c.] That in this your pilgrimage it may be, as it is written of the Israelites passing through the wilderness, &c. Dr. Wells.

16, 17. But thanks be to God, &c.] As if the Apostle had said, I thank God that Titus was as forward to move you to this good work as myself: for he did not barely yield to it at my request, but of his own accord was ready to come to you about it. Burkitt. It seems the Apostle did not desire Titus to go before him to Corinth, nor to be the bearer of his letter; but to exert himself in urging the collection, when he accompanied the Apostle to Corinth. Nevertheless, Titus being himself very earnest in the cause, proposed of his own accord to go before with the Apostle's second letter, that he might have an opportunity of exciting the Corinthians to finish their collections before the Apostle's arrival. Dr. Macknight.

18. —the brother, whose praise is in the gospel] All ancient interpreters suppose this to have been St. Luke, worthy of praise in all churches for the Gospel that he wrote. Dr. Whitby.

20. Avoiding this, &c.] The 19th verse should be read in a parenthesis: and the continued sense of the 18th and 20th verses will be, 'We have sent that brother—to avoid blame, &c.' Dr. Doddridge.

21. Providing for honest things, &c.] Providing for a good reputation before men, as well as for a good conscience before God. Dr. Hammond.

In business of the world, St. Paul was careful to "provide for honest things, not only in the sight of the Lord, but also in the sight of men." Hence he thought it not sufficient that to God

CHAP. IX.

1 He yieldeth the reason why, though he knew their forwardness, yet he sent Titus and his brethren beforehand. 6 And he proceedeth in stirring them up to a bountiful alms, as being but a kind of sowing of seed, 10 which shall return a great increase to them, 13 and occasion a great sacrifice of thanksgivings unto God.

FOR as touching the ministering to the saints, it is superfluous for me to write to you:

2 For I know the forwardness of your mind, for which I boast of you to them of Macedonia, that Achaia was ready a year ago; and your zeal hath provoked very many.

3 Yet have I sent the brethren, lest our boasting of you should be in vain in this behalf; that, as I said, ye may be ready:

4 Lest haply if they of Macedonia come with me, and find you unprepared, we (that we say not, ye) should be ashamed in this same confident boasting.

5 Therefore I thought it necessary to exhort the brethren, that they would go before unto you, and make up beforehand your † bounty, ‖ whereof ye had notice before, that the same might be ready, as a matter of bounty, and not as of covetousness.

alone should be manifest the integrity with which he would distribute the sums collected from the Gentile converts for the use of the afflicted brethren in Judea; but he was anxious also to remove from men all possibility of suspicion, that the contributions might perhaps be applied to his own use: he therefore recommended it to the churches that they should send with him Titus and Luke, who might be witnesses of his fidelity, ver. 19. The courting of popular favour by vicious compliances is indeed an act of degrading meanness; but concern for the reputation of probity, and regard for that general esteem which results from a virtuous character, are thought beneath the attention of none, but either the most profligate, or the most arrogant, of mankind. Bp. Huntingford.

22. — our brother,] This is by some thought to have been Apollos, who before was not disposed to go to them, 1 Cor. xvi. 12; but now upon St. Paul's confidence of their readiness to comply with his orders and directions, was prevailed upon to go to Corinth. Drs. Whitby and Wells.

Chap. IX. A continuation of the argument of the foregoing chapter.

Ver. 5. — and not as of covetousness.] Not as a niggardly gift, extorted from covetous persons. Dr. Wells. Because riches begat covetousness, the Apostle here arms the Corinthians, who were a very opulent people, against that vice. It may be here observed, that to give alms only out of shame, or to satisfy the importunity of others, rather than out of love and goodwill, is a symptom of a covetous temper. Dr. Whitby.

6. — He which soweth sparingly &c.] "To sow," in these words signifies to do good works, particularly works of charity; "to reap," to receive the reward, the future eternal reward of such works; and the Apostle elsewhere interprets himself to this sense, Gal. vi. 8. So that he here expressly asserts, that, as our sowing is more sparing or more liberal, so shall our reaping be also: the greater charity exercised by us in this world, the greater felicity and happiness attends us in the world to come. And so, on the contrary, the thinner our seeds of charity are sown here, the lesser will be our harvest of glory hereafter. Bp. Bull.

Against the false apostles, who disgraced the weakness of his person and bodily presence, he setteth out the spiritual might and authority, with which he is armed against all adversary powers, 7 assuring them that at his coming he will be found as mighty in word, as he is now in writing being absent, 12 and withal taxing them for reaching out themselves beyond their compass, and vaunting themselves into other men's labours.

14. And by their prayer for you, &c.] As if he had said, This charity of yours redounds even to the glory of God, both by occasioning many thanksgivings to God for the same, and also by occasioning their prayer for you. Dr. Wells.

—— which long after you] Or, have a great affection for you. Dr. Wells. In this passage the Apostle mentions four different fruits of almsgiving: the relief of the poor; thanksgivings to God from the poor for that relief; the honour done to God by good works; and the prayers of the poor for their benefactors, proceeding from gratitude and love. Dr. Macknight.

15. Thanks be unto God for his unspeakable gift.] That is, this admirable charity, by which God is so much glorified, the Gospel receives such credit, others are so much benefited, and you will be so plentifully rewarded by God. Dr. Whitby, Burkitt.

The exhortation to works of charity, which St. Paul addressed to the Corinthians in this and the preceding chapter, is extremely strong and affecting. The example of the Christians in Macedonia, who, notwithstanding they were themselves in very straitened circumstances, had contributed liberally towards the relief of the saints in Judea: the great love of the Lord Jesus Christ, who though He was rich, yet for their sakes became poor, that they through His poverty might be rich: God's acceptance of works of charity, not according to the greatness of what is bestowed, but according to the willingness with which it is bestowed: the reward which God will confer on beneficent men in the life to come, in proportion to the number and greatness of the good actions which they have performed in this life: His supplying them with a sufficiency of this world's goods for their own maintenance, and for enabling them to continue their good offices towards the indigent: His blessing their ordinary labour for that end: the joy which is occasioned to the poor, whose wants are relieved by the alms of the charitable: the thanksgivings which other good men will offer to God when they see works of this sort done, but especially thanksgivings to God from the poor, who are relieved in their straits by the charitable: their gratitude towards their benefactors, expressed in earnest prayers to God for their happiness: and the cordial union which is produced between the rich and the poor, by this intercourse of good offices: all these considerations are displayed in this excellent exhortation, with a tenderness and feeling, which nothing but a heart filled with goodness was capable of expressing.

With the above-mentioned affecting motives, which are suited to every ingenuous mind, the Apostle intermixed a variety of other incitements to works of charity, adapted to the particular circumstances of the Corinthian brethren, which therefore must have made a strong impression on them; so that upon the whole a benevolent disposition towards mankind will no where find so fine a model for an exhortation to works of charity, as is exhibited in these two excellent chapters. Dr. Macknight.

Chap. X. The remaining chapters of this Epistle are spent in confuting the suggestions of their false teachers, who yet stood out against the Apostle; and in endeavours to reduce them, both by threatenings and persuasions. He here upbraids them for undervaluing him, on account of the meanness of his personal appearance, without duly weighing the strength of his doctrine and writing: as also for their practice of running from one church to another: not for the sake of converting more people to the Christian faith, but to pervert such as were already converted by the true Apostles of Christ. Pyle.

Ver. 1. —beseech you by the meekness and gentleness of Christ,] St. Paul, thinking it fit to appear all severity, till he had by fair means reduced as many of the contrary party as he could to a full submission to his authority, begins here his discourse by conjuring them, by the meekness and gentleness of Christ, as an example, that might excuse his delay of exemplary punishment on the ringleaders and chief offenders, without giving them reason to think it was for want of power. Locke.

—— who in presence am base among you,] Whose presence, as my adversaries say, is mean and contemptible amongst you, however in my absence I take upon me to deal severely with you. Bp. Hall.

2. — that I may not be bold when I am present &c.] That at my coming I may not have occasion to exercise that severity, which I think myself obliged to exercise against some, who accuse me of weak behaviour in my Apostleship: now saying one thing, and then another, according to our carnal interests, chap. i. 17. Drs. Hammond and Whitby.

3. For though we walk in the flesh, &c.] Though I am but a man, and a mean one as to bodily appearance, I do not perform my Apostolical office by human policy and qualifications. Pyle.

4. (For the weapons of our warfare] That is, the means whereby we propagate and defend the Gospel, "are not carnal," as the excellency of speech or of human wisdom, &c.; but the miraculous gifts and powers of the Holy Ghost. Dr. Wells. The powerful weapons, of which the Apostle speaks, were the gifts of inspiration and miracles, the faculty of speaking all kinds of languages, and the ability of communicating miraculous powers and spiritual gifts to others. These mighty weapons he opposes in this verse to the fleshly or weak weapons of swords, and spears, and military engines, and cunning stratagems, and false speeches, with which the men of this world carry on their wars. Dr. Macknight.

—— to the pulling down of strong holds;)] That is, of whatever opposition is made to the Gospel. Dr. Wells. The original phrase denotes the beating down of fortresses by means of military engines. There is here perhaps an allusion to Josh. vi. 20. Dr. Macknight.

5. Casting down imaginations,] That is, all the disputings and reasonings of men's understandings against the Christian doctrine. Dr. Hammond. The Apostle does not mean the candid reasonings of those, who attentively considered the evidences of the Gospel, but the sophisms of the Greek philosophers, and the false reasonings of all who from bad dispositions opposed the Gospel by argument. These the Apostle overturned, not by forbidding men to use their reason, but by opposing to them the most con-high thing that exalteth itself against the knowledge of God, and bringing into captivity every thought to the obedience of Christ;

6 And having in a readiness to revenge all disobedience, when your obedience is fulfilled.

7 Do ye look on things after the outward appearance? If any man trust to himself that he is Christ's, let him of himself think this again, that, as he is Christ's, even so are we Christ's.

8 For though I should boast somewhat more of our authority, which the Lord hath given us for edification, and not for your destruction, I should not be ashamed:

9 That I may not seem as if I would terrify you by letters.

10 For his letters, say they, are weighty and powerful; but his bodily presence is weak, and his speech contemptible.

11 Let such an one think this, that, such as we are in word by letters when we are absent, such will we be also in deed when we are present.

12 For we dare not make ourselves of the number, or compare ourselves with some that commend themselves: but they measuring themselves by themselves, and comparing themselves among themselves, ‖ are not wise.

vincing arguments, drawn from the inspiration and miraculous powers, with which the preachers of the Gospel were endowed. Dr. Macknight.

—— and every high thing] The Apostle probably alludes to the turrets, raised on the top of a besieged city or fortress, from which the besieged annoyed their enemies. To these he compares the proud imaginations of the enemies of revelation, concerning the sufficiency of men's natural powers in all matters of religion and morality. But these imaginations the Apostles cast down by means of the spiritual weapons they made use of. Dr. Macknight.

—— and bringing into captivity every thought &c.] This likewise is a military term; but it is often applied to the mind, to represent the thraldom of the affections. See 2 Tim. iii. 6. The empty reasonings and foolish imaginations of the human mind being thrown down, every thought, which arises in it, is made as subservient to the obedience of Christ, as slaves are to the will of their lords. In this passage the Apostle with great energy describes the method, in which wicked men fortify themselves against the Gospel, raising as it were one barrier behind another, to obstruct its entrance into their minds. But when these are all thrown down, the Gospel is received, and Christ is obeyed implicitly; every thought and reasoning taking its direction from Him. Dr. Macknight.

6. —to revenge all disobedience,] To punish with severity those that remain refractory. Dr. Hammond. The Apostle's love for the Corinthians, whom he desired to spare, and the infirm state of their church, made him choose to defer the punishment of these offenders, till he had brought off the affections of the Corinthians from their false apostles, and made them more unanimous in their regards to him. Dr. Whitby.

7. —after the outward appearance?] Judging of me from my outward person, and the infirmities of my body. Dr. Whitby.

—— let him of himself think this again,] Let him consider; and by all those arguments, by which he will be able to conclude that he is the disciple or apostle of Christ, he will be able to conclude it of me also. Dr. Hammond.

8. —of our authority,] St. Paul seems to refer to the authority peculiar to the Apostles, of inflicting corporal punishments on refractory persons, and delivering them up to Satan: see the notes on 1 Cor. iv. 21; v. 5: which power none of these false teachers could pretend to. And this, saith he, the Lord hath given me for edification, and not for destruction, it being designed for "revenging men's disobedience," ver. 6; for the "saving of the spirit," 1 Cor. v. 5; and to teach men, by what they suffer, "not to blaspheme" the truth, 1 Tim. i. 20. Dr. Whitby.

10. —his bodily presence is weak,] This seems plainly to refer to what some of the ancients relate of St. Paul, that his stature was low, his body crooked, and his head bald. Dr. Whitby.

13. But we will not boast of things without our measure,] Or, beyond the province allotted to us. Dr. Wells.

—— but according to the measure of the rule] That is to say, the boundary of the province, in which the Apostle was sent by God to preach. Dr. Hammond.

—— a measure to reach even unto you.] The Apostle means, that, according to his Apostolical commission, he had come gradually preaching the Gospel to the several countries, till he reached Corinth. Pyle.

14. —in preaching the gospel of Christ:] In all countries as we went along. Dr. Wells. St. Paul, following his prescribed rule, preached in all the countries of the lesser Asia, beginning at Jerusalem. From Asia he passed into Macedonia, where he preached in many of the chief cities. Then he preached in Greece, and particularly at Athens; and at last came to Corinth in a regular course of preaching the Gospel, which had not been preached there before. Dr. Macknight.

15. —that we shall be enlarged by you according to our rule abundantly,] That your progress in Christianity will be so good as to enable me to keep my course on beyond your country, and convert still more people to the Gospel. Pyle.

16. —and not to boast in another man's line &c.] In this and the three preceding verses, the Apostle seems to advance himself above the false apostles in these things. 1st, That whereas they could shew no commission to preach to the Corinthians, no measure by which God had distributed the Corinthians to them, as their province, he could do so, ver. 13. 2dly, That whereas they only came to and perverted those churches, where the faith had been already preached, and so could only "boast of things made ready to their hands," ver. 16; he had still striven to "preach the Gospel, where Christ was not named, lest he should build upon another man's foundation," Rom. xv. 20. Dr. Whitby, Burkitt.

18. — whom the Lord commendeth.] By the gifts of the Holy Ghost vouchsafed to him, and by the power of Christ attending on him in his ministry. Drs. Wells and Whitby.

As the pride and vanity of the false apostles condemned in this chapter deserve our notice, so also do the great modesty and humility of St. Paul, the true Apostle of Jesus Christ. He represents his preaching of the Gospel as his spiritual exercise, or the running of a race; in which his zeal and activity are not more to be admired, than the constancy with which he adhered to his own province, the sphere which God had marked out for him. Whoever pretends to run beyond that line, doth "stretch himself beyond," and "boast without his measure." Dr. Hammond, Burkitt.

Chap. XI. To preserve the Corinthians in a good opinion of himself, and a just sense of his apostolical authority, against the suggestions of the false teachers, the Apostle enlarges upon one of their chief insinuations, namely, that of not taking maintenance of their church. He exposes their pride and subtilty, particularly of the judaizing part of them: compares himself with, and justly prefers himself to them, on all accounts; on his innumerable sufferings for Christ's religion, his unwearied labours in the church, his constant cares and fears for, his compassionate tenderness to all its members. Pyle.

Ver. 1. — in my folly:] Though the necessity, which lay on the Apostle thus to commend himself in vindication of his apostleship, made him free from folly in this matter, yet because self-commendation usually proceeds from vanity and folly, and they, who did not know the necessity of the case, would be apt to impute folly to him, he uses the word here; notwithstanding he says in ver. 16, 'Let no man think me a fool in this my boasting;' and chap. xii. 6, 'Though I did glory, I should not be a fool.' Dr. Whitby, Burkitt.

2. — for I have espoused you to one husband,] As the Jews say, that Moses espoused Israel to God in mount Sinai, when he made them enter into covenant with Him there; so the Apostle saith, by converting you to the Christian faith, I have espoused you to one husband, even Christ. Dr. Whitby, Burkitt.

3. — from the simplicity that is in Christ.] From that singleness of affection, which you ought to have towards Christ and the Gospel, without any regard to the law, so as to mix Judaism and Christianity together. Dr. Wells.

4. — another Jesus, — another spirit,] That is, a more true Messiah than we preach; a better and more powerful Spirit than ye have received from us. Bp. Hall.

—— ye might well bear with him.] And allow his pretensions of being a new and greater Apostle. Dr. Wells.

5. For I suppose I was not a whit behind &c.] But this you cannot say. For, not to compare myself with the deceivers, I may justly compare with the most eminent of the true Apostles, St. Peter, and St. James, and St. John. Pyle, Dr. Hammond.

6. — rude in speech,] The Apostle probably means, that his discourses were not composed with that art, which the Greeks shewed in the choice and arrangement of their words, and in the disposition of their periods. Neither were they delivered with those modulations of voice, and with those studied gestures, with which the Greeks set off their orations. Dr. Macknight.

That St. Paul was an eloquent and powerful speaker, see Acts xiv. 12, where he was called Mercury for it. See also Acts xxii. 1; xxiv. 10; xxvi. 2; xvii. 22. But not thinking fit in his ministry to use the Grecian artificial way in ostentation of his eloquence, that so the power of the Gospel might not seem to be placed in human wisdom, 1 Cor. ii. 4, 5; he was therefore contemned by the curious Greeks. Especially perhaps being liable to some solecisms and hebraisms in the Greek, being not his national language; as also being apt to make sudden transitions, as is seen in his Epistles, hereby becoming sometimes less intelligible. Bp. Fell.

7. Have I committed an offence in abasing myself] To work with my own hands for a maintenance, and neglecting the right of maintenance due to me, "that ye might be exalted" in spiritual riches, &c. Dr. Wells. St. Paul's enemies said, that his preaching the Gospel freely, or without reward, was a presumption that he knew himself to be no Apostle; or, if he was an Apostle, it shewed that he did not love the Corinthians. The first of these objections he had answered in his former Epistle, chap. ix. 3—19: the second he answers in this chapter, ver. 11—15, by assuring them, that his not demanding maintenance did not proceed from his not loving them, but that those teachers, who boasted of imitating him, in not receiving maintenance, might be obliged to leave off taking presents from their disciples in private. Dr. Macknight.

13 For such are false apostles, deceitful workers, transforming themselves into the apostles of Christ.

14 And no marvel; for Satan himself is transformed into an angel of light.

15 Therefore it is no great thing if his ministers also be transformed as the ministers of righteousness; whose end shall be according to their works.

16 I say again, Let no man think me a fool; if otherwise, yet as a fool ‖ receive me, that I may boast myself a little.

own hands, and earned his living, 1 Cor. iv. 12; ix. 6; so at others he received supplies from the Philippians, Phil. iv. 15, 16. Dr. Hammond.

12. —that wherein they glory, they may be found even as we.] It would seem that the false teachers at Corinth, in imitation of the Apostle, pretended to take nothing for their preaching, and boasted of their disinterestedness. Nevertheless on other pretences they received presents from their disciples in private, nay, extorted them; see ver. 20. Wherefore to put these impostors to shame, and to oblige them really to imitate him, the Apostle declared that he never had taken any thing, nor ever would take any thing, from the Corinthians, either in publick or in private, on any account whatsoever. Dr. Macknight.

13. —transforming themselves into the apostles of Christ.] Seeming to do as we do, or desiring to be thought equal to us in all things. Dr. Whitby. Counterfeiting the outward appearance of true Apostles. Dr. Wells.

14. —Satan himself is transformed into an angel of light.] Pretending to do the work of such angels, and to be a ministering spirit to them whom he intends to destroy. Dr. Whitby. In this manner it may be supposed that Satan transformed himself when he tempted our Lord in the wilderness; and in like manner also when he tempted Eve. Dr. Macknight.

15. —according to their works.] And not to their specious and hypocritical pretences, Phil. iii. 18. Dr. Whitby.

16. —as a fool receive me,] Or, "bear with me." Parkhurst. Let me for the time take the privilege and liberty of folly. Bp. Hall.

17. —I speak it not after the Lord, &c.] I am content that it appear, as spoken in a certain human, and, as ye may construe it, a vain and fond manner, and not as from the Lord: but if the occasion, namely, my own defence and the vindication of my apostleship from contempt, be well considered, it will be found that this boasting is both necessary and holy. Bp. Hall.

It is observable, how many apologies for, or seeming condemnations of, himself the Apostle makes, in giving way so far to the provocation of those, who spoke or thought dishonourably of him. Of this kind are his several expressions in ver. 21, 23, 30; chap. xii. 1, 11, with others to the same purpose. So cautiously does the Apostle behave himself in a point which he rightly understood to be so nice: and his example teaches us how careful we ought to be in warding off all the uncharitable constructions apt to be made of the most necessary and the most modest publication of our own conduct and deservings. Dean Stanhope.

18. —after the flesh,] In external privileges and outward advantages, particularly in being the natural seed of Abraham. Burkitt.

19. —ye suffer fools gladly, &c.] As if he had said, Nor can my seeming folly offend you, if you be indeed what you pretend: "for ye suffer fools gladly, seeing ye yourselves are wise" in your own conceits. Dr. Whitby. This is written in the highest strain of irony, as is plain from ver. 20, where he mentions in mockery their abject bearing of the contumelious and injurious behaviour of their false teacher, as an example of their wisdom in bearing. Dr. Macknight.

20. For ye suffer, if a man bring you into bondage, &c.] I well see that your wisdom, such as it is, hath made you very patient on other occasions; my emulous adversaries have wrought strangely upon you, and have sped well; you can be content that they should make slaves of you, and pillage you, and prey upon you at pleasure; that they should brag of themselves causelessly and unjustly; that they should smite and censure you as they list. Bp. Hall.

21. I speak as concerning reproach, &c.] I tell you these things to put you in mind how reproachfully you have been used by them; as indeed I have also been set at nought and vilified by them: though whatever cause any of them hath to think well of himself, I have as much cause as he. Dr. Hammond.

22. Are they Hebrews?] Speaking the Jewish language? So am I. "Are they Israelites," descended from beloved Jacob? "So am I. Are they the seed of Abraham," and not proselytes? "So am I." Burkitt.

23. Are they ministers of Christ? &c.] It is to be noticed here, that the Apostle proves the truth of his ministry and apostleship, not, as elsewhere, from the miracles and gifts of the Holy Ghost, which accompanied his preaching, but from his sufferings, as being things which these false apostles could not pretend to, Gal. v. 11; vi. 12; and so could not glory that they were like unto him in them, ver. 13. Dr. Whitby. From the following account it appears, that none of the heroes of antiquity, however vehemently actuated by the love of fame, or of military glory, or of power, either did or suffered as much in the pursuit of their objects, as the Apostle Paul did and suffered for Christ and His Gospel. Dr. Macknight.

1 For commending of his apostleship, though he might glory of his wonderful revelations, 9 yet he rather chooseth to glory of his infirmities, 11 blaming them for forcing him to this vain boasting. 14 He promiseth to come to them again: but yet altogether in the affection of a father, 20 although he feareth he shall to his grief find many offenders, and publick disorders there.

24. —forty stripes save one.] The greatest severity that the Jewish law permitted, Deut. xxv. 3. Dr. Hammond. See the note on Deut. xxv. 3.

25. Thrice was I beaten with rods,] A bundle of which was carried before the Roman consul: so that the punishment here alluded to was probably inflicted by the Romans. Dr. Hammond.

——thrice I suffered shipwreck,] Of these shipwrecks, nothing is mentioned in the Acts. For, as this Epistle was written before the Apostle was sent a prisoner to Rome, his shipwreck on the island of Melita was not one of the three here alluded to. Dr. Macknight.

——a night and a day I have been in the deep;] Probably in one of his shipwrecks he was tossed to and fro in the sea for this space of time, on some broken piece of a ship. Bp. Fell, Dr. Whitby.

26. —in the wilderness,] That is, in the country, as opposed to "the city," or town: so called on account of the comparatively small number of the inhabitants. Dr. Wells.

28. Beside those things that are without, &c.] Nor are these outward and bodily inconveniences the whole of my Christian sufferings; still greater and more constant are the inward cares, the jealousies and fears I have for all the churches I have planted. Pyle. This is very properly mentioned among the Apostle's sufferings, because it was not one of the least of them; as we may judge from the account which he has given in these two Epistles, of the exceeding grief which the errours and irregularities of the single church of Corinth occasioned to him: "Within were fears," chap. vii. 5. Besides, the brethren of all the Gentile churches had recourse to the Apostle in their difficulties for advice and consolation, which must have been very fatiguing to him. Dr. Macknight.

29. Who is weak, and I am not weak? &c.] Among all these no person is afflicted but I sympathize with him: none is discouraged in his duty, or in danger of falling off from his principles, but I ever burn with zeal to bring him back and settle him. Dean Stanhope.

30. —mine infirmities.] That is, my sufferings for the Gospel. Dr. Wells.

Much instruction may be gathered from the subject which St. Paul here chooses to enlarge upon: not the greatness of his miracles; not the power of his eloquence and arguments; not the success of his labours, the number of the converts he had won, or of the churches he had planted: but only the toils and hardships, the persecutions and afflictions, in which the discharge of his ministry had engaged him. These were such privileges as his adversaries neither had, nor desired to have, to boast of. These also it was so far from vanity to glory in, that the Apostle found it requisite to subjoin his being honoured with extraordinary visions and revelations, to prevent so great a degree, so constant a succession, of sufferings from being turned into an argument of God's displeasure against one so incessantly exercised with them. And yet these afflictions were really the properest and most worthy matter of glorying to the Apostle. The properest, because it was perfectly free from all vanity or self-seeking; for his were not sufferings, either industriously courted, or magnified to be an occasion of gain: and the most worthy, because to all, who duly considered them, they were proofs of large measures of grace supporting him under them; of unparalleled sincerity and zeal, disposing him so cheerfully to persevere in encountering them; and of the truth of that doctrine, which by the ministry of one so ill-treated, could yet gain so much ground, and triumph over all opposition. Dean Stanhope.

31. —which is blessed for evermore,] A doxology, or some term of honour, usually annexed by the Jews at the naming of God, not unfrequent with the Apostle: as also this title, "Father of our Lord Jesus Christ," is often used by him in glorifying God. Bp. Fell.

Chap. XII. To weigh down still more the disparagement which the false teachers had cast upon him, the Apostle further prefers himself to them, on account of the special revelations that God had vouchsafed to make him; but instances chiefly in one. He is not puffed up into pride by these great favours and privileges. God had provided him a natural remedy against such an abuse of them, namely, "a thorn in the flesh," his bodily infirmities, wherewith his wicked adversaries reproached and mortified him. Yet he glories in these Divine revelations as manifest proofs of a true Apostleship; touches again upon his prudent resolution not to take maintenance from their church; confutes the groundless insinuation of his adversaries, that he made private gains of them, though he apparently refused to take any thing of them; expresses again his tenderness toward them, and wishes he may find no necessity of punishing their obstinacy at his next visit to their church. Pyle.

Ver. 1. It is not expedient for me doubtless to glory.] But since it may be so to you, "I will come to visions and revelations of the Lord," in which I shall give such an evidence of the favour of Christ to me, such a testimony of my mission from heaven, as none of these "false apostles" or "deceitful workers" can pretend to. Dr. Whitby, Burkitt.

2. I knew a man in Christ] That is, a man transported above himself by the Spirit of Christ. Dr. Hammond, Burkitt. Or, a Christian. Dr. Wells. That the Apostle is speaking of himself here, is evident from the whole article, (Dr. Doddridge,) especially from verses 6, 7. Dr. Macknight.

——about fourteen years ago,] The Apostle having never spoken of his rapture till now, though it happened fourteen years before, the Corinthians might be sensible how little he was disposed to speak vauntingly of himself, and that they themselves had constrained him to mention it on this occasion; see ver. 11. Dr. Macknight.

——(whether in the body, I cannot tell; or whether out of the body, I cannot tell:] That is, I am not able to say, whether I were bodily removed, and carried to the third heaven, the place of God's glorious residence; or whether only in a vision such representations were made to me remaining upon the earth. Dr. Hammond.

——caught up] Philip the Evangelist was by the Spirit caught away in the body from the Ethiopian eunuch, who saw him no more; but Philip was found in Azotus. This therefore was a rapture of a man "in the body," Acts viii. 39, 40. Ezekiel was "lift up by the Spirit between the earth and the heaven, and brought to Jerusalem:" but it was "in the visions of God," Ezek. viii. 3. The Apostle could not tell in which of these ways he was caught up. Dr. Macknight.

——to the third heaven.] In the language of the Jews, the first heaven is the region of the air, where the birds fly: the second heaven is that part of space where the stars are: "the third heaven" is the seat of God and of the holy angels, into which Christ ascended after His resurrection, but which is not the object of men's senses, as the other heavens are. Dr. Macknight.

4. How that he was caught up into paradise,] And had a foretaste of the blessed state of faithful souls between death and the resurrection. For such is the sense of "paradise" in the New Testament. Parkhurst.

——which it is not lawful for a man to utter.] Or, 'it is not possible,' as the word often signifies: not so much unlawful by any Divine command, as impossible to be expressed in human language, being perfectly divine and heavenly things. Pyle.

5. Of such an one will I glory: &c.] I will not, out of modesty, tell you that I was the man; but of such a man you will give me leave to glory: as for myself, when my name comes into mention, ye shall not hear me glory in any thing but in mine infirmities. Bp. Hall.

6.—but now I forbear, lest any man should think of me &c.] But I will say no more of this subject, for I desire not to put men into any other opinion of me, than what they have from those more visible evidences, my ordinary constant actions or words. Dr. Hammond.

Here is seen the humility of this great Apostle, both in concealing formerly such extraordinary favours, and now, not without some difficulty and disguise, mentioning them; when, for a defence of the Gospel, in a manner constrained thereto: content only with such a fame as his outward actions and deportment in serving his master Christ could no way avoid, though these were sprinkled also with several infirmities; see 1 Cor. ii. 3. Bp. Fell.

7.—a thorn in the flesh, the messenger of Satan] By this in all probability is to be understood some bodily disease, sickness, or infirmity, which was visible, and so exposed St. Paul to contempt; and which was supernatural, or not arising from a natural cause, but inflicted on him with God's permission by Satan. Bp. Bull, Dr. Wells.

What this "thorn in the flesh" was in particular, St. Paul having thought fit to conceal, it is not easy for those who come after to discover, nor is it very material. Locke.

8.—I besought the Lord &c.] That is, the Lord Jesus, as appears from the two next verses. Here is an instance of prayer directed to Christ, and therefore here is a proof of Christ's divinity: prayer made to Christ by all Christians, at all times, in all places, and for all things, is an evidence of His omniscience, omnipotence, and omnipresence; and consequently of His being truly and essentially God. Burkitt, Dr. Whitby.

9.—My grace is sufficient for thee:] Our Saviour, Jesus Christ, whom it appears from the context that St. Paul besought, spake to His Apostle, and gave him this kind answer, "My grace is sufficient for thee," &c. As if He had said, Be patient and contented; it is enough that I love thee, that I am always with thee to assist thee in the performance of thy office and ministry. Thy weakness and infirmities shall not hinder thee from being a successful preacher of the Gospel; and then these very imperfections will shew forth my power, and prove to the world, that by the most incompetent and unpromising means and instruments I am able to bring about the good of My church, and the establishment of My kingdom. Dr. Jortin. It is here to be observed, that though this "thorn in the flesh" was not removed upon the prayer of the Apostle, yet the thing, for which he desired its removal, was granted; namely, that he should preach the Gospel more effectually, and to the honour of his Lord. And therefore he not only rests satisfied under this infirmity, but even glories in it on this account, that it tended to demonstrate the power of Christ residing in him. Thus doth God truly answer our requests, when He gives us not what we would, but what He sees will be more for His glory and our good. Dr. Whitby.

This example of prayer rejected ought to be well attended to by all good men; because it shews, that they neither should be discouraged, when their most earnest prayers seem to be disregarded, nor discontented when they are rejected: because in both cases their good is designed and effectually promoted. Dr. Macknight.

Perhaps it is the case with some of us, that we labour under some painful or troublesome infirmity of body, or else are pressed with some other grievous outward affliction, which we have used all means within our power to be rid of, and often with earnestness prayed unto God to be delivered from, and yet still remain under the same calamity. If this be our case, let us not be dismayed or cast down, but remember, that the great Apostle's

10 Therefore I take pleasure in infirmities, in reproaches, in necessities, in persecutions, in distresses for Christ's sake: for when I am weak, then am I strong.

11 I am become a fool in glorying; ye have compelled me: for I ought to have been commended of you: for in nothing am I behind the very chiefest apostles, though I be nothing.

12 Truly the signs of an apostle were wrought among you in all patience, in signs, and wonders, and mighty deeds.

13 For what is it wherein ye were inferior to other churches, except it be that I myself was not burdensome to you? forgive me this wrong.

condition was much the same as ours; and, provided we be true and faithful servants of God, as St. Paul was, (though not in so eminent a degree as he was,) let us, I say, be assured that the words of God, "My grace is sufficient for thee, for My strength is made perfect in weakness," are as certainly spoken to every one of us, as ever they were to him. And indeed there is a general promise of God of the same import, delivered by the same Apostle to all true Christians, 1 Cor. x. 13; "God is faithful, who will not suffer you to be tempted above that ye are able; but will with the temptation also make a way to escape, that ye may be able to bear it." Wherefore let us comfort one another with these words. Bp. Bull.

——for my strength is made perfect in weakness.] Not as if our weakness added any thing to God's power, but it renders His power more signal and conspicuous. Burkitt.

——that the power of Christ may rest upon me.] I glory in my infirmities, as more conspicuous demonstrations of those divine endowments which Christ has conferred on me. Pyle.

When we consider the infirmities of St. Paul, together with his innumerable toils and sufferings, we cannot account it less than a miracle that he was able for so long a time to do what he did, and to bear what he underwent; so that his bodily weakness, instead of being an objection to his character, afforded a proof to all who knew him, that he must have been supported by a Divine power in an extraordinary manner. Dr. Jortin.

10.—when I am weak, then am I strong.] In time of afflictions the strength of Christ is more eminently visible in me: the heavier the pressures are, the greater supports I have from Him. Dr. Hammond.

11.—though I be nothing.] As my enemies account me through envy, and as I account myself in humility. Burkitt.

14. Behold, the third time I am ready to come to you;] His meaning probably is this: I have once actually been with you; I was ready to come a second time, though your disorders hindered that journey, chap. i. 23; and I am now ready the third time. Dr. Whitby.

——for the children &c.] I look upon you as my spiritual children, and shall provide for you, without expecting any thing from you. Pyle.

15.—I will very gladly spend and be spent for you;] I am free to bestow all my instructions on you, nay, to lay out all my strength in labours for your good. Pyle.

16. But be it so, &c.] The Apostle here answers an unfounded objection, that though he was not burdensome to the Corinthians himself, he craftily sent to them others, whom he employed to procure money for him. He therefore appeals to themselves, whether any person, he ever sent to them, received any thing of them for his use. Burkitt.

18.—and with him I sent a brother.] Who that brother was is not known. Dr. Macknight.

19—21. Again, think ye that we excuse ourselves unto you? &c.] As if he had said, Think not that I excuse myself so often for deferring my promised journey, from any sinister purposes of my own. It is your benefit and reformation that I aim at. For verily I fear, whenever I come, I shall find those sins not repented of by many of you, which will be matter of humiliation, sorrow, and lamentation to me; and that I must be compelled, contrary to my inclinations, to inflict censures and corporal punishments on many of you, for the schisms, debates, and strifes of some, and for the uncleanness, fornication, and lasciviousness of others. Burkitt.

Chap. XIII. The Apostle threatens to punish his obstinate opposers, at his next coming amongst them. In the mean time, he exhorts them earnestly to a reformation, and professes he should be right glad to find no occasion to show the power he has to vindicate himself, and punish them. The salutations, and conclusion. Pyle.

Ver. 1. This is the third time I am coming to you.] See the note on chap. xii. 14. The Apostle seems here to resume the sentence, which he had before begun. Such interruptions are frequent in St. Paul and in many other writers, who have not a regard to an artificial style, and do not stand to correct every little inaccuracy, but abound in quickness and variety of thought, as Locke justly observes. Dr. Doddridge.

—— In the mouth of two or three witnesses &c.] Dr. Lightfoot says, that those three witnesses were Stephanus, Fortunatus, and Achaicus, sent to assure the Corinthians of his coming. Others say that he speaks of his own reiterated testimony to them by letters, that if these admonitions did not prevail on those who had sinned to reform, he would not spare them. Dr. Whitby. Or the words mean, that as several cases would be brought before the Apostle on his arrival, on which it would be necessary for him to give his judgment, he would proceed on that reasonable maxim in the Jewish constitution, (see Deut. xvii. 6; xix. 15;) that every word or thing, admitted for evidence in the decision, should be established by the concurrence of two or three credible witnesses. Dr. Doddridge.

2. — I will not spare:] It is a great confirmation of the veracity of the Apostles, that when factions were raised against them, they used none of the arts of flattery, however necessary they might seem; but depended on the force of a miraculous power to reduce offenders; which it would have been a most absurd thing to have pretended to, if they had not been really conscious to themselves that it was engaged in their favour. Bp. Burnett.

3. — which to you-ward is not weak, but is mighty in you.] Christ shewed His power among them, by enabling St. Paul to preach the Gospel to them "in demonstration of the Spirit and of power," so efficaciously as to convert them to the faith, 1 Cor. ii. 4: by that variety of gifts conferred on them together with the Gospel, by which their "testimony of Christ was confirmed," 1 Cor. i. 6; by His power, conspicuous in seconding St. Paul's delivery of the incestuous person up to Satan, 1 Cor. v. 4, 5: and by the chastisements they suffered for communicating in the Lord's supper unworthily. Dr. Whitby.

4. For though he was crucified through weakness,] For as Christ appeared to be a weak and frail man in being crucified. Dr. Hammond.

—— For we also are weak in him, &c.] So I also may appear weak, and a mere ordinary man, fit to be despised and contemned by you, but yet I shall shew that I am an Apostle of Christ, armed with power from God, which I have already evidenced by preaching and miracles, and shall evidence further by censures upon the contumacious among you. Dr. Hammond.

5. Examine yourselves, whether ye be in the faith; prove your own selves.] That is, consider your condition impartially and thoroughly; try it by the rules of the Gospel; satisfy yourselves once for all, whether ye be true believers, such as God will accept. If you find that you are, resolve by His grace to continue such to your lives' end; if you find you are not, resolve to make yourselves such as soon as possible: for nothing can be of more moment to you, than this knowledge and these resolutions. Bp. Atterbury.

—— how that Jesus Christ is in you,] That is, with or among you. The words seem to allude to those spoken by the rebellious Israelites, who, after all the signs and wonders that God had shewed to them, still doubtingly inquired, "Is the Lord among us or not?" Exod. xvii. 7. So saith the Apostle: Seeing after all the miracles done among you, and the miraculous gifts received by you, you still seek a proof of Christ speaking in or by me, ask your own selves; know ye not by the gifts exercised among you, except ye be disapproved and rejected of God, that His Spirit, conveyed by my ministry, is still among you? The text speaks of Christ's being in them by His miraculous presence; and of His being, not in any private person, but in the church of Corinth in general. Drs. Whitby and Hammond.

6. — that we are not reprobates.] That is, not disapproved of by Christ, but abundantly owned by Him. Drs. Hammond and Whitby. See the note from Parkhurst on Rom. i. 28.

7. Now I pray to God that ye do no evil; &c.] The Apostle implores Almighty God, that the Corinthians might be found not doing any evil, which might expose them to his censure, and force him to exercise his apostolical power in punishing offenders. And he prayed thus, because he had rather have them good, than, by punishing their evil manners, have an occasion to testify himself to be an approved Apostle. Burkitt.

—— though we be as reprobates.] That is, as destitute of the power of Christ in your eyes. Dr. Whitby. Whatsoever opinion you may have of me. Dr. Hammond.

8. For we can do nothing against the truth, but for the truth.] The Apostle, assuring the Corinthians that, if they "did no evil," they would be secure from his censure and chastisements, here assigns the reason for that assurance; signifying that his power was given to him "for edification (only,) and not for destruction," ver. 10. Burkitt.

9. — when we are weak,] As having no occasion to manifest our power, "and ye are strong" in faith and good works. Dr. Whitby.

—— your perfection.] Your reformation, or restoration to a perfect or right state. The word seems particularly to refer to their being reunited in mind; compare ver. 11. Parkhurst.

11. — Be perfect, &c.] Be ye careful to keep together in the united profession of the same faith; and, if there fall out any thing cross among you, support it cheerfully, be all mutually kind and peaceable, without any divisions or schisms among you, and that is the way to have that God, who so much values, and so strictly commands, love and peace among all, to be for ever among you with His grace. Dr. Hammond.

Such are the conditions, upon the performance of which we may hope for the presence of God in the midst of us. He, who "maketh men to be of one mind in a house," delighteth to dwell in the house, where they are so. The spirit of discord resides in the world, that scene of confusion, that mystick Babel. Jerusalem is a city at unity in itself; and is therefore the habitation of "the Prince of Peace." Bp. Horne.

14. The grace of the Lord Jesus Christ, &c.] We have here plainly, as in the form of baptism, Matt. xxviii. 19, the names of the sacred Trinity; and the Father and Son being mentioned in both places as distinct Persons, we have no reason to doubt of the personality of the Holy Ghost thus mentioned with them. The words contain a prayer for the highest blessings and benefits, of which the Corinthians could possibly be made partakers: all that love which doth or can flow from the Father; all that grace which was purchased by the Son; and all that fellowship and communion with the Holy Spirit, and communication from Him, which might render them meet for the service of Christ on earth, and for the full and final enjoyment of Him in heaven. Dr. Whitby, Burkitt.

Here three great blessings are wished to the Corinthians, as from three fountains, which imports that they are three different Persons, and yet equal; for though in order the Father is first, and is generally put first; yet here Christ is first named, which seems to be a strange reversing of things, if they are not equal as to their essence or substance. It is true, the second is not named here, "the Father," as elsewhere, but only "God;" yet since He is mentioned as distinct from Christ and the Holy Ghost, it must be understood of the Father; for when the Father is named with Christ, sometimes He is called God simply, and sometimes "God the Father." Bp. Burnet.

—— the communion of the Holy Ghost,] That is, the communication of His blessings: certainly meaning, not a benefit peculiar to a few in the primitive days, but an influence from the blessed Spirit on the soul, of which every true believer in every age might partake. Abp. Secker.

The meaning of the whole passage is, that the Apostle prays for the Corinthians to enjoy, 1st, the grace of God the Son; that is, all the mercy, which He, as the Redeemer of mankind, had purchased for them with His blood: 2dly, the love of God the Father; that is, all the favours, which He, as the supreme Governour of the world, could shew them: and 3dly, the communion of God the Holy Ghost; that is, all the gifts, graces, and comforts, which He could communicate unto them, both from the Father and the Son. Or, in short, that they might have all things, which God the Son, or God the Father, or God the Holy Ghost, could do for them, according to their several ways of working in the world: that is, all things which could any way contribute to make them completely happy. Hence we may learn, how necessary it is to believe in the most blessed Trinity, the Father, the Son, and the Holy Ghost, three Persons, one God; seeing they are all pleased to concern themselves so much about us, and our happiness depends upon them all. Hence we may learn to confide and trust on all and every one of these Divine Persons, for all things relating to our happiness and salvation. Hence we may learn, what infinite cause we have to praise and adore God for His infinite goodness to us poor mortals upon earth, and to sing with the choir of heaven, "Holy, Holy, Holy is the Lord of hosts, the whole earth is full of His glory," Isai. vi. 3. Hence we may learn, how much we are obliged to serve, and love, and please God the Father, God the Son, and God the Holy Ghost, who is thus infinitely gracious, and loving, and bountiful unto us. Hence we may learn, what great reason our Church hath to appoint, that at the end of every Psalm, as well as upon other occasions, we should say or sing, "Glory be to the Father, and to the Son, and to the Holy Ghost." Hence lastly, we may learn wherefore our Church concludes her daily prayers, as the Apostle doth this Epistle, with these words, even because they contain in short all that we can pray for, and are in effect the same form, which God Himself prescribed, wherewith the priests should bless the people: "On this wise," saith He, "ye shall bless the children of Israel: The Lord bless thee, and keep thee; the Lord make His face to shine upon thee, and be gracious unto thee; the Lord lift up His countenance upon thee, and give thee peace," Numb. vi. 24—26; see the note there. Bp. Beveridge.

THE EPISTLE OF PAUL THE APOSTLE

TO THE GALATIANS.

INTRODUCTION.

THE country of Galatia was part of Asia Minor, and derived its name from the Gauls, who, about 240 years before Christ, took possession of it by force of arms, and settled there. There is a great difference of opinion among the learned concerning the date of this Epistle, some supposing that it was written as early as the year 52, and others, as late as the year 58. There is, however, an expression in the beginning, which appears to fix its date with a considerable degree of probability: "I marvel," says the Apostle, "that ye are so soon removed from Him that called you into the grace of Christ unto another Gospel." This passage seems to prove, that the Epistle was written soon after the Galatians were converted to Christianity. From the history of St. Paul it appears, that he preached in Galatia in the year 51, in the course of his second Apostolical journey; and again in the year 53, in his third journey. No mention is made in this Epistle of St. Paul having been twice in Galatia, and therefore I conclude that it was written in the interval between his two visits, and most probably in the year 52, while he was at Corinth; or it might have been written, as Michaelis thinks, in Macedonia, before St. Paul went to Corinth.

Not long after St. Paul had converted the Galatians to the belief of the Gospel, some Judaizing Christians endeavoured, with considerable success, to persuade them of the necessity of being circumcised, and of observing the law of Moses; for this purpose they urged, without any foundation, the authority of the Apostles and elders at Jerusalem; they represented St. Paul as having an inferiour commission, derived from the church at Jerusalem, and that even he in certain cases had allowed of circumcision. The object of this Epistle, which was written in a strain of indignant complaint, was to counteract the impression made by these false teachers, and re-establish the Galatians in the true Christian faith and practice.

St. Paul begins, after a salutation in the name of himself and all the brethren who were with him, by asserting his Apostolical mission; he shews, from a brief history of his life, that he learnt the Gospel, not from man, but by immediate revelation from God; and that he entered upon his ministry by Divine appointment, without receiving any instruction or authority from those who were Apostles before him, or at first holding any communication with them; that he afterwards conferred with the heads of the church at Jerusalem, and was by them, upon the fullest conviction, acknowledged to be an Apostle through the especial grace of God. St. Paul having thus proved the independency and divine original of his mission, and that he was "not a whit behind the very chiefest Apostles," 2 Cor. xi. 5, proceeds to refute the imputation of inconsistency with which he had been charged, by shewing that he had uniformly resisted the Judaizing Christians, and in particular that he had withstood and reproved St. Peter at Antioch, who through fear of the Jewish Christians had refused to associate with heathen converts; he contends, that he had always maintained the Gospel was alone able to save those who believe it, knowing that a man is not justified by the works of the law, but by the faith of Jesus Christ, chap. i. and ii.; he expostulates with the Galatians for having suffered themselves to be seduced by false teachers from the doctrines which he had taught them, and brings to their recollection that, upon their embracing the Gospel, and not the law, they had received the Holy Ghost, chap. iii. 1, 5. He then pursues the main subject of the Epistle at considerable length, and proves that the obligation of the ritual part of the Mosaick law is completely abolished, both with respect to Jews and Gentiles, chap. iii. 6, to the end of chap. iv.; and in the course of his argument he contrasts the present defection of the Galatians with their former zeal and affection towards him, and expresses a fear lest he should have preached to them in vain; he earnestly exhorts them to stand fast in the liberty with which Christ had made them free, and not to suffer themselves again to be entangled with the bondage of legal ordinances; he points out the moral and spiritual nature of the Gospel, in opposition to outward observances; and concludes with a variety of directions and precepts, all tending to the cultivation of practical virtue, chap. v. and vi.

St. Paul wrote this Epistle with his own hand, although it was his common practice to make use of a person to write for him.

It may be proper to remark, that the doctrine contained in this Epistle goes further than the decree of the council at Jerusalem, mentioned in the Acts of the Apostles. In this Epistle St. Paul maintains, that no persons, whether Jews or Gentiles, after they had embraced the Gospel, ought to consider the observance of the Mosaick law as essential to their salvation, or as contributing to a greater degree of perfection; and he says to the Galatian Christians, "Christ is become of no effect unto you, whosoever of you are justified by the law;" that is, whoever relies upon legal ordinances, as the means of his justification, will lose all the benefits of the profession of the Gospel: whereas the decree only decided, that it was not necessary for Gentile converts to Christianity to be circumcised, or to conform to the rites and ceremonies of the Mosaick institution. Bp. Tomline.

The subject and design of this Epistle is much the same with that of his Epistle to the Romans, but treated in somewhat a different manner. The business of it being to dehort and hinder the Galatians from bringing themselves under the bondage of the Mosaical law.

St. Paul himself had planted the churches of Galatia; and therefore referring (as he does in chap. i. 8, 9.) to what he had before taught them, he does not, in this Epistle, lay down at large to them the doctrine of the Gospel, as he does in that to the Romans, who having been converted to the Christian faith by others, he did not know how far they were instructed in all those particulars, which on the occasion whereon he writ to them it might be necessary for them to understand: and therefore, writing to the Romans, he sets before them a large and comprehensive view of the chief heads of the Christian religion. He also deals more roundly with his disciples the Galatians, than, we may observe, he does with the Romans, to whom he, being a stranger, writes not in so familiar a style, nor in his reproofs and exhortations uses so much the tone of a master, as he does to the Galatians. Locke.

CHAP. I.

6 He wondereth that they have so soon left him and the gospel, 8 and accurseth those that preach any other gospel than he did. 11 He learned the gospel not of men, but of God: 14 and sheweth what he was before his calling, 17 and what he did presently after it.

PAUL, an apostle, (not of men, neither by man, but by Jesus Christ, and God the Father, who raised him from the dead;)

2 And all the brethren which are with me, unto the churches of Galatia:

3 Grace be to you and peace from God the Father, and from our Lord Jesus Christ,

4 Who gave himself for our sins, that he might deliver us from this present evil world, according to the will of God and our Father:

5 To whom be glory for ever and ever. Amen.

Anno DOMINI 58.

6 I marvel that ye are so soon removed from him that called you into the grace of Christ unto another gospel:

7 Which is not another; but there be some that trouble you, and would pervert the gospel of Christ.

8 But though we, or an angel from heaven, preach any other gospel unto you than that which we have preached unto you, let him be accursed.

9 As we said before, so say I now again, If any man preach any other gospel unto you than that ye have received, let him be accursed.

10 For do I now persuade men, or God? or do I seek to please men? for if I yet pleased men, I should not be the servant of Christ.

Chap. I. After giving himself a title, levelled against the suggestions of their false teachers of the Judaizing faction, St. Paul expresses his wonder that the Galatians should have relapsed from the true Christian doctrine of men being justified and saved by the Christian religion alone, into the Jewish principle of the necessity of the ceremonial law: to cure them of which prejudice is the main purpose of this Epistle. Pyle. He next tells them, that he had received this doctrine by the revelation of Jesus Christ, and not from any man; upon which occasion he puts them in mind how zealous he had been formerly for the ceremonies and traditions of the Jews: that he had even been a furious persecutor of the Christians, but that God had called him to the knowledge of the truth; and that, immediately after his conversion, he had preached the Gospel in several places, without consulting any man, not even any Apostle. St. Paul speaks thus to shew that he was called by Christ alone, and not by St. Peter or any other human being: and that he had the same authority with the rest of the Apostles, which the false teachers would not allow. Ostervald.

Ver. 1. — (not of men, neither by man,] For I received not my call or my commission to that office from man, nor was I chosen to it by man, as Matthias was. Dr. Whitby.

This is resumed ver. 11; "neither preach I any doctrine devised or taught me by man; nor received I authority or calling from any man to preach the Gospel, neither from the whole college of the Apostles, as Matthias; nor from some of them, as Barnabas and Silas; and as Timotheus and Titus from me." Therefore that imposition of hands upon him, Acts xiii. 3, was not an election or consecration of him to the Apostleship; but only a praying for his good success in, and recommending him to, that employment, to which he was by the Holy Ghost designed, Acts xiv. 26. Bp. Fell.

2. And all the brethren which are with me,] The word "brethren" here seems to denote those that accompanied St. Paul in his travels, and assisted him in preaching the Gospel. Thus in Phil. iv. 21, 22, "the brethren which are with me" seem to be distinguished from "all the saints," or believers in general. Dr. Hammond.

4. — that he might deliver us from this present evil world,] To redeem us from the punishment and condemnation that is justly to fall upon the vicious and obstinate unbelievers of the present age. The sense is the same with that of Acts ii. 40, "this untoward generation." Pyle.

—— according to the will of God and our Father:] Or, 'of our God and Father.' Dr. Hammond. Who wills our sanctification, 1 Thess. iv. 3; Heb. x. 5—9; and that it should be brought about by our Lord Jesus Christ, Heb. x. 10. Dr. Wells.

6. I marvel that ye are so soon removed &c.] Most of his Epistles he begins with thanksgiving, but being to chide these Galatians, he alters his style; not calling them saints, elect, or churches of God, but he first sets down the main proposition, that by Christ alone, and by His death, chap. ii. 21, without obeying the law, are we justified; and delivered both from the evil consequences and power of sin; not that we should sin more freely, but that we should forsake the evil customs and conversations of worldly men, and live according to the will of God. Bp. Fell.

—— from him that called you] That is, from God: for the Apostle ascribes this work, not to himself, but constantly to God the Father. See Rom. ix. 24; 1 Cor. vii. 15; Gal. i. 15; 1 Thess. ii. 12; iv. 7; v. 24; 2 Thess. ii. 14; 2 Tim. i. 9. Dr. Whitby.

—— into the grace of Christ] That is, the covenant of grace in Christ. Dr. Wells.

6, 7. — unto another gospel: Which is not another;] Unto another doctrine, concerning the conjoining of the law with Christ, which is by the teachers thereof called a gospel; but, in truth, it is no gospel at all, neither can there be any other Gospel besides that truth of God, which ye have received from us. Bp. Hall.

8. But though we, or an angel from heaven, preach &c.] St. Paul does not suppose it possible for an angel from heaven, or an Apostle upon earth, to preach any thing contrary to the true Gospel; but he supposes an impossibility only for the confirmation of what he had before affirmed. Burkitt.

9. — let him be accursed.] Though we may look upon the repetition of the anathema here, to be for the adding of force to what he says, yet we may observe, that by joining himself with an angel in the foregoing verse, he as much as tells them, that he is not guilty of what deserves it, by skilfully insinuating to the Galatians, that they might as well suspect an angel might preach to them a gospel different from his, that is a false gospel, as that he himself should: and then, in this verse lays the anathema wholly and solely upon the Judaizing seducers. Locke.

10. For do I now persuade men, or God? &c.] In order to prove his own sincerity in preaching the true Gospel of Christ, the Apostle says that he needs but to put these questions to the Galatians. "Do I now," in the execution of my Apostleship, "persuade," that is, endeavour to gain the favour of "men or God? or," to speak more plainly, "do I seek to please men?" Concerning this meaning of the word "persuade," compare Matt. xxviii. 14; Acts xii. 20. Dr. Wells. In the latter passage, the phrase "having made Blastus their friend," is literally 'having persuaded Blastus;' that is, to befriend them. Dr. Macknight.

—— for if I yet pleased men,] If I made this the scope and drift of my labours. Bp. Hall. If I did so "yet," that is, as before my conversion. Dr. Wells.

The words "now" and "yet" cannot be understood without a reference to something in St. Paul's past life; what that was, which he had then particularly in his mind, we may see by the account he gives of himself, in what immediately follows, namely,

Anno DOMINI 58.

11 But I certify you, brethren, that the gospel which was preached of me is not after man.

12 For I neither received it of man, neither was I taught it, but by the revelation of Jesus Christ.

13 For ye have heard of my conversation in time past in the Jews' religion, how that beyond measure I persecuted the church of God, and wasted it:

14 And profited in the Jews' religion above many my † equals in mine own nation, being more exceedingly zealous of the traditions of my fathers.

that before his conversion he was employed by men in their designs, and made it his business to please them, as may be seen, Acts ix. 1, 2. But when God called him he received his commission and instruction from Him alone, and set immediately about it, without consulting any man whatsoever, preaching that, and that only, which he had received from Christ. So that it would be senseless folly in him, and no less than the forsaking of his Master Jesus Christ, if he should now, as was reported of him, mix any thing of men's with the pure doctrine of the Gospel, which he had received immediately from Jesus Christ, to please the Jews, after he had so long preached only that; and had, to avoid all appearance or pretence to the contrary, so carefully shunned all communication with the churches of Judea; and had not, until a good while after, and that very sparingly, conversed with any, and those but a few, of the Apostles themselves, some of whom he openly reproved for their judaizing. Thus the narrative, subjoined to this verse, explains the "now" and "yet" in it, and all tends to the same purpose. Locke.

11. But I certify you, brethren, &c.] The Apostle here obviates an objection, that, not being one of Christ's immediate followers, he had received the Gospel from men and not from Christ, and therefore might be thought to have made some change in it. He therefore declares, that the Gospel preached by him had a more than human authority, and was not to receive prejudice from the lateness of his calling. Dr. Hammond.

12. For I neither received it of man, &c.] The meaning of the Apostle is plainly this, that he did not receive his commission from, that is, by the mediation of, men, but immediately from God. And if Christ were not more than man, and considered as such in this passage, the Apostle's words cannot be made consonant. Leslie.

13. For ye have heard of my conversation &c.] The argument is, that it could not well be supposed that a person, so bigoted as he was to the Jewish religion, should be converted at all to the Gospel, much less turn an Apostle of it, by any but extraordinary means. Pyle.

14. And profited in the Jews' religion] Or, 'made proficiency' in it. Dr. Wells. This does not signify the religion originally taught by Moses, but that which was practised among the Jews at this time, being much of it built on the traditions of the elders. Dr. Doddridge.

——above many my equals in mine own nation,] Above many Jews of the same age with myself. Dr. Whitby.

——of the traditions of my fathers.] Those oral traditions, which the Pharisees so highly valued, even above the Law and the Prophets. See the notes on Mark vii. 3; Acts xxii. 3. Dr. Whitby. The Apostle mentions his zeal for these things, to convince the Galatians that his preaching of justification without the works of the law could be attributed to nothing but the force of truth communicated to him by revelation. Dr. Macknight.

15. —who separated me] As He had formerly done Jeremiah to be "a Prophet unto the nations," Jer. i. 5. Dr. Whitby. See the note there. Who in design separated me from my mother's womb, and in His due time actually called me by His grace. Dr. Wells.

16. To reveal his Son in me,] Rather, 'by me.' Dr. Hammond. Or, 'to me.' Dr. Whitby.

——immediately I conferred not with flesh and blood:] That is, with any man, so as to receive any mission for that work, or any instructions how to perform it. Dr. Whitby.

This, and what he says in the following verse, is to evidence to the Galatians the full assurance he had of the truth and perfection of the Gospel, which he had received from Christ by immediate revelation; and how little he was disposed to have any regard to the pleasing of men in preaching it, that he did not so much as communicate or advise with any of the Apostles about it, to see whether they approved of it. Locke.

17. —I went into Arabia,] Of this journey into Arabia, St. Luke not being with him says nothing in the Acts of the Apostles. Dr. Whitby.

His departure into Arabia, presently upon his conversion, before he had consulted with any body, is made use of, to shew that the Gospel, which he had received by immediate revelation from Jesus Christ, was complete, and sufficiently instructed and enabled him to be a preacher and an Apostle to the Gentiles, without borrowing any thing from any man, in order thereunto; no not from any of the Apostles, no one of whom he saw until three years after. Locke.

19. —James the Lord's brother.] The kinsman or cousin-german of Christ. Bp. Hall. See the Introduction to the Epistle of St. James.

20. —behold, before God, I lie not.] A revelation of the facts and doctrines of Christianity immediately from Jesus Christ Himself, without the assistance of any human teacher, so wonderfully agreeing in all its branches with that which Christ had taught on earth both before and after His resurrection, was so extraordinary an event, and of so great importance to those whom St. Paul visited, and to whom he wrote, that one cannot wonder he should think proper to assert it in so solemn a manner. We have great reason, while we read the attestation he has given to the truth of what he says, to acknowledge that it is of a piece with the many signs and wonders attending both his conversion and his ministry. Dr. Doddridge.

From this passage it is evident, that, when it was necessary to confirm the truth of the Gospel, or of his commission to preach it, or of his sincerity in preaching it; that is, when the benefit of souls required him thus to attest to men what otherwise they could not be assured of, the Apostle refused not to swear, and so esteemed not our Saviour's prohibition of an oath to be absolute. See Rom. i. 9; ix. 1; 2 Cor. i. 23; xi. 31; 1 Thess. ii. 5. Dr. Whitby.

24. And they glorified God in me.] The Apostle mentions the thanksgiving of the churches of Judea for his now preaching the faith, which formerly he destroyed; because it implied, that they believed him a sincere convert, and were persuaded that his conversion would be an addition to the proofs of the divine original of the Gospel. Dr. Macknight. Besides, this testimony of the Jewish Christians was a confirmation of his doctrine; for if they could have found any just exception against it, they would not have glorified God for his preaching it. Dr. Whitby.

Chap. II. The Apostle proceeds farther to clear himself of the imputation of ever having preached up the necessity of circumcision and the ceremonial law; and to vindicate his Apostolical commission: proving both those points from his next journey to Jerusalem, his management of Titus, his reception from the Apostles, his behaviour there, and at Antioch with St. Peter, and from the inconsistency of supposing he should preach such a doctrine. Pyle.

Ver. 1. — and took Titus with me also.] Titus being a Gentile by birth, and an uncircumcised person, this was an instance of the Apostle's not being ashamed to assert even at Jerusalem, that circumcision was not now necessary to the believing Gentiles. Dr. Wells.

This is the earliest mention that we meet with of Titus; for he is no where mentioned by St. Luke in the Acts; and what we read of him in 2 Cor. ii. 13; vii. 6, 14; viii. 6; as well as in 2 Tim. iv. 10; was later by some years. He is here said to have been a Greek, ver. 3; and being born of Gentile parents was not circumcised: but where or when he was converted is uncertain: only we may conclude he was converted by St. Paul, who calls him "his own son after the common faith," Tit. i. 4: and as he now took Titus with him from Antioch to Jerusalem, so he employed him afterwards on several occasions, and appears to have regarded him with great affection. Dr. Doddridge.

2. — privately to them which were of reputation,] Or the chief men there. Not that his doctrine might be confirmed by the concurrence of St. Peter or others with him in it; for surely that doctrine, which he received by immediate revelation from Jesus Christ and God the Father, needed no confirmation from the authority of man; but only to obviate the cavils of those who laboured to hinder the effect of his Gospel, by suggesting that it was contrary to, or disowned by, those Apostles, who were called before him. Dr. Whitby.

If St. Paul had not communicated, as he did, with the leading men at Jerusalem, and satisfied them of his doctrine and mission, his opposers might unsettle the churches he had planted, or should plant, by urging, that the Apostles knew not what he preached, nor had ever owned it for the Gospel, or him for an Apostle. Of the readiness of the Judaizing seducers to take any such an advantage against him, he had lately an example in the church of Corinth. Locke.

—— run, in vain.] This is an allusion to the race. For he who loses the prize is said to "run in vain." Dr. Macknight.

3. But neither Titus, &c.] Hereby it appeared that the other Apostles assented to St. Paul's doctrine, that Gentile Christians were not bound to the Jewish observances. Dr. Hammond.

4. And that because of false brethren &c.] The Apostle says that he kept Titus uncircumcised, and carried him so to the other Apostles, on purpose to shew that his sentiments were quite opposite to those of the false Jewish zealots, who came to Antioch, Acts xv, and insinuated themselves into the assemblies there, with a design to catch at and oppose St. Paul's doctrine, and to bring all the Gentile Christians to embrace the unnecessary slavery of the Jewish ceremonies. Pyle.

This conduct of St. Paul with respect to Titus, in not submitting to his being circumcised, when it was insisted on as necessary to salvation, is very consistent with what he afterwards did without constraint, to promote the circumcision of Timothy in different circumstances, Acts xvi. 3. Dr. Doddridge.

Circumcision in the case of Titus might very well have been done, as it was in the case of Timothy, Acts xvi. 3, upon the account of expedience, but was here rejected because it would have carried a face of necessity and efficacy, to allow which would frustrate the Christian religion. And St. Paul, who was always ready to make any compliance for expedience, was always inflexible when it was asserted of necessity. T. Edwards.

5. To whom we gave place by subjection, no, not for an hour;] Though at other times I was content to comply with the weak. Dr. Hammond.

—— that the truth of the Gospel might continue with you.] Namely, the Gospel of Christ, which frees the Gentiles from the obligation of the law. Dr. Whitby. "Truth" and "the truth of the Gospel" are used chap. ii. 14; iii. 1; v. 7, to denote the freedom of the Gentiles from the law of Moses. Dr. Macknight.

What St. Paul maintained was, that the Christian religion was the sufficient and only condition of a Christian's justification and happiness. Pyle.

6. But of those who seemed to be somewhat, &c.] As for those prime men, intimated ver. 2, and named ver. 9, St. James, St. Peter, and St. John, though they were persons of great knowledge, and dignity, and authority, and that most justly, &c. Dr. Hammond. Though our translation, "who seemed to be somewhat," literally answers to the original, yet the phrase, from the ordinary use of the words, carries with it a diminishing sense, contrary to the intent of the Apostle: who doubtless did not design to detract from St. James and the others, as those who only "seemed" to be what they were not; but to speak of them as men, who appeared, as they really were, men of the highest rank, and "pillars" of the church. Dr. Wells.

The Judaizers undervalued St. Paul's Apostleship in comparison of the ancienter Apostles; he therefore both vindicateth his own authority, that it was equal to theirs, and his internal graces (of knowledge, wisdom, &c.) not inferiour; as in 2 Cor. x, xi. But he doth not by any means disparage them whom he knew to be the foundations of the church laid by Christ Himself, Eph. ii. 20. Bp. Fell.

—— whatsoever they were, it maketh no matter to me: &c.] Be they as great as they will, their eminency makes me neither greater nor less. God, who made us all equally His Apostles, looks not upon present and external reputation in the church. Pyle.

—— in conference added nothing to me:] When they understood what I had done, they gave me no advice to alter any thing, nor said any more to me than what I knew before. Dr. Hammond.

7. — that the gospel of the uncircumcision was committed unto me, &c.] That I had received from Christ the commission of preaching to the Gentiles, and so an equality of office apostolical to St. Peter, whose office was to preach to the Jews especially. Dr. Hammond.

9. — who seemed to be pillars,] Who are justly accounted to be the pillars of the church. Bp. Hall. See the notes on ver. 6.

From these four verses, the supremacy of St. Peter, over the rest of the Apostles and the whole church, may by many arguments be refuted. For 1st, St. James is here mentioned first among the Apostles of the circumcision, according to the common doctrine of the ancients, who style him 'the first Bishop,' &c. 2dly, St. Paul puts no difference betwixt these "pillars," or chief of the Apostles. 3dly, He says that the Gospel of the uncircumcision was committed to him, as was that of the circumcision to St. Peter; by which words, as the ancient commentators say, he shews himself equal to St. Peter. Lastly, "it maketh no matter to me," saith he, "what they were;" which surely could not with propriety be said of St. Peter, if Christ had constituted him to be St. Paul's head and judge. Dr. Whitby.

—— they gave to me and Barnabas the right hands of fellowship;] The giving of the right hand was a symbol amongst the Jews, as well as other nations, of accord, admitting men into fellowship. Locke.

—— that we should go unto the heathen,] More especially "unto the heathen." Dr. Wells. It seems right to understand this with some qualification, as that they should do so for the present, because there is no reason to believe, that the labours of St. Peter, St. James, and St. John, were entirely appropriated to those of the circumcision; as on the other hand we are assured that those of St. Paul were not confined to the Gentiles: for we often find him preaching to the Jews, and indeed, wherever he came, he proposed the Gospel in the first place to them. Dr. Doddridge.

10. — that we should remember the poor;] Or take into our care the wants of the poor Christians in Judea, and get collections for them among the Gentiles. Dr. Hammond.

11. — I withstood him to the face, because he was to be blamed.] It is the question of Hilary upon this passage, Who would dare to resist St. Peter, a chief Apostle, unless it were another like him, who, confident of his own election, and knowing himself to be not unequal to him, could firmly disapprove of what the former had imprudently done? Dr. Whitby. Though the gift of inspiration, bestowed on the Apostles, secured them from errour in doctrine, it did not secure them from all imprudence in conduct, as is plain from this instance. Dr. Macknight.

St. Peter's fault was not an errour in doctrine, for he knew very well that the observation of the law was not necessary, and so himself declared, Acts xv. 7; immediately also before that he had been informed by a vision, that the Gentiles were not unclean, (which was the great reason why the Jews avoided their conversation,) and he had eaten and conversed with Cornelius, Acts x. Nor was it doing a thing in itself unlawful, for St. Paul had upon occasion circumcised Timothy, and practised legal purifications. Neither did the Apostles prohibit the Jews using their ceremonies, Acts xv. 19. But it was doing a thing lawful unseasonably, in an undue or unfitting place or time. Because by so doing he gave occasion of scandal to the Gentiles, that is, made them doubt whether they also were not obliged to observe the same law; as certain persons (perhaps Cerinthus) endeavoured to persuade some of them. Which dangerous heresy St. Peter should by all means have opposed, rather than by compliance have any way countenanced. With the danger of which doctrine he seemed not so well acquainted as St. Paul. St. Paul calls it 'fear,' ver. 12; 'simulation,' ver. 13; 'walking not uprightly,' ver. 14. This publick reprehension of St. Peter to his face added greater authority to St. Paul's preaching; and is a convincing argument, that St. Peter and the rest of the Apostles did accord with him in the same doctrine. Bp. Fell.

These differences between the Apostles have sometimes been alleged as a decisive objection against the Divine authority of the Christian scheme, but surely without cause. The New Testament no where represents the Apostles as infallible or impeccable, it has drawn one and only one perfect character, that of their Divine Lord; but Christianity derives more strength of evidence from the impartiality, with which its historians relate their own and their brethren's occasional errours or faults, than it can suffer injury from any imputation which their conduct may seem to justify. Another signal advantage from the relations of these divisions is, that it affords the strongest evidence, that the whole scheme was founded on truth, not imposture; for whenever impostors, and these the very chief conductors of the imposition, fall into contention and dispute, the fallacy is inevitably detected. Not so with the Gospel; though its teachers might in some points for some short time disagree, these disagreements impeded not in the least the completion of their sacred work; for this was conducted by the hand of God. Dr. Graves.

12. — certain came from James,] Some believing Jews of Jerusalem, of which St. James was bishop, who were generally zealous for the Mosaical performances, Acts xxi. 20. Dr. Hammond.

wise with him; insomuch that Barnabas also was carried away with their dissimulation.

14 But when I saw that they walked not uprightly according to the truth of the gospel, I said unto Peter before them all, If thou, being a Jew, livest after the manner of Gentiles, and not as do the Jews, why compellest thou the Gentiles to live as do the Jews?

15 We who are Jews by nature, and not sinners of the Gentiles,

16 Knowing that a man is not justified by the works of the law, but by the faith of Jesus Christ, even we have believed in Jesus Christ, that we might be justified by the faith of Christ, and not by the works of the law: for by the works of the law shall no flesh be justified.

17 But if, while we seek to be justified by Christ, we ourselves also are found sinners, is therefore Christ the minister of sin? God forbid.

CHAP. III.

1 He asketh what moved them to leave the faith, and hang upon the law? 6 They that believe are justified, 9 and blessed with Abraham. 10 And this he sheweth by many reasons.

14. — according to the truth of the gospel,] Wherein we have learned, that the partition wall is broken down, and that in Christ there is neither Jew nor Gentile. Bp. Hall. By "the truth of the Gospel," is meant here and throughout this Epistle, the Christian freedom from the law of Moses. Compare ver. 5. Dr. Wells. And see the note there.

—— why compellest thou the Gentiles &c.] That is, by thy example. In Scripture he is said to "compel," not only who doth violently force, but who, being of authority, provokes by his example, as here. As also they, who lay on others a necessity to do any thing, either by their deportment, as the Corinthians, who "compelled" St. Paul to glory, 2 Cor. xii. 11; or by their doctrine, as did the Judaizers, "constraining" the Gentiles to be circumcised, Gal. vi. 12. Dr. Whitby, Burkitt.

15. We who are Jews by nature,] And therefore, as it might seem, peculiarly chosen and privileged by God, and not Gentiles, who had been heretofore censured and rejected for impure and unclean persons. Bp. Hall.

The argument of the Apostle, contained in this verse and the next, may be thus explained: Surely if we, that were born and brought up in the Jewish religion, being now convinced of its insufficiency to justify us, have left it, and embraced the Christian religion, as the only sufficient means of pardon and salvation; it must be most absurd for us to imagine that the Gentiles, who were never brought up in it at all, should be now obliged to it, after their conversion to Christianity. It is plain you countenance this for no real advantage to them; for you and we all own, that the law can justify no man, now after the revelation of the Gospel; but the Gospel alone can fully do it. Pyle.

17, 18. But if, while we seek to be justified by Christ, &c.] On the other side, do but consider the consequence of this principle: a Christian, who relies still upon the Jewish law for his justification, must allow himself to be still in a state of guilt and sin, for the law leaves us all so. Which is as much as to say, that Christ, our Redeemer, has given us a dispensation, that leaves us but where we were; namely, in an unpardoned and unjustified condition: which God forbid any Christian should hold! 18. For it is evident beyond exception, if after having taken upon me the Christian profession, as the means of this justification, I run back again for it to the Jewish law, I am but where I was, an unjustified sinner; and act just like a foolish man, who pulls down his house to make it better, and then builds it up again with the very same materials, just as it was, upon its old foundation. Pyle.

19. For I through the law am dead to the law, &c.] We are all taught by the Old Testament itself, the law and the Prophets, that we must seek farther than the law, namely, to Christ; and so I have done, and have learned by the law itself, not to value it too much, but to give over hope of justification or life by those legal performances, that so I may find it in God, through Christ, in the new covenant. Dr. Hammond.

20. I am crucified with Christ:] Christ by His death hath abolished the Mosaical law, Eph. ii. 14; that is, hath taken away the discrimination between Jew and Gentile, and brought into the world justification for those who observe not the Mosaical law: and I, by being a Christian, have been made partaker of this fruit of Christ's death, and so am also "dead to the law," ver. 19, and Rom. vii. 4. Dr. Hammond.

—— nevertheless I live;] Still unto God. By living, a frequent expression of the Apostle's, is meant the manner of living, conversation, continual and habitual action, life being known by its operations. Bp. Fell.

—— yet not I, but Christ liveth in me:] By His Spirit, which actuateth me. Drs. Wells and Whitby. I am now no longer the man I was, that is, a Jew; but I am a Christian, and am now bound to no other observances, but those which Christ requireth of me, to whom I am obliged by all the bands of love and duty; He having given His own life for me to free me, among other things, from the Mosaical law. Dr. Hammond.

21. I do not frustrate the grace of God:] This freedom therefore I make use of, and do not depend on the law for justification, nor think the Mosaical observances still necessary; for that were to make void the Gospel of Christ. Dr. Hammond.

—— for if righteousness come by the law, then Christ is dead in vain.] There being then no necessity that He should die to purchase justification for us, and no sufficient virtue in His death to procure it. Dr. Whitby. Could the Jewish law have justified and saved us, there had been no need of Christ's death: and if that law has any part of our justification, then His death was of itself insufficient for it. Pyle.

Chap. III. The Apostle, having absolutely cleared himself of having ever preached up the ceremonial law to Christian believers, comes now to argue directly against the principle of the Jewish zealots. His first argument is taken from the miraculous gifts of the Holy Spirit conferred upon Christians. His next from the case of Abraham's justification; proving that all true Christians, whether circumcised or not, are accepted and pardoned upon the same faith, and from the same promise that justified that eminent Patriarch; and not at all from the observance of the Jewish law. The Jewish zealots object, 'To what purpose then was the law given?' he answers, It shews the law to have been only preparatory to the Gospel, and that all believers, Gentile and Jewish, are to be saved by the Christian religion alone. Pyle.

10 For as many as are of the works of the law are under the curse: for it is written, [b] Cursed is every one that continueth not in all things which are written in the book of the law to do them. [b] Deut. 27. 26.

11 But that no man is justified by the law in the sight of God, it is evident: for, [c] The just shall live by faith. [c] Hab. 2. 4. Rom. 1. 17.

12 And the law is not of faith: but,

Ver. 1. — who hath bewitched you,] That is, by mischievous arts deceived you, and led you into errour. The word carries with it an allusion to the practice of magical arts. Schleusner, Parkhurst. By what magical arts have you been deluded from this fundamental article of the Christian faith, that the Gospel religion is sufficient for salvation without the Mosaical law? Pyle. See the notes on chap. ii. 5, 14.

—— before whose eyes Jesus Christ hath been evidently set forth, crucified among you?] That is, Christ, and their freedom by Him from the bondage of the ceremonial law, had been preached to them; and His death and sufferings, with the great end and design of them, as plainly laid before them, as if Christ Himself had been crucified in the midst of them. Burkitt.

The word, rendered "set forth," was used to denote things written on tables, and hung up to publick view. Dr. Macknight.

2. — by the works of the law, or by the hearing of faith?] By doing the works of the law, or upon hearing and believing the Gospel, and that word of faith which ye heard of us? Bp. Hall. There is no doubt but that they received the Spirit on their becoming Christians, and therefore it could not be ascribed to the law, which they were strangers to till afterwards, but must be owing to that faith in which they were instructed by the Gospel, their embracing Christianity. Dr. Doddridge.

3. — by the flesh?] By circumcision and other carnal observances. Bp. Hall.

4. Have ye suffered so many things in vain?] So many persecutions from the Jews for the sake of Christianity. It is here to be observed, that they who have made an early and long profession of Christianity, and even suffered hard things for it, may very possibly after all be guilty of a foul defection and apostasy; and that all our former sufferings, and all the good actions we have done, will have been suffered and done in vain, if we persevere not in well-doing to the end. Burkitt, Dr. Whitby.

5. He therefore that ministereth to you &c.] Though the Apostle uses the third person in this verse, he plainly speaks of himself; and insinuates, not only that he was the person who converted them, and bestowed on them the spiritual gifts, but that the teachers, who had persuaded them to embrace Judaism, had conferred no spiritual gift on them, consequently had given no evidence of the truth of their doctrine. Dr. Macknight.

6. Even as Abraham believed God, &c.] The Apostle, having proved the truth of his doctrine by the circumstances which attended his preaching, proceeds to prove it from Scripture. Dr. Wells. See the notes on Rom. iv. 3.

The Apostle, both in this and in the Epistle to the Romans, chap. iv, begins his discourse of justification with that concerning Abraham. Because it then was, and now is, the usual argument of the Jews, both for the justifying of their still continuing in Judaism, and denying the Gentiles to be the church of God. The Apostle seems to suppose that we are justified by the same means as Abraham; or more generally, that there is no more than one means and manner of justification. This argument is handled more at large in the Epistle to the Romans. Bp. Fell.

7. — that they which are of faith,] And seek to be justified by it, "the same are the" true spiritual "children of Abraham." Drs. Whitby and Wells.

The Jews stood upon their relation to Abraham, John viii. 33. The Apostle here (as our Saviour there) endeavours to dissuade them from this carnal confidence. The true sons of Abraham (whom he receives into his bosom) being the imitators of his faith. Bp. Fell.

8. And the scripture, foreseeing &c.] That is, the Holy Ghost, who was the enditer of Scripture, foreseeing, &c. Drs. Whitby and Wells. This is a second argument, in proof of the Apostle's doctrine, derived from Scripture. Dr. Wells.

—— preached before the gospel unto Abraham,] "Before," namely, before the giving of the law, and also before the institution of circumcision. Drs. Whitby and Wells.

9. So then they which be of faith are blessed with faithful Abraham.] Whence it is clear, that believers or Christian livers, without Mosaical performances, have their part in the blessing promised to Abraham, and are blest on the same terms as he was. Dr. Hammond.

10. For as many as are of the works of the law] And seek to be justified by them, "are under the curse," as not performing perfectly all things which the law requires. Dr. Whitby. The Apostle here derives a third argument from Scripture, proving, that whereas "they which be of faith are blessed," ver. 8, 9, so on the contrary, they which are under the obligation of the law, are also under the curse of the law. Dr. Wells.

11, 12. But that no man &c.] A fourth argument is here taken from the express evidence of the Prophet Habakkuk. Dr. Wells. As if the Apostle had said, The same is proved by that known testimony of the Prophet, Hab. ii. 4. They to whom life is promised are the believers, or they that are justified after the evangelical manner; whereas the law makes no account of faith, allows no justification but on condition of legal obedience, performance of all that is required. Dr. Hammond.

The condition of the law is not that of faithful or sincere obedience, but that of absolute and perfect obedience. It is not he that is faithful according to the utmost of his power, but he that unsinningly doth these things shall live in them, Lev. xviii. 5. From this curse of the law Christ hath redeemed us, that this curse being abolished through the merits of His atonement, the promised blessing of Abraham, Gen. xii. 3, might come upon all nations through Jesus Christ. T. Edwards.

15 Brethren, I speak after the manner of men; Though it be but a man's ‖ covenant, yet if it be confirmed, no man disannulleth, or addeth thereto.

16 Now to Abraham and his seed were the promises made. He saith not, And to seeds, as of many; but as of one, And to thy seed, which is Christ.

17 And this I say, that the covenant, that was confirmed before of God in Christ, the law, which was four hundred and thirty years after, cannot disannul, that it should make the promise of none effect.

13. Christ hath redeemed us &c.] This is the Apostle's fifth and last argument to prove that we are justified by faith; and that, notwithstanding the threats of the law, a believer is freed from the malediction and curse of the law by Christ's bearing the curse for him. Dr Wells, Burkitt.

—— being made a curse for us:] Christ was "made a curse" in the same manner that He was "made sin for us," 2 Cor. v. 20; not by contracting the guilt, but by suffering the punishment, of our sins; by being "numbered with the transgressors," and condemned with them to the death, which the law styles "accursed." Dr. Whitby.

——for it is written, &c.] See the passage referred to in the margin, and the notes upon it.

14. — the blessing of Abraham] The favour bestowed on him of being justified by faith, and not by ceremonial observances. Dr. Hammond.

—— that we might receive the promise of the Spirit through faith.] Namely, that we Gentiles, as well as Jews, believing in Christ Jesus, might receive it. Dr. Wells. For we are all the sons of God through faith in Christ Jesus; and because we are sons, God hath sent forth the Spirit of His Son into our hearts, chap. iv. 6. Dr. Whitby. It is justly observed by the learned Diodati here, that the plentiful effusion of the Holy Spirit of God had been so frequently promised by the Prophets as the great blessing of the latter days, that it is here used as synonymous with "the blessing of Abraham." Dr. Doddridge. This promise is not explicitly mentioned in the covenant with Abraham, but it is implied in Gen. xxii. 17, "In blessing I will bless thee." And it is expressly mentioned by the Prophets, Isai. xliv. 3; Ezek. xxxix. 29; Joel ii. 28. Dr. Macknight.

15. Brethren, I speak after the manner of men;] Using an example taken from the common practice of all men, and speaking according to what is acknowledged in all civilized nations. Dr. Whitby.

—— no man disannulleth, or addeth thereto.] No man takes upon him to disannul or to alter it: how much more shall the covenant, that God Himself made with Abraham, be firm and inviolable? Bp. Hall.

16. — the promises] Made to Abraham, Gen. xii. 3; and repeated, Gen. xxii. 18; and to Isaac, Gen. xxvi. 4. Dr. Whitby.

There were divers promises made to Abraham; but chiefest, and the perfection of all, to which all the rest tended, was that of the blessed Seed. These promises were, 1st, that God would give him a son by his wife Sarah, in their old age. 2dly, By that son he should have a numerous issue. 3dly, That issue should become a nation, having laws, governments, &c. of its own. 4thly, And possess all that land wherein himself dwelt. 5thly, That He would settle His covenant, namely, His church in that family and nation. And 6thly, that in one Person of that his posterity, and in Him alone, all nations both of his posterity and others should be blessed: namely, the blessing should be introduced which should abolish the curse brought upon all nations by Adam. Bp. Fell.

—— And to thy seed, which is Christ.] This interpretation is acknowledged by the Jews, who observe, that 'it is not written here, thy son, but thy Seed; that is, the king Messiah.' And, as Theodoret observes, the words are capable of no other sense; for by Christ only was the promise fulfilled, and in Him alone did the Gentiles receive the blessing. He therefore, in whom alone this prophecy was verified, must be the person of whom it was chiefly, if not only, intended. And so St. Peter, assisted by the Holy Ghost, interprets these words, Acts iii. 25, 26. Dr. Whitby.

17. And this I say, &c.] Hence then I argue, that God, who had obliged Himself by a covenant made with Abraham, could not intend to evacuate that promise, by introducing a law by Moses; which did not take place till several hundred years after the promise had been in force. Dean Stanhope.

——four hundred and thirty years] See Bp. Kidder's note on Gen. xii. 4; and Bp. Patrick's on Exod. xii. 40.

—— cannot disannul,] The Apostle's argument proceeds on this undeniable principle of justice: that a covenant, made by two parties, cannot, after it is ratified, be altered or cancelled, except with the consent of both the parties; who in the present case were, on the one hand, God, and, on the other, Abraham and his Seed Christ. Wherefore, as neither Abraham nor his Seed Christ was present at the making of the covenant at Sinai, nothing in it can alter or set aside the covenant with Abraham, concerning the blessing of the nations in Christ. Dr. Macknight.

—— that it should make the promise of none effect.] As it must have done, were justification to be obtained by the law; for then none could be blessed in, and by, the promised Seed only, or without the law. Dr. Whitby.

18. For if the inheritance be of the law, &c.] Either then the inheritance, that is, eternal life, must belong to good men by virtue of the law, or by virtue of the promise antecedent to the law. If by virtue of the law, then the promise hath nothing to do with it. But this cannot be; because it expressly contradicts the account given of it in Scripture, which positively affirms, that Abraham was entitled to it by virtue of God's promise to him. Dean Stanhope.

19. — It was added because of transgressions,] It was given to restrain men from sin, and to shew them their guilt, and to make them seek out for a remedy, which is to be found only in the doctrine of the Gospel. Dr. Hammond. The ceremonial law in particular, consisting of sacrifices, &c. was given to contain the Israelites in their duty, by restraining those rites to the one true God, which they would otherwise have converted to the worship of false gods; and so to correct their proneness to idolatry, to which their long intercourse with Egypt had disposed them, and of which they had given a fatal instance in the sin of their golden calf. Dean Stanhope.

The law neither was, nor was intended by God to be, the blessing itself, nor necessary to salvation, as was faith in the promised Seed; but it was added to and after the promise, when Abraham's posterity became a nation. 1st, To discover what actions were good, what sin, namely to shew their guilt. 2dly, To coerce and restrain them from sinning by the terrours of it. 3dly, To abate their pride and confidence in themselves, and the seed should come to whom the promise was made; and it was ordained by angels in the hand of a mediator.

20 Now a mediator is not a mediator of one, but God is one.

21 Is the law then against the promises of God? God forbid: for if there had been a law given which could have given life, verily righteousness should have been by the law.

22 But the scripture hath concluded all under sin, that the promise by faith of Jesus Christ might be given to them that believe.

23 But before faith came, we were kept under the law, shut up unto the faith which should afterwards be revealed.

Anno DOMINI 58.

24 Wherefore the law was our schoolmaster to bring us unto Christ, that we might be justified by faith.

25 But after that faith is come, we are no longer under a schoolmaster.

26 For ye are all the children of God by faith in Christ Jesus.

27 For as many of you as have been baptized into Christ have put on Christ.

direct them to seek for righteousness and blessing in another. Lastly, to propose such expiations for sin, as might obtain remission for the present, and typify the blessed Seed to come; who should restrain sinning and promote righteousness, and also bestow remission by more effectual means. Bp. Fell.

—— till the seed should come to whom the promise was made;] This law was to take place till the coming of Christ, the promised Seed: but then to determine, because the clearer knowledge of God by the Gospel should then remove the danger that occasioned it; and so the promise should stand, without it, as it had done before. Dean Stanhope.

—— and it was ordained] Or delivered, not as the promise, immediately by God Himself to Abraham, but "by angels," it being "the word spoken by angels," Heb. ii. 2; not as the promise, without a mediator betwixt God giving and Abraham receiving, but "in the hand of a mediator," even Moses, who stood between them and the Lord at that time, to shew them the word of the Lord, Deut. v. 5, and to ratify the covenant on the people's part. Dr. Whitby.

That the law was given by the ministration of angels is apparent from many passages of Scripture; compare Ps. lxviii. 17; Acts vii. 53; and Heb. ii. 2: though the Logos or WORD of God did undoubtedly preside among them, and it was in His name that the proclamation was made by angels as His heralds and attendants. Dr. Doddridge.

20. Now a mediator &c.] Now the very office of a mediator implies, not only two parties contracting, but some difference to be made up between the two parties. And therefore it is observable, that the law was not given immediately to the people, as the promise was given immediately by God to Abraham His friend. Which difference could not proceed from any change in God, who is always the same; but from the men, who had provoked Him to treat them in another manner.

Others explain the verse thus: Now Moses was a mediator, but for one part of Abraham's seed, the Israelites only; but God is but one, and so the God of all his seed in common; namely, of all that should be justified like that father of all the faithful. Dean Stanhope.

21. Is the law then against the promises of God? &c.] The promise then and the law very well consist together. The former had not been necessary indeed, if men could have attained to righteousness by virtue of the law; for then the law might have superseded the promise; because whatever justifies, entitles to eternal life. But, instead of this, the law leaves men obnoxious to death; and we must by no means imagine that God intended to leave us in this miserable condition, as He must have done if the law had disannulled His promise made to Abraham. Dean Stanhope.

22. But the scripture hath concluded all under sin, &c.] So that the Scripture, when declaring all to be sinners, implies that faith in Abraham's promised Seed is the means whereby all must be justified. And consequently it is to the promise, and not to the law, that we owe our salvation and eternal inheritance. Dean Stanhope.

23. But before faith came, &c.] Before Christ and the Gospel came, we were by God put under the economy of the law, kept under and disciplined by it, as in a state of candidates or expectants, until the time should come for the revelation of the Gospel. Dr. Hammond.

24. — was our schoolmaster] An imperfect rule proportioned to an imperfect state: not to justify us, but to keep us in order, and to instruct and prepare our nature for the higher and more holy institution of the Gospel, for our justification. Dr. Hammond, Pyle.

25. But after that faith is come,] That is, Christ the object of faith is manifested, and the Gospel, the doctrine of faith, revealed. Burkitt.

—— we are no longer under a schoolmaster.] Having no farther occasion for those lower degrees of instruction. Pyle.

As the schoolmaster doth not teach those things which require mature judgment and perfect age, but only such rudiments and principles as may introduce the learner into the way and means of apprehending the other; such was the law in comparison of the Gospel. The law instructed the people inured in, inclined unto Egyptian and other sensual idolatry, Ezek. xx; Acts vii. 41, into the true worship of God; not however into the perfect knowledge or mysteries of it, but into the beginnings and introductions to it, which consisted chiefly in sensible and carnal observances of the same nature perhaps as they had seen in Egypt, but applied to the worship of the true God. These were also inculcated with great severity (the manner of educating froward children) to wean them from idolatry, and give them principles, though imperfect and obscure, of true worship. Bp. Fell.

26. For ye are all the children of God &c.] In a special state of sonship and adoption, entitled to the privileges and immunities of sons and heirs grown up to maturity. Burkitt.

27. — have put on Christ.] Have become united to Him by the closest bonds. Schleusner. Are made members of Christ. Dr. Hammond. And so are become "sons of God," John i. 12. Dr. Whitby.

As baptizing necessarily implies the use of water, so our being made thereby disciples of Christ, as necessarily implies our partaking of His Spirit; for all that are baptized, and so made the disciples of Christ, are thereby made the members of His body; and are therefore said to be baptized into Christ, Rom. vi. 3; Gal. iii. 27. But they who are in Christ, members of His body, must needs partake of the Spirit that is in Him their head. Neither doth the Spirit of Christ only follow upon, but certainly accompanies the sacrament of baptism, when duly administered according to His institution. For, as St. Paul saith, "By one Spirit we are all baptized into one body," 1 Cor. xii. 13; so that in the very act of baptism, the Spirit unites us unto Christ, and makes us members of His body, and if of His body, then of His church and kingdom, that being all His body. And therefore all who are rightly baptized with water being at the same time baptized also with the Holy Ghost, and so born of water and of the Spirit, they are by the very act admitted into the kingdom of God, established upon earth; and if it be not their own fault, will as certainly attain to that which is in heaven. *Bp. mination from any outward accidents of country, relation, sex; but circumcised or uncircumcised, ye are all equally accepted in Christ, if sincere believers; or, being members of Christ, ver. 27, ye are all accepted by God. Dr. Hammond.

—— male nor female:] The Apostle alludes to the Jewish custom in the inheritance of estates, which descended always by right of the father, and never by the mother's side. Pyle.

29. And if ye be Christ's, &c.] And if received and accepted by God, as members of Christ, then are you that spiritual seed of Abraham, to whom the promises of justification made by God do belong by way of inheritance, without any necessity of legal performances, or any other suppletory claim or tenure. Dr. Hammond.

Chap. IV. The same argument is continued, by shewing the imperfection of the Jewish, and the perfection of the Christian religion; from a comparison taken from an heir to an estate. The Apostle then turns off from the expostulation with them about the folly of adhering to the Jewish law; reflects on their false teachers; and entreats them to continue the same esteem they formerly had of him, as their true Apostle; expressing his tender regard to their church. Then he resumes the argument, illustrating the difference between the two dispensations of the Law and Gospel, as figuratively represented by the two branches of Abraham's posterity, namely, of Isaac from Sarah, and of Ishmael from Hagar. Pyle.

Ver. 1. Now I say, That the heir, &c.] The Apostle here intimates, that he would not be thought, by any thing that went before, to derogate from the just privileges of the Jewish church: he acknowledges it certain, that they were designed by God to inherit the promises made by God to Abraham, from whom they were descended: but he observes, that the difference between the Jewish and the Christian dispensation might be conveniently represented, by the case of an heir under age. Dean Stanhope.

—— differeth nothing from a servant,] As to the possession and free use of his estate, "though he be" by right of inheritance "lord of all" that his father left. Dr. Whitby. "A servant," more properly 'a bondman;' one in a state of bondage. Locke.

3. — when we were children,] As, till the Gospel came, we were to be esteemed by God's appointment. Dr. Wells.

—— under the elements of the world:] Under the rigid administration and rigorous exaction of the law, and tied to an almost numberless catalogue of ceremonial observances, by which it pleased God to instruct the former ages of His church. Burkitt.

The Jewish rites may have been called "the elements of the world," because they were in a great measure such as were used by the world in general, only directed to a better object and a better end. Drs. Whitby and Wells.

4. But when the fulness of the time was come,] That time, wherein God saw fit to remove the guardian of the heir, that is, to lay aside the Mosaical law. Dr. Hammond. The time appointed by God our Father for our arriving at age, ver. 2. Dr. Wells.

The redemption of mankind from sin and misery, by the incarnation and death of Christ, was, on God's part, entirely a matter of mere grace and favour. It depended wholly on His free choice whether he would send a Saviour into the world at all: much more at what time He would do it. We have therefore no claim, but what is founded on His voluntary promises. These indeed, when they were given, He was bound to make good. And as some of them not only assured the world of such a person's coming, but fixed the time of it; so accordingly He came at the time fixed. It had been foretold in Scripture, that He should appear under the fourth of the great empires of the world: whilst the second house or temple of the Jews was in being; when the sceptre was departing from Judah; at the end of so many weeks after their return from captivity, each consisting, not of seven days, but of seven years. And in fact just when all these marks were visibly united, "Jesus came into Galilee, preaching and saying, The time is fulfilled; and the kingdom of God is at hand: repent ye, and believe the Gospel," Mark i. 14, 15. "The fulness of time" therefore mentioned by the Apostle in the text, which he calls "the appointed time of the father," two verses before, is plainly that which the Scripture prophecies point out and determine. Abp. Secker.

—— God sent forth his Son, made of a woman,] Hence it is to be observed, 1st, that Christ was God's Son, His own Son, the Son of Himself, as the original calls Him, Rom. viii. 3; His Son, not in any inferiour regard, but in regard to His essence and nature: 2dly, that this "sending forth of His Son" presupposes His pre-existence before His incarnation: and 3dly, that this Son of God, so sent forth, really took upon Him our flesh, and was made manifest in our nature. Burkitt.

God had therefore a Son to send forth; that Son of whom it is said, that He was in the bosom of the Father; that He had glory with the Father before the world was; that Son, by the beloved disciple St. John styled, "The Word who was in the beginning with God, and who was God; by whom all things were made, and without whom was not any thing made that was made;" that Son, who came down from heaven; who "came from the Father, and returned to Him;" that Son, who says, "I and the Father are one; I am in the Father, and the Father in Me; he that hath seen Me hath seen the Father." These passages shew as clearly as language can shew, that the Saviour born, though born as a man, was in reality more than man; a Divine Person, who had being in heaven before the world began; who for us men and for our salvation came down from heaven: whose title is the Son, or the Word of God. Bp. Horne.

—— made of a woman,] If the Son of God, thus sent forth, were no more than a mere man, why should it be said, "made of a woman;" since every man is made of a woman, and, in the nature of things, can have no other original? There is nothing extraordinary in the circumstance; and in speaking of a mere man, it would never have been mentioned. But the fact is, that the Divine Person above described appeared in our nature, and was "made of a woman." Herein is the wonder of love, the root and fountain of salvation, pointed out by the Apostle, and expressed or implied in so many other passages of Scripture. Bp. Horne.

The Apostle here intimates, that Christ is "the Seed of the woman," promised at the fall to come and bruise the serpent's head. Dr. Macknight.

—— made under the law, &c.] Who submitted to and performed the whole law, to redeem us out of that slavery of Mosaical performances, and to receive us into participation of the promises made to Abraham, that is, to justification without those legal observances. Dr. Hammond.

"When the fulness of the time was come," when the Jews were gradually qualified to have a more manly and rational form of worship proposed to them, with more ingenuous motives to the practice of it; when the Gentiles also had received some preparatory cultivation in their understandings and their manners, from the purer parts of their philosophy, which yet had fully appeared to be insufficient for the reformation of mankind; and when so free a communication was opened between distant parts of the world, that the truth of the Gospel might easily be examined, and its doctrines easily spread; then "God sent forth His Son, to redeem them that were under the law, that they might receive the adoption of sons," Gal. iv. 4, 5, to purchase, at the price of His blood, their deliverance from the condemning sentence, and the ritual injunctions of the Mosaick dispensation, that they might enjoy under the Christian covenant the strongest marks of God's fatherly regard; and to purchase at the same time the deliverance of the Gentiles from an infinitely worse bondage, that of corruption, the slavery of sin, and the dread of eternal death, into the glorious liberty of the children of God. Abp. Secker.

6. —God hath sent forth the Spirit of his Son] Here the Son is distinguished from the Father as first sent by Him; and the Spirit of the Son is distinguished both from the Father and from the Son, as sent by the Father, after He had sent the Son. And this our Saviour hath taught us several times, John xiv. 26; xv. 26. Hence we conclude, that the Holy Ghost, although He be truly and properly God, is neither God the Father, nor God the Son. Bp. Pearson. He could not be called the Spirit of the Son any otherwise than as proceeding from the Son; so that it is evident He proceeds from both Father and Son. Leslie.

——crying, Abba, Father.] Witnessing to your spirits that ye are the sons of God, and that He is your Father, Rom. viii. 15, 16; and enabling you to use the language, not of servants, but of sons. Dr. Whitby. See the notes on the above passage.

7. Wherefore thou art no more a servant,] No longer enslaved to those Mosaical performances, but put into the state of sons, and consequently through faith in Christ secure of justification according to the promises made to Abraham. Dr. Hammond.

8. Howbeit then, when ye knew not God, &c.] The Apostle had said in the foregoing verse, "Thou art no more a servant:" the Gentile converts perhaps might reply, that they never were servants to the law: the Apostle therefore reminds them, that "then when they knew not" the true "God, they did service (were in bondage) unto them which by nature" or in reality "are no gods," and consequently they were under a bondage worse than that of the Jews. Dr. Wells.

9. —are known of God,] That is, acknowledged by Him. Dr. Wells.

——how turn ye again &c.] The Apostle considers the desire of the Gentile Christians to enter into the bondage of the ceremonial law, as a going backward in religion, or a return to those principles which they had already overpast. Burkitt.

——weak and beggarly elements,] "Weak," as not having power or efficacy to cleanse or sanctify the soul; and "beggarly," as not being able to confer the spiritual riches of the Gospel; namely, pardon of all sin together with grace here, and everlasting happiness hereafter. Dr. Wells.

10. Ye observe days, &c.] The whole drift of the Epistle, which is to convince the Galatians that they were not obliged to observe the rites and ceremonies of the law, shows that this verse is to be interpreted of the Jewish solemn times, and the festivals observed by them, as far as they could be observed out of Judea. Dr. Whitby. St. Jerome in his commentary upon this place shews, that for divers reasons the observation of Christian holydays comes not within this reprehension. Bp. Fell.

There is an observation of days, certainly superstitious, if not idolatrous, since in Deuteronomy an "observer of times" is declared an abomination to the Lord, Deut. xviii. 10: and it is one of the provocations for which the Gentiles were driven out of the land, Lev. xix. 26. And the Galatians are here reproached by St. Paul for observing "days, and months, and times, and years;" which appeared to him so criminal, that upon this account he feared the labour he had bestowed on them had been in vain. But the kind of days, the observation of which is condemned, were such as were dedicated by the heathens to their false gods, or such as were observed by them as lucky or unlucky days; these being the abominations of the heathens condemned in Deuteronomy: or those of the Jews, which, though abrogated, the Judaizing Christians attempted to impose upon the Galatians, as necessary to salvation, contrary to the Apostle's endeavours of setting them at liberty in the freedom of the Gospel, and to the doctrine of salvation by Christ alone, which might justly make him afraid of them. That the observation of such days as are in use among Christians is not forbidden in Scripture, appears from this; that God, who had in abomination the "observer of times," does Himself ordain several feasts to be observed in memory of past benefits; as the feast of the passover, of weeks, and of tabernacles. Besides, our Saviour kept a feast of the church's institution; namely, the feast of dedication; (see 1 Macc. iv. 56, and the note there:) and the common practice of all Christian churches and states in appointing and keeping days of publick thanksgiving and humiliation, is argument sufficient to prove, that in the common sense of Christians it is not forbidden in Scripture. And as to the design of the institution of such days, it being not only good but a great duty to be grateful, and to give thanks to God for the blessings we receive from Him, it must be not only lawful, but commendable upon the account of gratitude, to appoint and observe days for the particular remembrance of such blessings, and to give thanks for them. The sanctifying of such days being a token of that thankfulness, and part of that publick honour which we owe to God for His inestimable benefits. Nelson.

12. Brethren, I beseech you, be as I am; &c.] Be still as affectionate to me as I am to you, and count me not "your enemy, because I tell you the truth;" for I am still as affectionate to you, as ever you were to me, ver. 14. I do not look upon you as persons, who have done any thing with an intent to injure me; and though your false teachers have done you this injury by their pernicious doctrines, yet have they not prevailed on you to speak evil of me, or act injuriously towards me. Dr. Whitby.

In 2 Chron. xviii. 3, the expressions here used denote the most strict friendship. The Apostle, having sharply rebuked the Galatians for their attachment to Judaism, checks himself, and turns his discourse into the most affectionate entreaties and expostulations; in which he shewed himself to have a great knowledge of human nature. For he mentions such things as must have deeply affected the Galatians; especially as he expresses them in a simplicity and energy of language that are inimitable. Dr. Macknight.

What this weakness and trial in the flesh was, since it has not pleased the Apostle to mention it, is impossible for us to know: but it may be remarked here as an instance, once for all, of the unavoidable obscurity of some passages in epistolary writings, without any fault in the author. For usually some things, necessary to the understanding of what is written, are of course and justly omitted, because already known to him the letter is writ to, and it would be sometimes ungraceful, oftentimes superfluous, particularly to mention them. Locke.

The manner of the Apostle in addressing his Galatian converts, sometimes with the utmost plainness, and sometimes with the warmest tenderness, is admirably adapted to the relation which he bore them, as their first teacher in Christ. Whilst he expostulates with them in the style of warm complaint, and acknowledged superiority, and rests his decision of the questions he discusses principally on his own authority; he yet never forgets the intimate connexion he had formed with them, or the feelings which it had produced, but softens the tone of command with the tenderness of affection, and a grateful acknowledgment of their final regard. Dr. Graves.

18. But it is good to be zealously affected always in a good thing,] In a good cause ye ought to be constant; and therefore so you ought to be in your affections to me, and to the doctrine which I then preached to you. Dr. Hammond.

19. My little children,] This is an expression of the tenderest affection. See 1 John ii. 1, note. But as coming from St. Paul, it likewise insinuates that he had been the instrument of their conversion. Dr. Macknight.

——until Christ be formed in you,] That is, the true doctrine of Christ, from which you have been seduced into that of Moses. Dr. Wells. Till I hear, that the doctrine and practice of the Gospel be purely and perfectly received among you. Dr. Hammond.

20. —and to change my voice; for I stand in doubt of you.] To temper my discourse, to apply sharper or milder remedies, as occasion shall require: being uncertain, at this distance, which is the best way of dealing with you. Drs. Hammond and Wells.

21. Tell me, &c.] The Apostle here begins to argue the main point with them again, from the very words of the Old Testament. Pyle. As if he had said, You, that are so zealous for the law, will do well at least to attend to the arguments, which even the law furnishes for the point in debate. Dean Stanhope.

22. For it is written,] Namely, in the law, ver. 21. But the passages, quoted here and in ver. 29, are taken, the one from Gen. xvi. 15; xxi. 3; the other from Isai. liv. 1. Wherefore this is one of many examples, in which the word "law" is used for the whole body of the Jewish revelation. Dr. Macknight.

23. But he who was of the bondwoman &c.] Ishmael, Hagar's son, was born after an ordinary manner; but Isaac, Sarah's child, was born, not by the ordinary course of nature, but above it, by the power of God, and by virtue of the promise made to Abraham. Dr. Hammond.

——for these are the two covenants; &c.] They figuratively denote the Law and the Gospel: Hagar denotes the law, given from Sinai; which brings nothing with it but servitude and strict observances, and yet thereby helps no man to the condition of a son, to justification. Dr. Hammond.

25. For this Agar is mount Sinai &c.] For Hagar, the mother of the Ishmaelites, represents the slavish and temporary dispensation of the Jewish law, that was given at mount Sinai in the desert of Arabia; and that people of the Jews, who were to be kept under the severe discipline of it. Pyle.

26. But Jerusalem which is above is free, &c.] But Sarah, the mother of Isaac, denotes the spiritual Jerusalem, that is the Christian church; which is truly spiritual, and free from all obligation to those troublesome ceremonies: and is not, like the Jewish religion, confined to one nation, but, as an universal mother, receives all, both Jewish and Gentile believers, into her blessings and privileges. Pyle.

As the state of the church under the Gospel is styled by the Evangelists "the kingdom of heaven," so here the "Jerusalem which is above," or "the heavenly Jerusalem," (see Heb. xii. 22, and Rev. iii. 12,) means the Gospel state, or kingdom, being erected by the Holy Ghost, sent down from heaven and leading us thither. Drs. Whitby and Wells.

27. For it is written, Rejoice, &c.] It is observable, that the Jews themselves interpret these words, cited from Isai. liv. 1, of the times of the Messiah. Dr. Whitby. See the note on the passage.

28. —are the children of promise.] As being born, not of the flesh, but of the Spirit, by virtue of the promise, "In thy seed shall all the families of the earth be blessed." Dr. Whitby.

29. —even so it is now.] The sons of the bondwoman, those that will needs be slaves to the law, persecute and oppose those free Christians, who know themselves exempted therefrom. Bp. Hall.

The Jews persecuted the Christians first upon all opportunities by inflicting upon them bodily calamities, both by themselves, and heathen magistrates. And secondly, by undermining their doctrine with heresies and all other sort of opposition. The first sort St. Paul suffered most, the other the Galatians also. It is not said expressly, that Ishmael persecuted Isaac, but that he mocked him; probably Sarah saw that it was with a malicious intention. The same persecution hath been always. For so Cain persecuted Abel. Bp. Fell.

30. —for the son of the bondwoman shall not be heir &c.] Even so hath God determined to cast off the obstinate abettors of the Jewish law, and bereave them of all the privileges of His church and the inheritance of children. Bp. Hall.

31. —we are not children of the bondwoman,] And consequently not subject to the bondage of the law, typified by the bondwoman Hagar; but "we are the children of the freewoman," and therefore exempted from the obligation of the law, by the Gospel, typified by Sarah. Drs. Wells and Whitby.

The conclusion and sum of all the Apostle's reasoning is this, to bring off the Galatians from seeking justification by the works of the law, and to teach them that they should no longer consider themselves in bondage to circumcision and the Mosaick rites, but that they should "stand fast in the liberty, wherewith Christ had made them free," which introduces that excellent discourse to this purpose, which we find in the following chapter. Burkitt. From the difference here illustrated between the legal and the evangelical covenant, we should be led to consider the dignity and privilege of our high calling; and serve God upon principles, and with a disposition of mind, worthy of the near and honourable relation we bear to Him. At the same time we must take good heed not to pervert the arguments urged by St. Paul against the works of the law, to the prejudice or disparagement of good works in general. The former are only such works as made up the ceremonial law; and those are abolished by the death of Christ, and the promulgation of His Gospel. The latter neither began nor expired with that law, but are moral duties of eternal obligation. To say that we are not justified by these works of either sort, but by faith only, implies that God forgives our past sins, and admits us into covenant without any regard to the merit of such works. But to say that men may be saved without good works, infers that they are not bound to any such after their admission into the covenant. And this contradicts the whole strain, and renders void all the precepts of the Gospel. Dean Stanhope.

Chap. V. The first verse is an exhortation, drawn from the discourses of the two foregoing chapters. Then the Apostle, in more express terms, declares he never preached the necessity of the Jewish law to Christians; as their false teachers insinuated he had done: clears himself of that imputation several ways: pronounceth all Christians free from the Jewish ceremonies; but exhorts them to avoid all violent disputes, and uncharitable censures upon each other, in their arguments for, and defence of, that freedom: warns them against the several vices of the flesh, and presses them to the practice of the spiritual graces and virtues of the Gospel religion. Pyle.

Ver. 2. Behold, I Paul] Your known Apostle. Dr. Hammond. Who, it seems, have been misrepresented to you, (see ver. 11,) as one that preaches circumcision, and gives countenance to the necessity of that law upon Christian converts. Pyle. "Behold, I Paul," I the same Paul, who am reported to preach circumcision, witness again, ver. 3, continue my testimony, to every man, to you and all men. This so emphatical way of speaking may very well be understood to have regard to what he takes notice, ver. 11, to be cast upon him, that is to say, his preaching circumcision, and is a very significant vindication of himself. Locke.

——if ye be circumcised,] That is, if ye join circumcision to the Gospel, as a thing necessary to justification and salvation. Burkitt. Common sense plainly requires us to take the assertion with such limits; which is also necessary to reconcile it with the hopes of all Jewish believers, and with the conduct of St. Paul himself in circumcising Timothy, Acts xvi. 3. And this accounts for the indifference with which he elsewhere speaks of circumcision as availing nothing. See chap. v. 6; vi. 15; 1 Cor. vii. 19. Dr. Doddridge.

3. —that he is a debtor to do the whole law.] He absolutely obliges himself to perfect obedience, without which the law cannot justify any, chap. iii. 10. Dr. Hammond. As by baptism we Christians do oblige ourselves to observe all the institutions of the Christian faith; so did the Jews by circumcision oblige themselves to yield obedience to the whole law of Moses. Dr. Whitby.

6. For in Jesus Christ] That is, in His economy or dispensation. Dr. Wells.

——but faith which worketh by love.] Not an idle and dead belief, but a lively and operative faith. Bp. Hall. Such as is made perfect by the addition of those duties, which we owe to God and to our brethren. Dr. Hammond.

The account which the Apostle here gives of faith, deserves attention. He does not say that it consists in the mere speculative belief of the truths of the Gospel; nor in a confident persuasion, that we are actually justified, or that Christ hath died for us in particular. These things are no where in Scripture represented as constituting justifying faith; and they who trust to them delude themselves. The faith, which is counted for righteousness, according to St. Paul, is such a belief of the truth as worketh in the mind of the believer by love, and maketh him "a new creature," chap. vi. 15. The Apostle called the attention of the Galatians to this operation of faith, because they were deficient in love to each other, ver. 15. Dr. Macknight.

7. Ye did run well;] In the beginning of your Christian race. Dr. Whitby. See the notes on 1 Cor. ix. 24.

8. This persuasion] Of the necessity of your being circumcised and obeying the law of Moses. Dr. Whitby.

——of him that calleth you.] Rather, 'that called you' to a state of salvation by my preaching. Dr. Wells. See the note on chap. i. 6.

9. A little leaven leaveneth the whole lump.] Intimating that a few false teachers, and a little errour and false doctrine, crept into the church of Christ, may do unspeakable mischief by infecting the whole church. Burkitt. The expression is proverbial. See Matt. xvi. 11, 12; 1 Cor. v. 7. Dr. Macknight.

10. — none otherwise minded:] Than I exhort you to be. Dr. Whitby. Or, that you will believe nothing else to be necessary to your justification, than what I have taught you. Dr. Wells.

——shall bear his judgment,] Some would understand this, only of the censure, which the church should pass upon him, or of the punishment, which he should suffer, when St. Paul came to exert his Apostolical authority, of which we have several instances elsewhere; (see 1 Cor. iv. 21, and the note;) yet it is reasonable to extend it to the solemn account he should give to God, and to the condemnation he should certainly receive, if he persisted in his endeavours to subvert the truth. Dr. Doddridge.

11. And I, brethren, if I yet preach circumcision, &c.] This verse is an answer to the suggestions of those who maintained the necessity of the law, that St. Paul was an hypocrite, in some places preaching up circumcision, in others not. Dr. Whitby.

——why do I yet suffer persecution?] Implying, that the Jews persecuted him, and that his not preaching circumcision was the cause why they did so. Burkitt.

——then is the offence of the cross ceased.] If I preach circumcision, then that scandal and slander of the cross, which the adversaries cast upon us, (in teaching that by Christ crucified, and not by the works of the law, men were justified,) is utterly at an end, and all is peace between the Jews and us. Bp. Hall.

12. —cut off] Either cut off by excommunication, or cut off from all opportunity, hope, and power of disturbing you. Parkhurst.

13. —only use not liberty for an occasion to the flesh,] Here, and in what follows, the Apostle proposed to remedy the dissensions which had arisen in the churches of Galatia, as in other Gentile churches, where the Jewish converts insisted that the Gentiles should observe the distinction of meats and days prescribed by Moses; but the Gentiles strenuously maintained their Christian liberty. In carrying on these disputes, both parties, it seems, took such liberties with each other's characters, that the Apostle termed it, ver. 15, a "biting and devouring of one another." In the expression, "use not your liberty for an occasion to the flesh," the Apostle insinuated that the Gentile Christians indulged their sensual appetites, by eating those meats, which their Jewish brethren reckoned unclean, without regarding the offence which they gave them by so doing: and that, on the other hand, the Jewish converts, enraged against the Gentiles, gave vent to their fleshly or angry passions, by speaking evil of them and giving them opprobrious names. See Rom. xiv; where the Apostle has treated of these disputes at great length. Dr. Macknight.

——by love serve one another.] The Apostle informs them, that though they were called by the Gospel to a state of liberty from the law, yet they were still as much as ever bound to their brethren in all the offices of love. Dr. Wells.

14. —all the law] All the moral law respecting our neighbour. Dr. Whitby.

Either the law touching our neighbour, or the law in general, Matt. vii. 12; because the love of our neighbour is the completing our love to God, 1 John iv. 12. "If we love one another, God dwelleth in us, and His love is perfected in us." Bp. Fell.

15. —consumed one of another.] It may end in the ruin of you all, and in the discredit and bane of your common profession. Pyle.

16. —Walk in the Spirit, and ye shall not fulfil &c.] Behave yourselves as men, that make the Gospel their rule, and are guided by the Spirit of God; and this will prevent your being enslaved by the lusts of the flesh. Dean Stanhope.

Anno DOMINI 58.

22 But the fruit of the Spirit is love, joy, peace, longsuffering, gentleness, goodness, faith,

23 Meekness, temperance: against such there is no law.

The words "flesh" and "spirit," though employed by the writers of the New Testament in different senses, according to the subject of which they treat, are yet commonly expressions of the moral state and character of man; the dispositions of his heart towards piety or sin. Spirit is the principle of reason and religion: flesh of appetite and passion. Every one feels in himself both right and wrong inclinations. The former our conscience approves. And therefore pursuing them would on that account alone be properly called, "walking after the Spirit," Rom. viii. 4, that "inward man, which" naturally "delighteth in the law of God," Rom. vii. 22. But a much stronger ground for it is, that the Divine Spirit hath not only revealed to us the whole rule of life, and the most powerful motives to observe it, but is continually present to our minds, exciting and strengthening us, if we permit Him, to every good work. On the other hand, "all flesh having corrupted his way before God," Gen. vi. 11, 12, sinners may be justly said to walk after the flesh, because they live conformably to the wicked customs of the world. But the true foundation of the phrase is, that this corruptible body, Wisd. ix. 15, subjects the fallen children of Adam perpetually, by its irregular propensities, to a variety of temptations hard to be overcome. And therefore even heathen authors have represented it as the principal source of moral evil; no wonder then that those of Scripture do, on fuller knowledge of the case. Abp. Secker.

17. For the flesh lusteth against the Spirit, &c.] For there is a continual enmity betwixt the flesh, which is our corrupted nature, and the Spirit, whereby we are regenerated. Bp. Hall. The meaning of the Apostle is, that as Christians, who still continue to be men, carry about with them a corrupt principle, inclining them one way; so have they, by virtue of their being Christians, a supernatural and divine principle, namely, the rational spiritual faculty, or reason instructed by the Gospel, and assisted and strengthened by the grace and Spirit of God, drawing them another: and that, if the former constantly dispose them to evil, the latter, as constantly, disposes them to good. Dean Stanhope, Dr. Hammond.

—— so that ye cannot do the things that ye would.] That is, whatsoever you do in compliance with one of these principles, you do in opposition to the other. Dr. Hammond.

The dictates of the Spirit, and the lusts of the flesh, are represented by St. Paul as "contrary the one to the other:" if the former prevail, "the fruit is" those Christian graces and virtues enumerated by the Apostle, which will make us "meet to be partakers of the inheritance of the saints in light;" if the latter, "its works are" that catalogue of crimes and vices which he declares will exclude those who do them from the kingdom of God. This opposition of the flesh to the Spirit, and the precepts to "walk in the Spirit;" "not to quench the Spirit;" "not to grieve the Spirit;" with others of a similar nature, plainly prove, that the influence of the Holy Spirit may be withstood, and that it rests with ourselves whether we will obey His suggestions. Even St. Paul allowed the possibility of his having received the grace of God "in vain:" and surely the same possibility must be admitted with respect to all other Christians. Bp. Tomline.

18. But if ye be led of the Spirit,] If ye habitually follow the dictates of your better part. Dr. Macknight. If ye be led by the Spirit of God in the paths of evangelical holiness and obedience, and act according to your spiritual nature in the prevailing bent and tenour of your lives. Dr. Doddridge.

—— ye are not under the law.] And so "sin shall not have dominion over you," Rom. vi. 14. Dr. Whitby.

19. Now the works of the flesh are manifest, &c.] It is observable, that amongst "the works of the flesh" some are reckoned, which seem to consist in the errours and evil dispositions of the mind: such as heresy, malice, envy, and others. But it is to be considered, that even these are effects of the same cause, a wicked and worldly principle; and that the ends, which men propose to themselves by indulging them, are gratifications of the outward man, by some pleasures or advantages peculiar to the present state, and of a sensual nature. By these "works of the flesh" being said to be "manifest," we may understand, that the malignity of their nature and consequences evidences itself to the reason of every thinking man: and that nothing but corruption, and prejudice, and passion, could blind our judgment, or ever reconcile us to the practice and indulgence of vices so pernicious and detestable. Dean Stanhope.

20. — witchcraft,] Those pretended arts of incantation and charming, and all the pretended communications with invisible malignant powers, whereby the heathen priests promoted the reverence and worship of their idol gods, and enriched themselves. Dr. Macknight.

21. — revellings,] These amongst the Greeks were a disorderly spending of the night in feasting, with a licentious indulgence of wine, good cheer, musick, dancing, &c. Locke.

22. But the fruit of the Spirit is love, &c.] Probably the Apostle did not here intend to make out a complete list of Christian graces; but to specify those only on which it was most necessary to fix the minds of the persons to whom he wrote; namely, those of a kind and charitable disposition and behaviour, one towards another. The rest would be understood by parity of reason, or further instruction, if they were not already: and had they been crowded all together, the multiplicity would have distracted their thoughts too much. Abp. Secker.

—— love, joy,] By what precedes and follows, "love" appears to signify love to our fellow-creatures: "joy" therefore must be confined in the same manner; and so it will mean delighting in their good, spiritual and temporal; suitably to the character given of "charity," the same word with "love" in the original, that "it rejoiceth not in iniquity, but rejoiceth in the truth," 1 Cor. xiii. 6. Abp. Secker.

—— faith,] Fidelity to our words and promises. Pyle.

23. — temperance:] Or self-command. For the original word extends to the governing and preserving within proper bounds every movement of our hearts, not only towards pleasure, but wealth, honours, resentment, any thing indeed which can either entice or provoke us to act injuriously. And in this general sense it most fitly concludes and completes the list. Abp. Secker.

—— against such there is no law.] Of these words it is a very true sense, that the practisers of the Gospel virtues have, generally speaking, nothing to fear from human laws: and a very material sense, considering what severe punishments are frequently incurred by the contrary vices: on which account St. Peter justly asks, "Who is he that will harm you, if ye be followers of that which is good?" 1 Pet. iii. 13. But this, though a right meaning in itself, comes far short of the Apostle's meaning: which is, that whereas the law of nature requires obedience, without giving any certainty of pardon and acceptance on whatever terms, after disobeying; and the law of Moses being "added, because of transgressions," Gal. iii. 19; that is, partly to convince men of their transgressions, partly to restrain them from transgressing, increased both the number of duties and the fear of punishment, but afforded only obscure hopes, either of assistance or forgiveness; the Gospel of Christ was revealed in God's due time, to relieve mankind, on the most equitable conditions, from the rigour of the two: supplying the promise of mercy after failures, taking off the heavy yoke of ritual observances, producing in men the good disposition required, and expressly assuring them, that a perfect obedience would not be expected, but a faithful and sincere one be sufficient, in order to obtain eternal happiness. Against such therefore as thus possess and exercise the several Christian graces there is no law. For them there is a law to direct and reward them; against them is none, to sentence and punish them. The strict demand of the covenant of works is relaxed; the burden of the Mosaick ordinance is removed; and "the law of the Spirit of life in Christ Jesus hath made them free from the law of sin and death," Rom. viii. 2. Still indeed they are subject to the law, which gave them this freedom: "they are created in Christ Jesus unto good works, which God hath before ordained that they should walk in them," Eph. ii. 10. But this the Apostle considers as a privilege, not a servitude: a privilege, however, necessary to be used; and therefore he expresses very distinctly the nature of it. "There is no condemnation to them which are in Christ Jesus, who walk not after the flesh, but after the Spirit," Rom. viii. 1. "For to be carnally minded is death; but to be spiritually minded is life and peace," Rom. viii. 6. Abp. Secker.

24. And they that are Christ's have crucified the flesh &c.] They that truly belong to Christ make proof of it by mortifying the corrupt inclinations of the carnal principle in their hearts; so that, however those inclinations may have some remainder of life, yet they have not so much vigour as to reign and rule. Dean Stanhope, Bp. Hall.

25. If we live in the Spirit, &c.] Wherefore if we are members of this pure and spiritual religion of the Gospel, which is attended with such assistances of the Holy Ghost; it infinitely concerns us to live suitably to His holy dictates and precepts. Pyle.

26. — provoking one another,] Reproaching one another with faults, infirmities, and errours; or irritating and wounding one another with invectives. Schleusner. Theodoret here observes, that they, who stood firm in the faith, and so enjoyed their spiritual gifts, might be apt to condemn and glory over the weak on that account; and others might envy their gifts: and this shews the seasonableness of this exhortation, and connects these words with the beginning of the following chapter, where the Apostle condemns them who had high thoughts of themselves, and upon that account were apt to overlook and neglect a fallen brother. Dr. Whitby.

Chap. VI. The Apostle continues his exhortation to a tender and peaceable temper: admonisheth the spiritual governours of the church, to endeavour the recovery of such as fall into errours and irregularities, by kind and gentle treatment: reflects upon the pride of their false teachers: encourages the Galatians to a liberal and impartial contribution for the maintenance of their ministers: and to charity towards all mankind, especially their fellow Christians. He then sums up the argument of his whole Epistle, and concludes with his blessing. Pyle.

—— lest thou also be tempted.] Lest thou also thyself fall into the like sin in time of temptation. Dr. Hammond.

2. — one another's burdens,] Bear with one another's infirmities, and help to support each other under your burdens. See a parallel exhortation 1 Thess. v. 14, as also Rom. xv. 1. Locke.

3. — when he is nothing,] In the sight of God, who regards him, not for his knowledge, but for his charity, 1 Cor. xiii. 2, 3. Dr. Whitby.

5. For every man shall bear his own burden.] The righteous God in the great judgment will call no man to account for the sins of others, unless he has in some way been accessary to them, but "every one shall bear his own burden," both of sin and of punishment. Burkitt.

6. — communicate unto him that teacheth in all good things.] Returning to him temporal blessings, in lieu of those spiritual, which he receiveth from him. Bp. Hall.

profit, "shall reap a corruption," that is, only a perishing satisfaction at present, and eternal perdition afterwards: but "he that soweth to the Spirit," or bestoweth his temporal goods upon holy and spiritual purposes, being therein led and directed by the Spirit of God, shall by the goodness of that same Spirit, graciously remunerating him, receive eternal life. Bp. Hall, Burkitt.

It would be as absurd for a man to expect that God's mercy should save him without works of righteousness, as for the husbandman to look for a harvest without ever plowing and sowing his ground. He were a madman in his husbandry that should do this, and he is no less infatuated in his religion that doeth the other. The great truth, which St. Paul here teacheth us under a metaphor, the Scripture delivers in proper terms, when it tells us, as it often doth, that "God will render to (or reward) every man according to his deeds." "Without holiness no man shall see the Lord," saith the divine author of the Epistle to the Hebrews, chap. xii. 14. Without a holy life here, no man ought to expect or hope for a happy life hereafter. Bp. Bull.

10. —let us do good unto all men,] The Galatians were in danger of Judaizing in their practice, as well as in their doctrines; that is, of loving none but themselves and their own countrymen. St. Paul therefore exhorts them to extend their charity universally to all and every one of the same nature with themselves. Burkitt.

——them who are of the houshold of faith.] That is, the whole body of believing Christians, all the members of Christ's mystical body. Burkitt.

The general rule of Christian benevolence is, to do service gladly to every one of our fellow-creatures. But we are not bound to do them equal service. Their titles to it may be very unequal; and where there is a difference we ought to make one. The highest sort of merit is that which the Apostle here singles out, to recommend by the expression of "the houshold of faith." All good Christians, being through the grace of God conformed to His likeness, and adopted by Him to be heirs of salvation, are therefore, when taken separately, called the children of their heavenly Father; when jointly, His family or houshold. And their being no admittance into this family, or continuance in it, but by such a belief of religion, as produces an uniform practice of it, therefore it is called the houshold of faith.

And one reason for directing the primitive Christians to do good, especially to their brethren in the faith, probably was, because the generality of them were of the poorer sort, and yet were least likely to meet with assistance from others: their heathen neighbours being offended by the singularity of their notions, and condemned by the strictness of their lives; on which account it was very needful that the rich members of their own communion should consider them in the first place.

But another main reason doubtless was, that Christians were, what the design of Christianity is to make them, more religious and virtuous than other men, and therefore bound to treat one another as being so. They were to prefer a fellow-believer in their benefactions, not only for belonging to the same body, but because "the righteous is more excellent than his neighbour," Prov. xii. 26. And this points out a way for us all, though the houshold of faith, in outward profession and appearance, is of equal extent with our country, to observe however the spirit and intent of the Apostle's precept, by making it one great rule of our charities, to be most liberal to the truest Christians; that is, the most pious, honest, and virtuous persons. And certainly nothing can be more judicious. Every kind of distinction ought to have a proportionable regard shewn it; and therefore the highest and most honourable ought to have the greatest. Abp. Secker.

11. Ye see how large a letter I have written unto you with mine own hand.] St. Paul was wont only to dictate his Epistles to others that wrote them; as Rom. xvi. 22; 1 Cor. xvi. 21: so that his writing this with his own hand was an argument of his more than ordinary concern. Dr. Wells.

12. As many as desire to make a fair shew in the flesh,] As many as affect glory and popularity, and their own ease and safety. Bp. Hall.

——lest they should suffer persecution] From the Jews, for preaching the full effect of the death or cross of Christ, without the works of the law. Bp. Hall.

The Apostle affirms, that all the fierceness of the zeal, pretended by the false teachers, of whom he speaks, for the law of Moses, was merely a time-serving compliance, to shelter themselves from the implacable malice of the Jews, who persecuted all those that had the hardiness to preach the expiration of the law, as a dispensation superseded by the death of Christ. Dean Stanhope.

13. For neither they themselves &c.] These Judaizing teachers, though outwardly circumcised, do not keep the law in other things; so that it is plain they do not urge these matters out of any true zeal for the law. Bp. Hall.

——that they may glory in your flesh.] Might boast of this among the Jews, that they promoted circumcision even among the Gentiles, and by that pretence might avoid persecution. Dr. Whitby.

14. —God forbid that I should glory, save in the cross of our Lord Jesus Christ,] That is, in His submission to die upon it, not merely as a confirmation of His sincerity, which puts His and His Apostles' martyrdoms almost on a level, but as a propitiatory offering, by which, to speak the language of holy writ, "He hath reconciled us to God, making peace by the blood of His cross, in the body of His flesh through death," Col. i. 20—22. Abp. Secker.

——save in the cross of our Lord Jesus Christ,] The cross of Christ is the doctrine, to which all the other doctrines of the Gospel refer, and from which they derive all the efficacy and influence they have towards purging our consciences from dead works: and therefore in that single article they are often all of them summed up and comprised. "We preach Christ crucified," says St. Paul, 1 Cor. i. 23; as if that, and that alone, were the subject of all he wrote and all he spoke. And again, "I determined not to know any thing save Jesus Christ, and Him crucified," 1 Cor. ii. 2: as if that were the great point of saving knowledge, to which those who learn, or who teach, the religion of Christ, should altogether apply themselves. Can we look upon it under this view, and refrain from glorying in it? To this article of our faith the enemies of the Gospel have always taken the greatest exceptions: and in this therefore we ought to triumph most, as being secure against their attacks, and despising their vain objections and reasonings. The first preachers of our faith must in this case be our patterns. They knew that "Christ crucified was to the Jews a stumblingblock," 1 Cor. i. 23; but did they therefore dissemble the scandal of the cross for that very reason? No!

they boasted of it; they insisted upon it in all their applications to the unbelieving Jews, recorded in the Acts; particularly St. Peter omits no occasion of mentioning to them Him "whom they slew and hanged on a tree," Acts x. 39; as an high reproach to His murderers indeed, but none at all to His disciples and followers. Very fitly therefore has the Church of England appointed, that, after we have been "received into the congregation of Christ's flock" by baptism, we should be "signed with the sign of the cross, in token," as she speaks, "that we should not hereafter be ashamed to confess the faith of Christ crucified, but should manfully fight under His banner against sin, the world, and the devil, and continue Christ's faithful soldiers and servants to our lives' end." A ceremony, which, whatever fault may have been found with it, is certainly very ancient, very innocent, and very significant too; as it fitly admonishes us, throughout the whole course of our Christian warfare, to look upon the cross of Christ as the proper badge of our profession; which we ought not to be ashamed or afraid to own, whenever He, in whose service we are listed, shall call upon us to take it up, and follow Him. Bp. Atterbury.

——by whom the world is crucified unto me,] So that it prevails not against me, to carry me away from my holy courses; "and I am crucified unto the world," so that I affect not the glory and vanity thereof. Bp. Hall.

"Faith" indeed "saveth us," Eph. ii. 8; but that alone which "worketh by love," Gal. v. 6, to God, to our fellow-creatures, and to every thing good; which cannot consist with a ruling love to the ways of an evil world. Therefore St. John saith, "If any man love the world," that is preferably, "the love of the Father is not in him," 1 John ii. 15: and St. Paul only expresses the same meaning a little more strongly, when he reminds us by his own example that we must be crucified, dead to the world, and it to us, Gal. vi. 14. We must sacrifice all inordinate fondness for it to Him, who sacrificed Himself on the cross for our salvation, and mortally hate whatever is wrong in it, at the risk of being mortally hated by it. Still the comforts of life, which God hath provided for us, are to be enjoyed with duly proportioned gladness and thankfulness: the subordinations of life are to be maintained, the common business of it followed, the proprieties and civilities of it preserved, and perverse noncompliances diligently avoided. But when all this is done, much will remain to be renounced and crucified. For, as St. John hath admonished us, "we are of God, and the whole world," even what calls itself the Christian world, "lieth in wickedness," 1 John v. 19, powerfully encouraging every bad thing, to which our appetites and passions prompt us, and many to which they do not. Abp. Secker.

15. For in Christ Jesus &c.] Under the Gospel covenant it is of no consequence whether a man be circumcised or not; but all depends upon the renewal of the heart and life. Dean Stanhope.

The only sure evidence of the goodness of our condition is the sincerity of an obedience, flowing from motives truly Christian. And accordingly what the Apostle calls here in the text "a new creature," he calls in a parallel place of the preceding chapter, "faith working by love;" and in another, "keeping the commandments of God." So that when he saith, the new creature will avail, and nothing else, he saith it on supposition of its being so completed as to answer its end; which end unless we are careful to attain, by exerting the principles of the spiritual life conferred on us in baptism, and growing up in all Christian graces; however great a blessing in itself our sacramental regeneration is, it will be none to us; but we had better not have been born, better not have been new born, if it only entitles us to privileges that we finally forfeit; and become, to use St. Jude's expression, "twice dead." Our Saviour hath told us, that the tree is known by its fruit, Matt. xii. 33. And "the fruits of the Spirit" are the virtues of a holy life. If we experience these, we have a mark of our acceptance with God, which cannot deceive; all other marks, all other feelings, be they ever so lively, ever so pleasing, may. Abp. Secker.

16. And as many as walk according to this rule,] That is, to the rule that I have in this my Epistle commended unto you, seeking justification only by Christ, without the works of the law, peace be unto them, and mercy; and not to them only, but to the whole church of God, every where. Bp. Hall.

Assuredly so extraordinary a method for our justification as the passion of our Saviour would never have been taken without extraordinary need of it. That we should fully discern the need is no way necessary: it suffices that God did. Our concern is no more than to accept salvation, His own gift on His own terms; renouncing all merit in ourselves, laying hold, by a lively faith, on the merits of our Redeemer's obedience, thanking our heavenly Father from the bottom of our souls for sending His blessed Son into the world, and esteeming most highly the Christian Creed, the Christian worship, the Christian sacraments. "God forbid," then, "that we should glory" in any thing, "save in the cross of our Lord Jesus Christ;" or ever be ashamed of that, for all the scorn and ridicule of a thoughtless and profane world. But God forbid also, that while we profess to believe on Him, we should crucify Him to ourselves afresh, and "put Him" and His religion "to shame," Heb. vi. 6, by transgressing and neglecting any obligation of piety towards our Maker, our Saviour, our Sanctifier; of justice or goodness towards our fellow-creatures; of humility, sobriety, temperance, chastity, in the government of ourselves. For in vain do we call Him Lord, unless we do the things, Luke vi. 46, which He commands us; in vain do we trust in His sacrifice, unless we "present our" souls and "bodies a living sacrifice, holy, acceptable unto God," Rom. xii. 1; in vain do we imagine our peace is made through Him in heaven, unless on earth we "follow peace with all men, and" that universal "holiness" of life, "without which no man shall see the Lord." Abp. Secker.

17. —for I bear in my body the marks of the Lord Jesus.] The Apostle calls the scars he received from stripes, chains, &c. in the service of Christ, "the marks of the Lord Jesus," by a beautiful allusion to the brands, with which servants and soldiers were sometimes marked, to shew to whom they belonged. Parkhurst.

THE EPISTLE OF PAUL THE APOSTLE

TO THE EPHESIANS.

INTRODUCTION.

SOME learned divines have thought that this Epistle was not addressed to the Ephesians, but to the Laodiceans, conceiving it to be the Epistle mentioned in the fourth chapter of the Colossians, "and that ye likewise read the Epistle from Laodicea." The principal ground of their objection to the commonly received opinion of its being written to the Ephesians is, that there are no allusions in it to St. Paul's having ever resided among the persons to whom it is addressed; whereas it is certain that St. Paul had been twice at Ephesus, when he wrote this Epistle, and one of those times he had resided there more than two years; but this negative argument is contradicted by the most positive testimony, and by almost the unanimous voice of antiquity. Ignatius, who was contemporary with the Apostles, expressly says, that St. Paul wrote an Epistle to the Ephesians, and his description of it corresponds with this Epistle. Ireneus, and Clement of Alexandria, both Fathers of the second century, quote this Epistle as written to the Ephesians. Tertullian, who lived nearly at the same time, censures Marcion for asserting that this Epistle was written to the Laodiceans, and says that it was really written to the Ephesians. Origen, Dionysius of Alexandria, Cyprian, Eusebius, and all the later Fathers, who quote this Epistle, treat it as written to the Ephesians; and almost all the ancient manuscripts and versions attest the same thing by supporting the reading of our Bibles, "Paul, an Apostle of Jesus Christ, by the will of God, to the saints which are at Ephesus." Upon these authorities we are fully justified in considering this Epistle as written to the Ephesians.

Ephesus, a city of Ionia, and the capital of the proconsular Asia, was famous for its temple of Diana, which was esteemed one of the seven wonders of the world; and its inhabitants were noted for their superstition and skill in magick. St. Paul preached the Gospel for a short time at Ephesus, in the year 53; and in the following year he returned thither, and remained there more than two years. During this long residence he made many converts to Christianity, who seem to have been distinguished by their piety and their zeal.

This Epistle contains no blame or complaint whatever; and its sole object appears to have been, to confirm the Ephesian Christians in the true faith and practice of the Gospel. It was written while St. Paul was a prisoner the first time at Rome; and the Apostle does not express in it any hope of a speedy release, which he does in his other Epistles sent from thence: it is conjectured that it was written during the early part of his confinement, and probably in the year 61. It might perhaps be occasioned by intelligence which the Apostle had received concerning the Ephesians, from persons who had lately come out of Asia, chap. i. 15. It was sent to Ephesus by Tychicus. It is written with great animation, and has been always much admired both for the importance of its matter and the elegance of its composition.

This Epistle consists of six chapters, the three first of which are usually considered as doctrinal, and the other three as practical. St. Paul, after saluting the saints at Ephesus, expresses his gratitude to God for the blessings of the Gospel dispensation, and assures the Ephesians, that since he heard of their faith in Christ Jesus, and of their love to all Christians, he had not ceased to return thanks for them, and to pray that their minds might be still farther enlightened, chap. i.; he points out the excellence of the Gospel dispensation, and shews that redemption through Christ is to be ascribed solely to the grace of God, chap. ii.; he declares the mystery, or hidden purpose of God, to be, that the Gentiles as well as the Jews should be partakers of the blessings of the Gospel, and that through the goodness of God he was appointed to be the Apostle of the Gentiles; he desires the Ephesians not to be dejected on account of his sufferings, and closes this part of the Epistle with an affectionate prayer and a sublime doxology, chap. iii. In the three last chapters, St. Paul gives the Ephesians many practical exhortations; and in particular, he recommends union, purity of manners, veracity, and meekness, chap. iv.; he enjoins charity, and forbids every species of licentiousness; he enforces the duties of wives, of husbands, chap. v.; of children, of servants; he recommends watchfulness and firmness in the Christian warfare, and concludes the Epistle with a general benediction, chap. vi. Bp. Tomline.

Chap. I. The Apostle salutes the Ephesians with the title of faithful Christians for their steady adherence to the Christian faith, without any regard to the necessity of the ceremonial law: blesseth God for calling the Gentile world into the Christian covenant, and bringing them and the Jews together into one church under Christ the Messiah: declares this to have been the original and gracious design of God in the Gospel dispensation; and that the gifts and endowments of the Holy Spirit conferred on the Ephesian church are to them a pledge and confirmation of this truth: and expresses his satisfaction in their adherence to it, and his prayers for their constancy and improvement in the knowledge of this most wise and comprehensive religion of the Gospel. Pyle.

Ver. 1. — and to the faithful] Either, 'the believers,' as the word is elsewhere translated; or the words may particularly relate to such Christians, as kept the doctrine of Christ pure from the corrupt mixture of those Judaizers, who went about "corrupting" and "handling the word of God deceitfully." Dr. Whitby.

2. Grace be to you, and peace, &c.] This salutation is the same in all St. Paul's Epistles, except that in the Epistle to the Hebrews, and in those to Timothy and Titus, he adds "mercy." Bp. Fell.

3. — the God and Father of our Lord Jesus Christ,] He is the former, in relation to Christ's human nature: and He is the latter, both by eternal generation, and by virtue of the personal union of the two natures in Christ. Burkitt.

—— with all spiritual blessings in heavenly places] That is, all spiritual blessings, which may fit us for those heavenly places, provided for us in and by Christ. Bp. Hall.

Or, 'in heavenly things,' as the phrase should be rendered, as in the margin, rather than "places;" for they are things which have a manifest relation to heaven, and a tendency to fit us for it. Locke, Dr. Whitby.

4. According as he hath chosen us &c.] It was the opinion of the Jews, that God had elected them from the beginning of the world, and sent the Messiah that none of them should perish. St. Paul therefore, to take from them all cause of boasting against the Gentiles on that account, declares that the Gentiles were thus elected in Christ Jesus, even before the foundations of the world; that is, that He designed then to choose them for His church and people, namely, an holy people to the Lord. Dr. Whitby. St. Paul, being the Apostle of the Gentiles, uses the terms, "blessed us," "chosen us;" thus in his usual way making himself as one of the Gentile converts, the more to confirm and encourage them to rely upon the Gospel without the ceremonial law. Dr. Wells, Pyle.

The verb, here rendered "hath chosen," signifies to choose out to special privileges; as God chose the ancient Israelites, as a nation, to be His peculiar people, Acts xiii. 17; or as He chose Christians, as Christians, to peculiar blessings before the foundation of the world, to the end, or with a design, "that they might be holy and without blame," &c. Parkhurst.

5. Having predestinated] Or 'fore-appointed us.' Dr. Whitby. The word signifies God's predetermination to bestow on the Gentiles the blessings mentioned in this verse. Dr. Macknight.

The election and predestination spoken of in this passage relate to God's eternal purpose to make known to the Ephesians the mystery of His will in the blessings of the Gospel; and the Apostle calls them "saints" and "faithful," because of the firmness and constancy with which they hitherto held fast the profession of their faith: but still, instead of representing their salvation as certain, he earnestly exhorts them to "walk worthy of the vocation wherewith they were called;" guards them against those deceits which bring down "the wrath of God upon the children of disobedience;" and commands them to "put on the whole armour of God, that they may be able to stand against the wiles of the devil." It was therefore possible for those who were "saints," "faithful," "chosen," and "predestinated," to walk unworthy, to incur the wrath of God by disobedience, and to yield to sinful temptations, and consequently to fail of salvation. Bp. Tomline.

—— unto the adoption of children] This in the Scripture phrase imports adoption to a blessed resurrection, and to a state of happy immortality both of soul and body. See Luke xx. 36; Rom. viii. 16—19, 23. Dr. Whitby.

—— according to the good pleasure of his will,] As if he had said, As it was by the free bounty and favour of God that the Jewish nation should be for a long time His peculiar church and people, so it is the same Divine will now to bring all the Gentile world along with them into this gracious privilege under Christ Jesus. Pyle.

6. To the praise of the glory of his grace,] He created all for the glory of His power, He governeth them for the glory of His wisdom, He punisheth the obstinate for the glory of His justice, and He saveth others for the glory of His mercy and grace. So that the end of His electing and adopting us through Christ is, that angels and men might more glorify His grace and bounty in accepting us through Christ the Son from eternity: not through or for the sake of others, who were at the best but faithful servants, and themselves also accepted through Him. Bp. Fell.

—— in the beloved.] That is, in Jesus Christ His beloved Son. Dr. Wells.

7. — through his blood,] The Apostle here assures us, that believers obtain the blessings specified in this verse, through the shedding of Christ's blood; and his intention in mentioning this was to convince the Ephesians, that the Judaizing teachers could promise them no advantage through the observation of the law, which they could not more effectually obtain by obeying the Gospel. Dr. Macknight.

—— according to the riches of his grace; &c.] As Christians, we have received a clear discovery of our duty, and of a future state, a promise of Divine assistance in time of need, through the whole course of our lives; of forgiveness upon our amendment, and of eternal happiness upon our perseverance, not in faultless obedience, but in sincere endeavours to improve in knowledge and virtue, and to perform the reasonable service which is required from us. The advantages of Christianity are here stated in few words, but they are such as no heart can duly conceive, no tongue can fully utter. The writers of the New Testament seem to labour for expressions, and to have found themselves unable to convey to us in proper language the sentiments of a heart overflowing with joy and gratitude, when they speak of the love of God manifested in Jesus Christ. Whosoever rightly understands, and duly considers this Divine love, will in some degree be affected like them, will be sensible that he can be no good Christian who returns not frequent thanks to God that he is a Christian, and will wish that he were like one of those active creatures mentioned in the Revelation, who rest not day and night, and are occupied in giving "blessing, and honour, and glory, and power, unto Him that sitteth upon the throne, and unto the Lamb for ever and ever." Dr. Jortin.

8. Wherein he hath abounded toward us in all wisdom and prudence;] Wherein His infinitely wise disposal hath eminently appeared in this, of all others the most probable and powerful means, of bringing home sinners to new life and bliss. Dr. Hammond.

9. — the mystery of his will,] The whole doctrine of the Gospel, taken together, is called "the wisdom of God in a mystery," 1 Cor. ii. 7. The same appellation is given to particular discoveries made in the Gospel; as in Rom. xi. 25; xvi. 25; 1 Cor. xv. 51; 2 Thess. ii. 7; and in other places. Dr. Macknight. It is sometimes applied by St. Paul, as here, in a peculiar sense to the calling of the Gentiles. Parkhurst. So called, as having long been kept a secret, of which neither Jews nor Gentiles had any conception, till it was revealed by the Holy Spirit to the Apostles. Dr. Doddridge.

—— both which are in heaven, and which are on earth;] "Heaven and earth" are sometimes a Jewish phrase to express the whole world. But they seem in these Epistles to the Ephesians and Colossians, with relation to Christ's government, to include the angels and heavenly spirits along with mankind: the phrase of "visible and invisible," in Col. i. 16, being hardly capable of any other sense; as likewise that of "thrones, dominions, principalities, and powers." See also and compare chap. iii. 15; Col. i. 20; Phil. ii. 9. Pyle. Both angels and men were at first in harmonious subjection to the Son of God, the great Creator of both; but man having broken himself off from the society, the Son of man by His humiliation and sufferings recovers all who believe in Him, and in His human nature presides over the kingdom, to which in the world of glory they and His angels belong. Dr. Doddridge.

It plainly appears, that men are by no means the only beings interested in our blessed Lord. The Scripture teaches that, as "by Him, and for Him, were created all things that are in heaven, and that are in earth, visible and invisible, and by Him all things consist; so by Him also was God pleased, having made peace through the blood of His cross, to reconcile all things to Himself; whether they be things in earth, or things in heaven," Col. i. 16—20: "that in the dispensation of the fulness of times, He might gather together in one all things in Christ; both which are in heaven, and which are on earth, even in Him," chap. i. 10. Such hints as these, of a scheme of Providence amazingly extensive, were not given either to gratify or excite our curiosity; but to admonish us, that in the religious administration of the universe, there are particulars not designed to be comprehended by us at present, but by some other part of the creation; things done "to the intent," (as the Apostle more explicitly informs us,) "that now unto principalities and powers in heavenly places might be made known by the church, the manifold wisdom of God, according to the eternal purpose which He purposed in Christ Jesus our Lord." Well then may it become us to be modest in judging of a plan so much too great for us; and to reverence, without expecting to search out fully, that "mystery of God, and of the Father, and of Christ," wherein, we are expressly told, "are hid all the treasures of wisdom and knowledge," Col. ii. 2, 3. Abp. Secker.

12. — we — who first trusted in Christ.] The 11th and 12th verses are to be applied to the Jews, who were first called by Christ and His Apostles, and first trusted in Christ for salvation, before the conversion of the Gentiles: and the 13th and 14th verses relate generally to the Gentiles, and recount the favours and privileges, to the participation of which they, in common with the Jews, were admitted on their believing in Christ. Burkitt.

13. — ye were sealed with that holy Spirit of promise,] This is an Hebraism for the promised Spirit. Dr. Macknight.

14. Which is the earnest of our inheritance] An earnest or pledge is part of the price, which is paid beforehand to confirm a bargain. It is here spoken figuratively of the Holy Spirit, which God hath given to the Apostles and believers in this present life, to assure them of their future and eternal inheritance. See also 2 Cor. i. 22. Parkhurst. At this passage St. Jerome exclaims, 'If the earnest is so great, how great must the possession be!' Dr. Macknight.

—— until the redemption of the purchased possession,] That is, of the people acquired or purchased to Himself as His peculiar property; "the church which He hath purchased with His own blood," Acts xx. 28. Parkhurst.

15. — of your faith in the Lord Jesus, and love unto all the saints,] That is, that the faith and love, wrought in you, continue steadfast and abound. For a dangerous and almost epidemical apostasy from the purity of the Christian faith having happened amongst the Jewish churches in Asia, the Apostle had great reason, after eight years' absence, to give thanks to God for the steadfastness in the faith which he had heard of in the rest. See 1 Thess. iii. 6. Dr. Whitby.

17. — the spirit of wisdom and revelation] The revelation of the Spirit, as St. Paul elsewhere asserts, being necessary, "that we may know the things that are freely given to us of God," they being not naturally to be perceived, 1 Cor. ii. 12. Dr. Whitby. "Revelation" is used here by St. Paul for such truths as could not have been found out by human reason, but had their first discovery from revelation, though men afterwards come to the knowledge of those truths by reading them in the sacred Scriptures, where they are set down for their information. Locke. The Apostle did not pray that God would give to all the Ephesians the knowledge of the doctrines of the Gospel, by an immediate revelation made to themselves; but that He would enable them to understand the revelation of those doctrines, which was made to the Apostles, and which they preached to the world. Dr. Macknight.

The Holy Spirit is here called "the Spirit of wisdom and revelation," because He is the author of all that knowledge in the mysteries of religion, to which we can attain, and it is His proper work and office to reveal to us the will of God for our salvation. Burkitt.

18. — what is the hope of his calling,] What is the benefit of His calling us to Christianity. Dr. Hammond. What high and glorious hopes He hath called us to. "Hope" is here taken for the object of hope. Burkitt.

CHAP. II.

1 By comparing what we were by 3 nature, with what we are 5 by grace: 10 he declareth, that we are made for good works; and 13 being brought near by Christ, should not live as 11 Gentiles, and 12 foreigners in time past, but as 19 citizens with the saints, and the family of God.

AND you hath he quickened, who were dead in trespasses and sins; —— and what the riches of the glory of his inheritance in the saints,] That is, how great and glorious is the inheritance which He hath designed for Christians. Drs. Whitby and Wells.

19. And what is the exceeding greatness of his power &c.] That is, how excellent is the power, which God would shew in raising us up from the dead, as He had done Christ, to the enjoyment of our future inheritance. Dr. Whitby. That the Apostle hath here in view the resurrection of believers from the dead, is evident from ver. 20. The resurrection of the whole human kind from the dead, is an amazing instance of the infinite power of God; but having been exemplified in the resurrection of Christ, it cannot be doubted. Dr. Macknight.

20. — and set him at his own right hand in the heavenly places,] And exalted Him in His human nature to the participation of His infinite glory and majesty in the highest heavens. Bp. Hall. This is a declaration by inspiration of the fact recorded, Mark xvi. 19. In both passages there is an allusion to Ps. cx. 1. And since Christ sat at the right hand of God after His resurrection and ascension, it implies that He was thus exalted in the human nature, and that in the human nature He exercises all the power belonging to His high dignity, agreeably to the description given of it in the next verse. Dr. Macknight.

He which came down from heaven, and descended into the lowest parts of the earth, is ascended far above all heavens; that, sitting at the right hand of God, He might from thence fill all things with the gracious and happy fruits of His saving presence. Ascension into heaven is a plain local translation of Christ, according to His manhood, from the lower to the higher parts of the world. Session at the right hand of God, is the actual exercise of that regency and dominion wherein the manhood of Christ is joined and matched with the deity of the Son of God. Not that His manhood was before without the possession of the same power, but because the full use thereof was suspended till that humility, which had been before as a vail to hide and conceal His majesty, were laid aside. After His rising again from the dead, then did God set Him at His right hand in heavenly places, far above all principality, and power, and might, and dominion, and every name that is named, not in this world only, but also in that which is to come; and hath put all things under His feet, and hath appointed Him over all the Head to the church, which is His body, the fulness of Him that filleth all in all. The sceptre of which spiritual government over us in this present world, is at length to be yielded up into the hands of the Father which gave it; that is to say, the use and exercise thereof shall cease, there being no longer on earth any militant church to govern. Hooker.

21. Far above all principality, &c.] Far, infinitely far above all those rulers and potentates, that have but fading power, by whom He was here put to death; yea, above the highest degree of angelical powers. Dr. Hammond. Above all power that is or ever shall be. Dr. Whitby.

22. And hath put all things under his feet,] This is said in allusion to Ps. cx. 1, "until I make Thine enemies Thy footstool." Compare 1 Cor. xv. 25, 27. Dr. Macknight.

—— head over all things to the church,] That is, to the benefit of the church. Dr. Whitby.

23. Which is his body,] The church is the body of Jesus Christ in the following manner: 1st, He formed it by Himself, and by the ministry of His Apostles; He drew it not out of the dust of the earth, but which was as difficult, out of a state of darkness, errour, and corruption. 2dly, He quickened it by His power, and by the gifts of the Holy Spirit. 3dly, He purchased it with His own blood, having yielded Himself up to death for its sake. Lastly, he hath collected, and united, and tied together all its members by the same laws, the same faith, the same sacraments, the same hopes of a resurrection to life eternal, and above all, by mutual charity, which St. Paul calls the bond of perfection. Dr. Jortin.

—— the fulness of him that filleth all in all.] For he ascended up on high, that He might fill the members of His church with all gifts necessary for the edification of His saints, till they should "come to the measure of the stature of the fulness of Christ," chap. iv. 10—13. In Him all fulness dwells, and we are filled full in Him, who is the head of principalities and powers, Col. ii. 9, 10. Dr. Whitby.

The things here asserted by the Apostle, if duly considered, will be found to have as great influence upon our minds and actions, as any articles of our faith whatsoever. For is Christ our Saviour exalted at the right hand of God? Are all things put under His feet? What a glorious, what a mighty Saviour then have we in heaven! How well may we believe and trust on Him for all things necessary to our salvation!—Is Christ given to be Head over all things to the church? How then can the gates of hell ever prevail against it, or against any sound member of it? What can we want, what need we fear, who have Him, that hath all things under Him, always ready to supply and help us? What can He not do for us, that He will? And what will He not do for us, that He can?—Is the church the body of Christ, "the fulness of Him that filleth all in all?" What love and care then must Christ needs have for His church, nourishing and cherishing it even as His own flesh! And what love should all the members of the church have for Him, as well as for one another! What care to serve, honour, and obey Him! How soberly, how righteously, how godly should they live, who are so nearly related to Him, that is Head over all things in the world! And who would not be in the number of them? Bp. Beveridge.

Chap. II. In this chapter the Apostle shews, 1st, That when all men, both Jews and Gentiles, were dead in their sins, God saved them by Jesus Christ; and he observes particularly, that they were indebted for this great benefit to the sole mercy of God, who had delivered them from a state of condemnation and corruption, and had given them a capacity of doing good works. 2dly, He puts the Ephesians in mind that they were formerly heathens, and excluded from the covenant of God; and speaks of the favour God had shewn them, in removing the distinction which was between them and the Jews, and in uniting them so as to be but one people, and from thenceforward to compose all of them together but one family and one temple, holy to the Lord. Osterwald.

Ver. 1. And you hath he quickened,] The words "hath He quickened" are not in the original, but are supplied from the 5th verse; "you who were dead," in the first verse, so directly

This evil spirit is here said inwardly "to work in the children of disobedience;" and elsewhere, to "take them captive at his will," 2 Tim. ii. 26; and their conversion is styled a recovery of them "from the power of Satan," Acts xxvi. 18. Dr. Whitby.

"Children of wrath" means liable to, or worthy of, wrath. It is a Hebrew phrase. Parkhurst.

6. And hath raised us up together, &c.] And as He hath quickened us out of this spiritual death, so in Christ our head He hath also, in assured hope, raised us up from the dead, and set us with Him in heaven: for He, who is our Head, sitting there, we are at present not unfitly said to sit there also, and shall infallibly come thither in due time. Dr. Hammond.

—— his kindness toward us] That is, towards the Gentiles also, in calling them home to Him through Jesus Christ. Bp. Hall.

8. For by grace are ye saved &c.] For ye are delivered out of that heathen state by the mere undeserved mercy of God, who might justly have left you in it, without ever calling you, who had so sinned against it, out of it: and the preaching of the Gospel, which hath been the means of rescuing you thus, is a mere free, undeserved gift of God, the matter of the Gospel being no way to be known but by Divine revelation, and God having sent Christ, and Christ His Apostles, to make that known to you, without which you had never heard, as without hearing you could never have believed, such supernatural truths: and all this was an act of God's free will and merciful pleasure. Dr. Hammond.

Our translation of this passage is a little ambiguous; and many people have unhappily concluded from it, that faith is the gift of God; a gift, I mean, in some peculiar sense; such a gift as is not vouchsafed to mankind in general, like the gift of reason or any other common blessing; but is appropriated only to the select few, who are thereby enabled to lay hold on Christ, while all the rest of their brethren are necessarily lost for want of it. Now this is a very great mistake; for the Scriptures contain no such assertion: and the words of the text in particular say nothing about any kind of faith, as a gift of God, but refer wholly to another matter. The assertion of the Apostle is plainly this, That salvation by grace is the gift of God; that it is not of ourselves, or to be derived from any works of ours, lest any man should boast. This is the substance of the doctrine; and the original Greek can signify nothing else. But as to faith, that is mentioned only as the means, or an instrument of obtaining the salvation here declared. Dean Tucker.

The Apostle here intended to declare, that salvation by grace through faith is not derived from man, but is the free gift of God through faith in Christ; as he says in another place, "the gift of God is eternal life," Rom. vi. 23. By this expression, "ye are saved," St. Paul did not mean to tell the Ephesian converts, that their salvation had actually taken place, or that it was certain; but that they were enabled to obtain salvation. Salvation itself will not actually take place till the sentence is pronounced at the day of judgment; and it can scarcely be supposed that every Christian then at Ephesus will be finally saved. But every person who embraces the Gospel is certain of inheriting eternal happiness, provided he complies with the conditions upon which it is promised. We meet with similar expressions in other parts of the New Testament. "According to His mercy He saved us by the washing of regeneration," Tit. iii. 5. No one will contend that every baptized person is actually saved, or certain of salvation, although every baptized person, "if he continue in the faith grounded and settled, and be not moved away from the hope of the Gospel," Col. i. 23, will undoubtedly be saved. The same observations will apply to the passages, "Baptism doth now save us," 1 Pet. iii. 21; "we are saved by hope," Rom. viii. 24; "unto us which are saved it is the power of God," 1 Cor. i. 18; "who hath saved us, and called us with an holy calling," 2 Tim. i. 9. The persons here spoken of were not actually and completely saved, but, being "reconciled to God by the death of His son," Rom. v. 10, they had now the means of salvation, of which they could not fail but through their own neglect. The Gospel is called in Scripture, "the way which leadeth unto life," Matt. vii. 14; "a new and living way," Heb.

x. 20; and "the way of salvation," Acts xvi. 17; and for this inestimable benefit we are solely indebted to the grace of God, it is "not of ourselves;" it is not to be ascribed to any work or merit of our own; it is the gift of God gratuitously offered to His fallen and sinful creatures. In this passage St. Paul says, "by grace ye are saved," and in the Epistle to the Philippians he commands the converts to "work out their own salvation." In this, says Dr. Jortin, there is no inconsistency. Men are saved by grace, because, without God's favourable assistance and acceptance of their imperfect endeavours, they could not of themselves acquire eternal life; and at the same time it is no less true, that they work out their own salvation, because, unless they exert their own powers, the grace of God alone will in no wise force them to be saved. Thus God's working in or with us, and our working together with God, are easily reconciled. Bp. Tomline.

9. Not of works,] Not from any merits of yours to move God to it. Dr. Hammond. This salvation is not of works, lest any man should find cause of boasting in himself, that he hath earned it at God's hand, and therefore is not beholden to His mercy. Bp. Hall.

Hall.*

The Apostle means, that it was the design of God by the Gospel to prepare and enable men to live that life of purity and virtue, which will qualify them for life eternal. Pyle.

As none can do good works, but they who are created in Christ Jesus; so, to manifest ourselves to be created in Him, it is absolutely necessary that we do all the good works we can in our several vocations and callings; and that they who do so are the most happy persons upon earth; whatsoever their calling and condition may be, and whatsoever other persons may say or think of them. For they do the will of God upon earth as it is done in heaven: they shine as lights in the world; they have the honour to honour God and to be honoured by Him, 1 Sam. ii. 30. They have the pleasure of pleasing Him that governs the whole world; who therefore takes them into His own particular care and protection; makes their enemies to be at peace with them, Prov. xvi. 7; supplies them with all things both for life and godliness; directs and prospers them in all their undertakings; makes all things work together for their good while they live, and then saith to every one of them, Well done, good and faithful servant; enter thou into the joy of the Lord. *Bp. ——the covenants of promise,] Though the covenant in substance was one and the same, the Apostle here speaks of it in the plural number, as he does also Rom. ix. 4, as it was given out at several times, with various explications and enlargements, not only to Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, but afterwards to the whole church of Israel. And as the promises which it contained centered in the great promise of the Messiah, and of salvation by Him, he therefore speaks of them in the singular number, but as one promise, which is agreeable to the Scripture style in other places. Dr. Doddridge.

——having no hope,] No firm and lively hope of spiritual and future blessings. Dr. Whitby. The heathens had among them the doctrine of a future state, and it was popularly taught and generally believed by the common people. But they reasoned very weakly upon the subject; they had no well grounded hope of future happiness; and they were very little impressed with it, so that they had no Deity, to whom they prayed for eternal life, as the Fathers often remonstrate. And by far the greater part of their most learned philosophers, either expressly denied in private lectures to their pupils the doctrine of future rewards and punishments, or taught principles quite inconsistent with it. Dr. Doddridge.

between both, (that is, both Jew and Gentile,) and God; namely, the guilt of sin, which was the cause of it, and which Christ removed, by making a full, perfect, and sufficient satisfaction for the sins of the whole world upon the cross. Dr. Wells.

17. —to you which were afar off, and to them that were nigh.] Both to the Gentiles, and to the Jews. Though Christ did not in His own person preach peace to the Gentiles, He gave commission to His Apostles to preach to them, Matt. xxviii. 19; and they executed His commission. Burkitt.

18. For through him &c.] That is, through the merits of Christ's death both Jews and Gentiles have liberty to worship the Father by the same spiritual form of worship, and by the assistance of the one Spirit of God. Dr. Macknight.

The economy of God in the Gospel dispensation is shut up by the Apostle in these few words, "We have access unto the Father through Christ by the Spirit." To have a distinct conception of this, and of the different offices of the Son and of the Spirit, we must conceive the Spirit of God as always present with us; the Son, as always in the presence of the Father. The Spirit dwells with the faithful, to guide and to direct them, to second and encourage all their good desires, to help them in overcoming their infirmities; in a word, to labour together with them in the work of their salvation, to make their calling and election sure. The Son of God is at the right hand of the Majesty on high; there He is our advocate, He intercedes for us, He receives and offers up our prayers, He obtains for us the remission of our sins, in virtue of the one oblation which He once made of Himself upon the cross, the memorial of which is ever in the sight of God. This will teach us what it is to "have access by the Spirit, through Christ." For the Spirit abideth with us, He is at our right hand, and by His happy influence it is that we draw near to Christ, and by Him approach to the Father. The Son is our High Priest, clothed with majesty and power, and seated at the right hand of God, able to save all who will come to Him; through whose powerful and always prevailing mediation and intercession, the way is opened to pardon and reconciliation. The Spirit is our Comforter, given us to dwell and to abide with us, to be a principle of life within us to quicken our mortal bodies, that dying to sin, we may live unto God through holiness. To draw men to God is the work of the Spirit, who therefore resides and dwells with men: to reconcile God to man is the work of our High Priest, who lives in the glory of God, making continual intercession for us. Bp. Sherlock.

19. —strangers] All the nations of the world, except the Jews, were called strangers to the God of Israel, but the Jews were said to be near to Him. But now, saith the Apostle, there is no such difference: the believing Gentiles being equally with the believing Jews admitted to the privileges of the new Jerusalem, and equally related to God, as part of His family. Burkitt, Dr. Whitby.

——fellowcitizens with the saints,] That is, members of the commonwealth of the people of God. Dr. Wells.

20. —of the apostles and prophets,] Upon the truth of all the prophecies of the Old, and the Apostolical doctrines of the New Testament. Pyle. Or, the Jewish prophets may be called the foundation of the church of God, because they preached in an obscure manner most of the doctrines of the Gospel. Dr. Macknight.

——Jesus Christ himself being the chief corner stone;] Who supports and cements the whole building, both of believing Jews and Gentiles, and unites both into one body by His Spirit. Dr. Whitby.

22. —for an habitation of God through the Spirit.] The meaning of this allegory seems in short to be this: According to what was foretold by the Prophets of the Old Testament, and preached now by the Apostles of the New, the believing Gentiles as well as Jews are equally members of Christ's kingdom; being united together without any distinction under Christ their head by the Spirit, into such a well-framed body, that God will delight in them as His people, and dwell amongst them as in a well-framed building set apart or dedicated to His service. Dr. Wells.

Chap. III. After St. Paul had taught in the foregoing chapter, that the Gentiles who had embraced Christianity composed but one people with the converted Jews, he tells the Ephesians that he was a prisoner at Rome for preaching this doctrine, the Jews having accused him, and delivered him to the Gentiles for no other reason. He observes, that the calling of the Gentiles had been formerly a hidden mystery, and unknown to mankind; but that God had foretold it by the Prophets, and revealed it to the Apostle by the Holy Ghost; and exhorts the Ephesians not to be disheartened at the afflictions which he endured, and which were so glorious and profitable for them. He next beseeches God to confirm them in His calling, to strengthen them in faith, charity, and all kind of spiritual gifts, and to give them the grace to know more and more the great and wonderful love of our Lord Jesus Christ. Ostervald.

Ver. 1. For this cause] Namely, because I assert that these privileges belong equally to the believing Gentiles, though they be not circumcised; this being the reason why the Jews so fiercely persecuted him, and forced him to appeal unto Cesar, Acts xxii. 22; xxv. 11, 12; xxvi. 17. Dr. Whitby.

5. Which in other ages was not made known] It was indeed known long before that the Gentiles should be added to the church, but it was not known that they should be heirs of the same inheritance, and partakers of the promise of the Spirit. The Jews rather thought of their being slaves to them; and least of all did they imagine, that the middle wall of their ceremonies should be broken down, and the Gentiles be admitted to the full privileges of God's people without circumcision and obedience to the Mosaick law; which the Christian converts among the Jews heard of at first with great amazement, Acts x. 45; xi. 18. Drs. Hall.

Though the angels, who "desire to look into" the types and figures of the law, 1 Pet. i. 12, may have had a general notion of the Divine purposes respecting mankind from the ancient revelations, yet the actual execution of God's purposes in the coming of His Son, in His death and resurrection, and in the constitution of the Christian church by the union of the Jews and Gentiles therein through faith, must, as St. Paul here affirms, when explained in the preaching of the Apostle's, have increased the knowledge of the heavenly powers, by affording them new proofs of the wisdom of God, which is infinitely various, and which hath illustriously displayed itself in bringing these great events to pass. Dr. Macknight.

12. — access with confidence] To God the Father, "by the faith of Him;" that is, the faith we have in Christ as our Mediator. Dr. Whitby.

13. — which is your glory.] The Apostle's sufferings in maintaining the privileges of the Gentile converts were a proof of his sincerity, and a confirmation of the truth of the doctrine he preached among them. The Ephesians therefore might well think it an honour done to them, as well as an indispensable engagement to them to continue firm in their profession. Dean Stanhope.

14. For this cause I bow my knees] Thereby expressing the reverent frame of his heart in prayer. Burkitt.

15. Of whom the whole family in heaven and earth is named,] The angels in heaven, and saints on earth, being styled the sons of God. Dr. Whitby. Or, All the saints of earth, whether Jews or Gentiles, and all the glorified saints and angels in heaven, making the same family; namely, the one universal church of Christ. Bp. Hall, Burkitt.

16. That he would grant you, &c.] St. Paul here prays that the Holy Ghost would convey into the minds of the Ephesians such additions of Divine grace as might be a sufficient preservative against temptations and infirmities; that He would increase their abilities to resist and overcome, in proportion as their conflicts and their necessities increase, which he calls "strengthening with might;" and that this might be in such abundance as is answerable to the greatness of that power, which enables, and of that goodness, which disposes, God to liberality, in supplying all the exigencies of His faithful servants. For such exuberance of bounty appears to be meant by the strength of the Spirit being distributed "according to the riches of His glory." Dean Stanhope.

17. That Christ may dwell in your hearts by faith;] See John xiv. 23; Eph. ii. 22. Hence it appears, that the communication of the grace of that Spirit, which is inseparable from the Father and the Son, is the manner of their dwelling in men's hearts. This must be understood to take place when all our affections are subject and devoted to Christ; when our faith is firm and constant, and the only principle whereby we are governed; so as to value and desire nothing in comparison of what He would have us do, and what He hath promised to give us. Dean Stanhope.

—— that ye, being rooted and grounded in love,] That is, so fervent a love of God, as (like a tree that is set deep and hath taken strong hold, or like a house whose foundation is broad, firm, and well-wrought) is not to be shaken by the most violent storms of adversity and persecution. Dean Stanhope.

18. — what is the breadth, and length, and depth, and height;] The Apostle by enumerating these dimensions only intends to signify the exceeding greatness of the love of Christ, "which passeth knowledge." Thus Job speaks of the unsearchable wisdom of God, and His unfathomable perfections, Job xi. 7, 8. See also Ecclus. i. 3, and Rom. xi. 33. In this sense the passage imports, what the Apostle styles, ver. 8, "the unsearchable riches of Christ." Dr. Whitby.

19. And to know the love of Christ, which passeth knowledge,] The knowledge of which may be attained in some measure, so that it is our duty to seek after it and search into it, though after all we can never fully comprehend it. Burkitt.

—— that ye might be filled with all the fulness of God.] That so ye may be endued with the highest measures of all spiritual graces, of which your present condition is capable. Dean Stanhope.

20. — according to the power that worketh in us,] Namely, the power of the Holy Spirit, confirming the Gospel by signs and wonders, and enabling believers to cast off their former sinful courses, and to live godly lives. Dr. Wells.

21. Unto him be glory in the church by Christ Jesus] Through whom we offer up all prayers and praises, Heb. xiii. 15; Eph. v. 20. Dr. Whitby.

The sublime doxology, or form of giving glory to God, is to be considered, not only as a strong expression of the Apostle's admiration of God's goodness to men, but also as a means of strengthening the faith of the Ephesians. For lest the great blessings which he had taught them to expect might seem too much for sinful creatures to receive, more than God would be willing to bestow, he ends the doctrinal part of his Epistle, in which these blessings are described, with a doxology to God, as both able and willing to bestow upon believers blessings far more and greater than they are able to ask, or even to conceive. Dr. Macknight.

As our Saviour bids us to "offer our prayers in His name," John xiv. 13; xv. 16; xvi. 23, 24; that is, representing unto God His meritorious performance, in our behalf, as the ground of our access to God, of our hope to obtain from Him what we request: so also we are enjoined by His Apostle in this Epistle, chap. v. 20, to "give thanks in His name;" that is, with persuasion and acknowledgment, that only in respect to Him we become capable to receive or enjoy any good thing; that, in effect, all the blessings by Divine mercy vouchsafed us have been procured by Him for us, are through Him conveyed unto us. And thus also we should do all things in the name of Jesus, offering all our deeds to God, as sacrifices and services unworthy of acceptance, both in themselves, and as proceeding from us; but pleasing and acceptable to God only for His sake. Dr. Isaac Barrow.

All intercourse betwixt heaven and earth, God and man, is in and through Him. If any grace come from God to us, it is by Christ: if any glory come from us to God, it is by Christ too. "Unto Him be glory in the church by Christ Jesus." Bp. Sanderson.

Chap. IV. St. Paul here begins to exhort the Ephesians to the duties of a Christian life, recommending to them, before all things, peace and concord. To induce them to it, he shews, 1st, That all Christians enjoy in common the same spiritual advantages; that the different gifts which Christ granted to men, after His ascension into heaven, and the different offices He had appointed in the church, did all tend to the mutual edification of the faithful; to unite them to each other, so as to make but one body; to confirm them in truth and holiness, and guide them by this means to perfection and salvation. 2dly, After this the Apostle exhorts the Ephesians not to live as they had done before their conversion to Christianity, and as the heathens still did; but to lead a life entirely new, and conformable to the precepts of the Gospel of Christ. He warns them particularly against the impurities and dissoluteness of the heathens, as well as lying, theft, wrath, obscene discourses, slander, and all bitterness and animosities. Ostervald.

Ver. 1. I therefore, the prisoner of the Lord,)] Who am at this time a prisoner for the cause of Christ; see chap. iii. 1, from whence to this place seems to be one long parenthesis. Dr. Hammond.

3. Endeavouring to keep the unity of the Spirit in the bond of peace.] The words signify a diligent, industrious, and united endeavour to preserve and maintain an union of heart and spirit, an unity of faith and doctrine, an unity of judgment and affection, amongst all the professors of Christianity. And the means, by which this duty may be performed, is "the bond of peace," or a peaceable disposition and deportment, which binds Christians together, whereas discord and division cuts that bond asunder. Burkitt.

Some interpret this of the unity of faith and doctrine, in opposition to heresy; and so meekness and humility appear in not preferring private opinions before those of our brethren; especially of the spiritual superiours and pastors of the church. But it seems rather meant of the unity of affection or charity, opposed to schisms and factions in the church, and hatred in other matters: which is chiefly done by not preferring our own interests and desires against other men. But we may say that these depend one upon the other, for we seldom see sincere charity where there is a diversity of opinions. Bp. Fell.

4. There is one body, &c.] The Apostle, having exhorted the Ephesians to labour to preserve concord and unity in opinion and judgment by unity of affection, adds the following indispensable obligations to the duty. That the church of Christ is one body; that His Spirit is the one soul animating that body; that we all aim at and expect one reward; acknowledge one Master; profess one faith; are initiated by one baptism; are sons of the same Father, whose majesty is over all, whose providence orders all, and whose graces are in all. Dean Stanhope. So many are the obligations, so strong the bonds and ties, which lie upon all the members of the church, to be at unity among themselves, of one judgment, and of one heart. Burkitt.

5. — one baptism,] Iteration of baptism once given, hath always been thought a manifest contempt of that ancient apostolick aphorism, "one Lord, one faith, one baptism:" baptism not only one, inasmuch as it hath every where the same substance, and offereth unto all men the same grace: but one also, for that it ought not to be received by any one man above once. We serve that Lord which is but one, because no one can be joined with Him; we embrace that faith, which is but one, because it admitteth no innovation; that baptism we receive which is but one, because it cannot be received often. For how should we practise iteration of baptism, and yet teach, that we are by baptism born anew; that by baptism we are admitted unto the heavenly society of saints; that those things be really and effectually done by baptism, which are no more possible to be often done, than a man can naturally be often born, or civilly be often adopted into any one stock or family. This also is the cause why they that present us unto baptism, are entitled for ever after our parents in God, and the reason why there we receive new names, in token that by baptism we are made new creatures. As Christ hath therefore died and risen from the dead but once, so that sacrament, which both extinguisheth in Him our former sin, and beginneth in us a new condition of life, is by one only actual administration for ever available, according to that in the Nicene Creed, "I acknowledge one baptism for the remission of sins." Hooker.

7. — according to the measure of the gift of Christ.] In such measures as Christ knows will be best for the church's benefit. So that none ought to be dissatisfied with his own, or to undervalue those of another. Pyle.

8. Wherefore he saith, &c.] See Ps. lxviii. 18, and the note there. That this Psalm relates to the Messiah, we learn from the Jews themselves. Dr. Whitby.

—— When he ascended up on high, &c.] "He," that is, Christ. Christ therefore is the "Lord God." The Scripture, here referred to, expressly affirms the person who ascended to be "the Lord." Jones of Nayland.

—— he led captivity captive,] This is a common phrase in the Old Testament, to signify a conquest over enemies, especially over such as formerly had led their present conquerors captive. Dr. Whitby.

—— and gave gifts unto men.] The word is 'received' in the Greek version of the 68th Psalm: the Hebrew signifying both 'to give' and 'to receive.' Dr. Hammond. He received gifts, in order to give them to men. Dr. Whitby.

It is supposed that there is an allusion here to the custom of kings, who after victories and on other great occasions distributed gifts among their subjects. Such was the case with David, when he brought up the ark, 1 Chron. xvi. 3; and of Solomon at the dedication of the temple, 1 Kings viii. 65. Dr. Macknight. Though the Roman instances of this custom are perhaps the most familiar to our minds, yet all, who are acquainted with antiquity, know that it was not peculiar to that people. Compare Judg. v. 28—30. Dr. Doddridge.

9. — into the lower parts of the earth?] These words may well refer to the incarnation of Christ, according to the expression of David, in Ps. cxxxix. 15; or to His burial, according to the saying of the same Prophet, Ps. lxiii. 9. Bp. Pearson. And the verse may be thus paraphrased: Now that expression of ascending up on high hath reference to some former coming down. And so did this King and Conqueror descend from the utmost height when incarnate, and vouchsafing to live on this earth; and yet more so, when not disdaining to die, and to be buried in it. Dean Stanhope.

10. He that descended is the same &c.] He therefore is now returned back to His heavenly throne, the highest and most glorious that can be, to exercise an universal dominion, and to diffuse His influences over every part of His mystical body, the church. Dean Stanhope.

"Far above all heavens," is an expression similar to that in Heb. vii. 26; and consequently means Messiah's exaltation above all the angelical hosts inhabiting the heavens. See Phil. ii. 9—11. Dr. Macknight.

11. And he gave some, apostles; &c.] To which purpose it is, that He qualified persons for, and sent them in, the several capacities here mentioned; some to reveal, some to foretell and explain, His will; some to propagate and record it; others to govern according to it, and instruct in it where it was already received. Dean Stanhope. Concerning these offices, see the notes on Rom. xii. 6, 7; 1 Cor. xii. 28.

Whilst the church of Christ is here militant upon earth, He exerciseth His regal power, not only in subduing its enemies, but likewise in appointing and commissioning officers to administer His word and sacraments, and the discipline that He hath settled in it, for the increasing, strengthening, and well governing of the whole, and also of every part of it. This He did most sensibly, when He first ascended up to heaven, by sending down His Holy Spirit in a visible manner upon His Apostles, that all the world might know that the gifts and graces of the Spirit all come from the Lord Christ, as He is exalted at the right hand of God. It was by Him that the Patriarchs and Prophets were inspired in the Old Testament, as well as the Apostles and Evangelists in the New; and it is still He who appoints and empowereth officers of His church, for the edifying and well governing of His people; they are His ministers, His ambassadours, acting only in His name; and it is He only who makes their ministry effectual, to the ends for which He hath ordained it; for which purpose also He is always present with them, in the execution of their respective offices under Him. "And, lo!" saith He, "I am with you alway, even unto the end of the world," Matt. xxviii. 20. Bp. Beveridge.

12. —for the work of the ministry,] For the full and exact discharge of the great work of the ministry, which could not be sufficiently managed by any one rank of gifts or men. Bp. Hall.

—— for the edifying of the body of Christ:] As man is a social creature, and capable of receiving at least as much benefit from uniting in religion, as in other things; so our blessed Lord hath formed His followers into a spiritual society or church; to celebrate the worship of God more solemnly, and bear a publick testimony to His truth; to exhort, and "provoke one another unto love and to good works," Heb. x. 24, 25; to "restore in the spirit of meekness them that are overtaken in faults," Gal. vi. 1; but to "put away from amongst them the" grossly and obstinately "wicked," 1 Cor. v. 13. And that all this may be performed in a due manner, He hath instituted a regular subordination and succession of "pastors and teachers, for the perfecting of the saints, for the edifying of the body of Christ." evidently suitable both to the nature of a being, which so greatly wants instruction and admonition as man; and to the nature of a religion, that will so well bear to be shown in a full light. However defectively, therefore, or wrongly, this institution may be administered through the faults of Christian ministers, or how much soever it may be despighted, or obstructed, through the faults of the people, yet, in itself, it is visibly of excellent use; and which is remarkable, peculiar to the religion delivered in Scripture. For in the Gentile world, through many centuries, we have no one instance of any publick teaching, much less any moral discipline, attending their worship. And indeed, when Julian attempted to set up preachers of heathenism, in opposition to those of Christianity, it was immediately foretold him, and the event verified the prediction, that what had proved so effectual to establish truth, would only serve to expose and ruin errour. Abp. Secker.

13. — unto a perfect man, unto the measure &c.] That is, to such degrees of piety and perfection, as are esteemed the maturity and full growth of Christians, according to those measures of each, whereof our nature and state are capable. Dean Stanhope.

The phrase, "a perfect man," means an adult, one full grown, of full age, as opposed to 'little children,' or 'infants:' see the next verse. In this view it is applied spiritually to Christians according to the original of 1 Cor. xiv. 20; Heb. v. 14. The classical writers of Greece employ the word in the same sense. Parkhurst.

14. — by the sleight of men,] A metaphor taken from gamesters, who delude others by their arts and sleight of hand. Dr. Hammond, Burkitt.

The men, whose base arts the Apostle described in this passage, were the unbelieving Jews, and the heathen philosophers, who opposed the Gospel by sophistry and calumny; also such false teachers, as arose in the church itself, and corrupted the doctrines of the Gospel for worldly purposes, whilst they assumed the appearance of great disinterestedness and piety. Dr. Macknight.

15. But speaking the truth in love, &c.] But that, preserving unity of faith and charity, we may improve, as members in unity with the Head, and grow in all Christian knowledge, and in all Christian graces, in conformity to Him. Drs. Hammond and Wells.

16. From whom the whole body &c.] That is, from which head, the whole body of Christians duly compacted together, some sustaining the office of an inferiour head, some of an eye, some of an hand, some of a foot, 1 Cor. xii. 15—17, by the assistance, which every one of these parts, thus united together, gives to the whole, according to the particular proportion of its gifts, increaseth or grows in love, and so all the members edify each other. Dr. Whitby.

From what the Apostle says in this, and in other places, about edifying the church, it appears that to advance the peace, order, and unity of this common body is, in Scripture language, the true Christian edification. Consequently whatever tends to make any breach or division in that body, is contrary to, and destructive of, edification: consequently again, separating from a regular established church, or leaving one's proper pastor, on pretence of edifying more elsewhere, is as much as to say we intend to strengthen a wall by drawing out the stones; or that we design the improvement of health, vigour, and beauty in the body natural, by unnecessarily taking away the useful limbs, and loosing the ligaments, which should compact and keep them in their functions. The edification, together with the union of the church, must be produced by every little vessel, to which every private Christian bears proportion, doing its proper office in that part, where nature hath placed it. And whatever disorder or mischief would follow in the one case, from any dislocation or defect of such vessel; the like deformity and confusion will as certainly ensue in the other case, as often as any member of the body shall either perversely depart from his station, where Providence hath placed him, or slothfully neglect the duties that belong to it. Dean Stanhope.

17. This I say therefore,] The Apostle having finished his grand exhortation to love and unity amongst all Christians, and enforced it with the most weighty arguments and motives, now proceeds to press upon the Ephesians the practice of particular duties. Burkitt.

—— and testify in the Lord,] Or rather, 'beseech,' or 'charge' you. Parkhurst.

—— that ye henceforth walk not as other Gentiles walk,] That being now converted Christians, ye walk no more like ignorant and unconverted heathens. Burkitt.

—— in the vanity of their mind,] The expression comprehends not only idolatry, Acts xiv. 15, which the legislators and philosophers pretended to justify upon political principles, but all the vices flowing from, and connected with, idolatry, and of which the Apostle hath given a particular account, Rom. i. 24. Now as idolatry was no where practised with greater splendour, or with more allurements than at Ephesus; and as it was no where more ingeniously defended; and its influence in corrupting the human mind was no where more conspicuous; it was highly proper to set before the Ephesians a picture of their ancient manners, with an express injunction to relinquish them. Dr. Macknight.

In the ages following the days of Noah, by degrees negligence and wickedness introduced ignorance and superstition; and these in their turn augmented negligence and wickedness, till the patriarchal doctrines were forgotten or perverted; the spiritual worship of God laid aside for idolatry, and His nature and perfections so grossly misunderstood, that it is no wonder if pardon of sin, assistance in right conduct, and a recompense after death, were either not thought of, or expected on conditions absurd, and even immoral. For the knowledge of the commonest duties of life was in many cases utterly lost; and shocking crimes considered as perfectly lawful, nay exalted into acts of religion. Thus then did the nations of the earth, to speak in the language of St. Paul, "walk in the vanity of their mind, having the understanding darkened, being alienated from the life of God." Abp. Secker.

18. Having the understanding darkened,] By a long course of sin, so that they see not that, which by the light of nature they are enabled to see. Dr. Hammond.

——through the ignorance that is in them, &c.] Having lost all sense of the absurdity and vileness of the grossest sins; and so not only prostituted themselves to the practice, but by custom hardened themselves into a liking of, and delight in, and eagerness after, the most filthy carnalities.

The absolute necessity, as well as the invaluable benefits, of that Divine revelation and grace, which is ministered by the Gospel of Christ, needs no other evidence than the description given in these three verses by St. Paul, of those miserable circumstances, to which the heathens were reduced for want of them. The wretched ignorance and errours, whereby the light of the Lord within them, the faculties of reason and judgment, were almost quite extinguished: the total depravation of the will and affections, addicted and fastened down to objects of flesh and sense, and irreconcileably averse to all the ends and methods, wherein the dignity of human nature, and the excellency of a spiritual and divine life, consist: the utter insensibility and obduration of the heart and conscience, which customary sinning produces, partly by men's own obstinate indulgence of their wicked lusts, and resisting the checks and admonitions of their own and God's Spirit, and partly by that judicial hardness, which God is provoked to inflict by withdrawing those preventing and assisting graces, which they have continued to abuse and despise: and lastly, the inability of corrupt nature to discern and apply itself to matters of religion, plainly demonstrated by the examples of eminent heathen philosophers, who, though exceedingly shrewd and sagacious in other respects, were yet in this mistaken and absurd, even to the most despicable degree of childishness and folly: these are experiments, too plain to be gainsaid, and such as conspire at once to give us a very mean opinion of our own natural powers, and oblige us to thankfulness for those supernatural assistances, to which we owe the very capacity, either of pleasing God, or of thinking and acting like men. Dean Stanhope.

20. But ye have not so learned Christ;] The contrary to all which ye have been taught by the Christian religion. Dr. Hammond. This may perhaps intimate that there was a manner of learning Christ, which might seem more consistent with such irregularities, and may glance on some teachers, who called themselves Christians, yet took very little care to inculcate practical religion. Many passages in the Apostle's writings shew this to have been actually the case, though it seems these teachers had not much footing at Ephesus. Compare 2 Tim. iv. 3. Dr. Doddridge.

21. If so be that ye have heard him,] Forasmuch as ye have heard of Him by us His Apostles. Dr. Wells. See the note on chap. iii. 2.

——as the truth is in Jesus:] According to the truth of what God requires under the Gospel. Dr. Wells.

22, 24. That ye put off—the old man,—And that ye put on the new man,] "The old man" signifies those evil habits, which they so long practised in the state of heathenism; "the new man," that divine life, that life of righteousness and holiness, which Christianity requires. Dr. Whitby. Concerning the change here said to be wrought upon persons converted to Christianity, it may be observed, that the manner of the Apostle's expressing it intimates their becoming quite another sort of people, indeed the very reverse of what they had been before. "The old man to be put off," is said to be "corrupt according to the deceitful lusts;" those lusts, which cheated men with flattering promises of satisfaction that they cannot yield; and therefore the change in this point consists in stopping the ears against all false insinuations from that quarter, abandoning the unprofitable corruption, and having fruit unto holiness. This implies mortifying and renouncing all sinful desires; repenting and effectually forsaking all past faults. But "putting on the new man" implies a great deal more. It supposes activity and diligence in piety and virtue; doing good no less than abstaining from evil. This proves how sandy a foundation those hopes are built upon, which look for salvation and acceptance with God for not being vicious only; and, provided the sins of commission be carefully avoided, are as little concerned for those of omission, as if they were to make no article in our account. Dean Stanhope.

23. And be renewed in the spirit of your mind;] Be inwardly and cordially changed to new desires and pursuits. Dr. Hammond.

25. —for we are members one of another.] Either by our union into one mystical body, or as members of human society at large: and nothing is more pernicious to society than falshood, or tends more to destroy the security and mutual confidence, which ought always to be among men. Dean Stanhope, Burkitt.

26. Be ye angry, and sin not:] Anger is a passion, which is capable of serving excellent purposes, when managed with sobriety and discretion: and which the honour of God, the reverence due to the laws, the love of virtue, the protection of good men, may make, not only innocent, but necessary and commendable. Thus Moses was exceedingly provoked, and his "anger waxed hot," at the molten calf, which the Israelites had made to dishonour God and themselves in the wilderness, Exod. xxxii. 19. And our blessed Saviour, the perfect pattern of meekness and patience, is said not only to have been "grieved," but to have "looked upon the Pharisees with anger, because of the hardness of their hearts," Mark iii. 5. St. Paul also in this passage seems to imply, that some anger is warrantable with regard to private injuries and affronts; provided always that due care be taken to restrain its excess, and to conquer and compose it in time. It is therefore very observable how this caution runs, "Be ye angry, and sin not," &c. Meanwhile the manner of this exhortation plainly argues, that however lawful anger may be upon some occasions, and in some degrees; yet the justest anger cannot be excused, when it continues long. Dean Stanhope.

——let not the sun go down upon your wrath:] This precept was observed by the scholars of Pythagoras, who, when they had been angry and reproached one another, before the sun went down, shook hands, and embraced one another. This must the Christian do, as to the spirit of the precept, before he offers up to God his devotions, that so he may "lift up" to God "holy hands without wrath," 1 Tim. ii. 8. Dr. Whitby.

27. Neither give place to the devil.] To tempt you to any sinful action by doing mischief to the person you are angry with. Dr. Wells. It was a maxim with the Jews, Let a man be always on his guard against anger; for the malicious man is subject to the dominion of the infernal fiends. Dr. Whitby.

2 After general exhortations, to love, 3 to fly fornication, 4 and all uncleanness, 7 not to converse with the wicked, 15 to walk warily, and to be 18 filled with the Spirit, 22 he descendeth to the particular duties, how wives ought to obey their husbands, 25 and husbands ought to love their wives, 32 even as Christ doth his church.

small, or scarce any sin; and was rather countenanced than discouraged by some Grecian commonwealths, particularly in that of Lacedemon, where, Plutarch says, 'it was enacted or agreed that the free-born youths might steal whatever they could.' Pyle.

——but rather let him labour,] The reason for joining the prohibition of stealth with the precept of labour is obvious. 'Stealing,' saith St. Chrysostom, 'is an effect of idleness.' Dr. Hammond.

——that he may have to give &c.] This charity the primitive Christians expected even from them that laboured with their own hands. Dr. Whitby.

Even the poor should extend bounty to any that are still poorer, whenever they can really spare it. Nature and reason call upon them to do so; agreeably to which the Apostle requires men "to work with their own hands, that they may have to give to him that needeth." And as our Saviour hath taught us that our charities shall be estimated in proportion of our abilities, the lowest have as much encouragement as the highest to do, even in this way, all the good they can. Abp. Secker.

29. Let no corrupt communication proceed out of your mouth,] That is, speech offensive to the hearers, or which tends to corrupt their minds. See chap. v. 4. Obscene discourse of every kind is chiefly intended in this prohibition. The same character however is applicable likewise to calumny, railing, commendations of vice, and profane jestings on religion and its ministers: because all such speech is not only offensive to virtuous ears, but tends to corrupt those to whom it is addressed, by lessening their abhorrence of vice, and their reverence for piety and goodness. Dr. Macknight.

——but that which is good to the use of edifying, &c.] The same direction is repeated in other places. Now though this precept ought not to be extended to all, nor perhaps to most of the words which we utter, yet certainly it enjoins more than several persons imagine or perform. If, as our Lord observes, "out of the abundance of the heart the mouth speaketh," it must be said, though to some it may be a hard sentence, that he out of whose mouth religious and virtuous sentiments never proceed hath a heart void of all good qualities. He who loves his God and his duty will even undesignedly show some marks in his discourse, whatsoever be the subject of conversation; for true love will not be smothered and concealed; and if he hath discretion and good sense along with his piety, he will shew his zeal in such an easy, decent, and civil manner, as never to tire and disgust his company, unless his company be such as he would choose to avoid. Dr. Jortin.

30. And grieve not the holy Spirit of God, &c.] In fine, neither do nor say any thing, that may be inconsistent with those blessed endowments of the Holy Spirit, which are conferred upon you; or may deprive you of His sacred influences, which are the pledges of your present pardon, and the earnest of your eternal happiness. Pyle. The Holy Spirit being a Divine Person, it is certain that He cannot be properly grieved or vexed as we are. We therefore must remove from this expression, when it is applied to Him, all turbulent motions, all real pain, disquiet, discontent; and look upon it as spoken after the manner of men; intimating 1st, that we act towards Him in such a manner, as creates grief in our fellow-creatures, when we act so to them, as when we refuse to hearken to His counsels, rebel against His government, and do that which is opposite to His holy nature: 2dly, that He in consequence acts so towards us as men are wont to do, when they are grieved by us and displeased at us; withdrawing their former kindness, flying our company, and abandoning us to our enemies. Dr. Whitby. See the notes on Gen. vi. 6; Deut. i. 34.

——sealed unto the day of redemption.] See chap. i. 13, 14; Luke xxi. 28; Rom. viii. 23.

31. Let all bitterness, and wrath, &c.] It was probably the Apostle's design, in amassing so many almost synonymous expressions together, to shew that he would have them be on their guard against all malevolent passions, and those outrages of speech and expression, which they tend to produce. The like remark may be applied to many other passages of Scripture. Dr. Doddridge.

Chap. V. The first and second verses conclude the exhortation to love and unanimity in the end of the foregoing chapter. Then the Apostle repeats his caution against their former heathenish vices, particularly such as accompanied their idolatrous worship: and descends to the relative duties, wherein the Jewish Christians, by former prejudices, were too apt to be deficient. See the preface to this Epistle. Pyle.

Ver. 1. Be ye therefore followers of God, as dear children;] The former chapter having concluded with an exhortation to meekness, charity, and the forgiveness of injuries, enforced with a motive taken from the remembrance of God's goodness in forgiving us; our obligation to imitate such goodness is here further urged from the relation, which already is, and consequently the resemblance which there ought to be, between God and us, considered in the capacities of Father and children. Dean Stanhope.

2. And walk in love, as Christ also hath loved us, &c.] Not content with the single example of the love of God the Father in forgiving us, the Apostle proposes for our pattern that also of God the Son, in offering Himself a sacrifice, thereby to purchase this forgiveness for us. Dean Stanhope.

——for a sweetsmelling savour.] The Greek phrase in this place is very frequently used by the Seventy for the Hebrew phrase, which is often applied to the Patriarchal and Levitical sacrifices. See Gen. viii. 21; Exod. xxix. 18; Lev. i. 9, 13, 17; and many other passages. Parkhurst. It was applied to the sin-offering, Lev. iv. 31, as well as to the burnt-offering, Gen. viii. 21. It denotes the acceptableness of these offerings to God. Dr. Macknight.

3. But fornication, &c.] In this and the following verses the Apostle exhorts the Ephesians to shun several sins, which were frequently practised among the unconverted Gentiles. As first "fornication," and all sorts and degrees of "uncleanness," which was regarded with great indifference by heathens. Next he admonishes them to beware of "covetousness," that is, all irregular and inordinate desires and lusting after things forbidden in general, and particularly an insatiable love of riches, which in trading cities, such as Ephesus, usually much abounds. These sins he earnestly exhorts may not be "named amongst them;" not named with approbation, or without reprehension; much more not to be practised. Burkitt. "Not named" with allowance; "not named" with any extenuation; "not named," but with some detestation. Bp. Sanderson.

St. Paul here directs, that "fornication and all uncleanness be not once named amongst Christians." And the less they are named, even to caution against them, the better: provided it be well understood and considered, that they not only fill the lives of those who are guilty of them, and of others, with a variety of temporal sufferings, too commonly experienced; but fatally indispose them to the love of God and virtue, and disqualify them for the spiritual happiness of the world to come. Therefore, "dearly beloved, I beseech you, as strangers and pilgrims," whose chief interest lies not here, but in another state, "abstain from fleshly lusts, which war against the soul," 1 Pet. ii. 11. All ranks, both sexes, how strangely soever multitudes of one seem to forget it, are equally bound by this restraint; bound to avoid every thing likely to misguide their conduct, or to inflame their desires; and to employ their thoughts so constantly on what is good or lawful, as to exclude from them what is bad: for by such care early taken, the preservation of their innocence will be easy; which for want of it is falsely imagined impossible. Thus then, to speak in the words of our Apostle, "Let every man know how to possess his vessel in sanctification and honour, not in the lust of concupiscence, even as the Gentiles, which know not God," 1 Thess. iv. 4, 5. And to that end let every one, as Solomon advises, "keep his heart with all diligence, for out of it are the issues of life," Prov. iv. 23. Abp. Secker.

4. —nor foolish talking, nor jesting,] That these words are to be understood of obscene and filthy discourse, is probable, both from the vices mentioned in the preceding verse, with which they are connected, and from the reason given in the next for abandoning them. In Scripture language it is usual to express uncleanness by "folly:" and the word, rendered "jesting," has the signification of filthy or obscene speaking. The clause following, "which are not convenient," imports, not barely things not becoming, but things indecent, foul, highly unbecoming: a term especially appropriate to immodest behaviour. Dr. Hammond. See Rom. i. 28, and the note there.

5. —covetous man, who is an idolater,] Any thing that has our highest esteem and regard, and is the special object of our hope, our trust, and our care, this we make our God: thus the covetous man is an idolater. Burkitt.

6. Let no man deceive you with vain words:] As if these things might be consistent with the favour of God. Such cautions were not unnecessary. Among the heathens these vices were not only held indifferent, as appears from the writings of their most grave philosophers; but in many nations the laws allowed and provided for them, and in all places they connived at them. Hence even in the church of Corinth some had taught this doctrine. See 1 Cor. vi. 13. Dr. Whitby. The Apostle is the more urgent upon this subject, because the heathens avowedly practised these things even in the temples, as acts of worship which rendered them acceptable to their gods. See the note on Rom. i. 27. How different from heathenism is the Gospel, which teaches that they, who continue in these vices, shall be for ever excluded from the presence and kingdom of God! Dr. Macknight.

8. For ye were sometimes darkness, &c.] For consider how your circumstances are changed from a state of ignorance to one of clear knowledge in Jesus and His Gospel: and let your practice be such as becomes this knowledge. Dean Stanhope.

9. (For the fruit of the Spirit] By whom you are enlightened. Dr. Whitby.

10. Proving what is acceptable unto the Lord.] "Proving" it first, by means of the Gospel and other Scriptures; and then practising it. Dr. Wells.

11. And have no fellowship] By this is meant a great deal more than not living in the habit, or under the power, of these works; nay, or even than not complying with the temptations to them, and not committing them in our own persons. It means that we must declare our dislike and abhorrence of them, and employ all fit means of putting them to shame. Dean Stanhope.

——unfruitful works of darkness,] Not merely unprofitable, but, as the best Greek and Roman writers use similar expressions, works extremely wicked, hurtful, and pernicious. Parkhurst. See ver. 4.

——but rather reprove them.] Endeavour to expose their wickedness, and make the perpetrators ashamed of them. Pyle.

13. But all things that are reproved &c.] That is, which are discovered to be such as ought to be reproved, &c. Dr. Wells. The meaning is, that as light is that which renders every object clearly visible to the eye, so has the Christian religion demonstrated the vileness of these practices, and their danger to the minds of all that embrace them. Pyle.

14. Wherefore he saith, &c.] So that to this good effect may not unfitly be applied those passages of the Prophet Isaiah, chap. xxvi. 19; lx. 1; which describe the coming and kingdom of Christ, as means of raising men from death; rousing them from sleep, and bringing them out of a thick night of errour, and ignorance, and vice, into the bright sunshine of knowledge and virtue. Dean Stanhope. These lively and animating words seem to be an evangelical paraphrase of that passage in the Prophet Isaiah, which is a spiritual application of the most beautiful and magnificent image in nature, the rising of the sun upon the earth, with its effects and consequences: "Arise, shine; for thy light is come, and the glory of the Lord is risen upon thee." Bp. Horne.

17 Wherefore be ye not unwise, but understanding what the will of the Lord is.

18 And be not drunk with wine, wherein is excess; but be filled with the Spirit;

21 Submitting yourselves one to another in the fear of God.

16. Redeeming the time,] Redeeming, buying, gaining the time is, 1st, endeavouring to make amends for past negligence; but this seems not the Apostle's meaning: for he speaketh of present or imminent evil times: 2dly, using all prudent artifices and circumspection to preserve and redeem themselves from evil times; that is, either the snares and enticements of wicked company, or dangers of persecution for reproving them; so Dan. ii. 8, gaining time is saving themselves from danger: 3dly, Seeking all opportunities of doing as much good as you can in this short and evil time. Bp. Fell.

The wisdom or circumspection, required by St. Paul in this place, though it may very well be understood of Christian prudence in its utmost extent, is yet by very eminent interpreters presumed to bear a more especial regard to the circumstances of the converts from heathenism: and "the evil days" to intimate those dangers and temptations more particularly, to which the Ephesians were exposed by the enemies and persecutors of Christianity, who took every advantage of any imprudence in the professors of it. Dean Stanhope.

17. Wherefore be ye not unwise, &c.] Remember therefore, that though it be the will of God you should firmly adhere to your Christian principles, and labour to bring others over to them; yet it is not His will that you should indiscreetly lay yourselves open to their obstinate malice and rage. Pyle.

18. —wherein is excess;] Or dissoluteness: that is, whereby ye are laid open to other vices, especially uncleanness and riotous living; as is commonly the case with drunkenness, and was more particularly in the heathen bacchanals, to which St. Paul seems to allude. The word rendered "excess" is to the same effect as that used in Luke xv. 13. Drs. Wells and Hammond.

——but be filled with the Spirit;] Endeavour by a habit of temperance and sober conversation to be full of the gracious gifts and influences of the Holy Spirit. Pyle.

19. Speaking to yourselves in psalms &c.] In their bacchanalian feasts they sang drunken and impure hymns to Bacchus: in opposition to which the Apostle here exhorts the Christians to sing the Psalms of David; or the hymns composed by spiritual men, such as Zacharias and Simeon, or by the inspiration of the Spirit vouchsafed unto them, 1 Cor. xiv. 15. Dr. Whitby.

There are two ways by which a whole congregation may join together in praising God, both which are used in our Church, either first by having the psalms and hymns set to such ordinary and plain tunes, that all people may sing them together, as we do the Psalms of David in our parish churches, or else by singing or saying them alternately, as in cathedral and collegiate churches one side of the choir sings one verse, the other the next; in other places the minister repeats one verse, the people the other, and so on, all along to the end of the psalms and hymns appointed for that occasion; which is the most ancient way that we are acquainted with, used by the church of God. It was after some such manner that Moses and Miriam, and all the children of Israel, praised God for their deliverance from the Egyptians in that divine anthem that Moses composed for that purpose, as may be gathered from Exod. xv. 1, 20, 21; where Philo the learned Jew observes, that they sung with alternate harmonies, answering one another. At the building of the second temple, we read the priests and Levites sung together by course in praising and giving thanks unto the Lord, Ezra iii. 11. And in the vision which the Prophet Isaiah had of the seraphim singing in heaven, it is said, "And one cried unto another, and said, Holy, holy, holy, is the Lord of hosts; the whole earth is full of His glory," Isai. vi. 3. And when the four beasts in the Revelation had sung the same hymn, the four and twenty elders answered, as it were by course, saying, "Thou art worthy, O Lord, to receive glory and honour and power," Rev. iv. 8—11. To this way of singing St. Paul seems to allude in this place, where he saith to the Ephesians, "speaking to yourselves in psalms and hymns and spiritual songs, singing and making melody in your heart to the Lord." Where by psalms, I understand those of David's composing; by hymns, such anthems as were made up chiefly of praise and thanksgiving, by whomsoever composed; by spiritual songs, all sorts of songs upon any spiritual subject. These the Apostle would have them speak or sing to themselves, or to one another by course, as the words "to yourselves" here signify, being the same as "one another" in Col. iii. 16. And accordingly we find, from the testimony of Pliny, that the Christians in the first age did sing among themselves a hymn to Christ as God, by course, one after another. And this, as might be shewn, hath been the practice of the church of Christ all along, and is still continued among us, as being the most easy and proper way for all sorts of people to join together in setting forth the praises of God, and the best means whereby to keep our minds intent upon the great work we are about, and to assist, quicken, and excite one another in the performance of it. Bp. Beveridge.

20. Giving thanks—in the name of our Lord Jesus Christ;] Through whom our thanksgivings are acceptable to God. As all spiritual addresses, both of prayer and thanksgiving, must be offered up to God, so their acceptance with God is to be expected only by or through our Lord Jesus Christ. Burkitt.

The benefits, of which we are or may be partakers by the Gospel, are represented by the sacred writers as the best of God's gifts, the most inestimable blessings, and consequently as the principal objects of Christian gratitude: and therefore, as our Saviour hath taught us, when we pray to God, to pray in His name; so the Apostle informs us that, when we return praise to God, we should likewise give thanks to Him in the name of Jesus Christ. To return thanks to God in the name of Christ, is in effect to declare our faith and confidence in Christ, as in our Mediator and Redeemer, our High Priest and Intercessor; it is to express our humility, and to own that we could reasonably expect no good but through Him; it is to acknowledge that of all the favours which God confers upon us, those which we receive as Christians are the most to be esteemed, and should ever have the uppermost place in our thoughts. Dr. Jortin.

21. Submitting yourselves one to another in the fear of God.] The Apostle, having exhorted the Ephesians to such general duties as belong to all Christians, proceeds now to exhort them to the practice of relative duties, as they are members of society, and particularly as husbands and wives, parents and children, masters and servants: much of the life and power of religion appearing in the conscientious performance of relative duties. But first he gives them a general direction to "submit themselves one to another," or mutually to practise forbearance, condescension, and offices of love and kindness, "in the fear of God;" that is, either in obedience to the commands of God, who enjoins this subjection, or making the fear of God the rule and measure of their submission to one another. Burkitt.

The Apostle might the rather choose to insist on these duties, as some persons were ready to imagine, that Christian converts were released from any farther obligations to those, who still continued in a state of heathenism, and might consider the relation as dissolved between them. Compare 1 Cor. vii. 10—24; 1 Tim. vi. 1, 2. He therefore presses it upon them, in whatever station they were placed, to shew a due regard to relative duties, and to remember that Christian privileges did by no means excuse them from the duties resulting from natural and civil relations of life, but did rather enforce the obligation they were under to observe them. And if these duties were incumbent upon Christians towards relations of all kinds, even though they bore the character of unbelievers, much more were they engaged to practise these duties towards such as were related to them, not only by the ties of natural or of civil institution, but by the more endearing bonds of grace. Dr. Doddridge.

26. That he might sanctify and cleanse it &c.] That he might purify it from all sin: and to that end appointed baptism, therein obliging us to forsake the devil, the world, and the flesh, and covenanting to give us grace to do so; and to that adding His word, the whole doctrine, commands, and promises of the Gospel, as a powerful means to oblige and enable us to do so. Dr. Hammond.

30. For we are members of his body, &c.] Insomuch that as Adam said to Eve, "bone of my bones, and flesh of my flesh," so likewise in a mystical sense it may be said of us Christians, in respect of Christ, that we are "of His flesh, and of His bones." Dr. Wells.

32. This is a great mystery: &c.] This union and conjugal conjunction is then a great mystery; not in respect of itself only, but in respect of that also which is thereby represented, even the blessed union which is betwixt the husband Christ, and the church His spouse. Bp. Hall.

33. Nevertheless] On the other account also, "let every one of you" &c. Dr. Whitby.

Chap. VI. The Apostle proceeds in showing the Christian obligation to the other relative duties of parents and children, masters and slaves: then encourages them to general constancy and resolution against all temptations and persecutions, for the sake of Christianity: and, by metaphors taken from the arts of Grecian and Roman soldiery, directs the Ephesians how to arm themselves against the assaults of their spiritual enemies, desires their prayers for him, as their Gentile Apostle, and concludes with his blessing. Pyle.

Ver. 1. — in the Lord:] In compliance with the commandment of the Lord; or as far as their commandments are consistent with the law of God. Dr. Whitby.

2. — which is the first commandment with promise;] That is, a special promise: for that, which is annexed to the second commandment, is rather a general assertion than a special promise. Dr. Whitby.

3. That it may be well with thee, &c.] St. Paul seems to have thought, that the promise of long life to obedient children, was not cancelled by the clearer promises of eternal life under the Christian revelation. He says not, "that thy days may be long upon the land which the Lord thy God giveth thee;" that belonged only to the children of Israel: but he says, "that thou mayest live long on the earth;" intimating that every person who should fulfil the precept, had a title to the reward. Dr. Jortin. See the notes on Exod. xx. 12; Deut. v. 16.

4. — provoke not your children to wrath:] By severe treatment and rigid injunctions, see Col. iii. 21; but rather "bring them up in the nurture and admonition of the Lord," instructing them in the principles of piety towards God, and faith in our Lord Jesus Christ. This, saith Œcumenius, is the way to make them obedient; and if you furnish them with spirituals, temporal things will follow. Make them read the Scriptures, saith Theophylact, which is the duty of all Christians: for is it not a shame to instruct them in heathen authors, and not to instruct them in the oracles of God? Dr. Whitby.

—— bring them up in the nurture and admonition of the Lord.] The care of giving instruction to children usually belongs, in a peculiar degree, to their parents; who, having been the means of bringing them into the world, are most strongly bound to endeavour that their being may prove a benefit, not a cause of lamentation to them; and having been endued by Heaven with tender affections towards them, will be doubly sinners against them, if they are guilty of that worst of cruelty, not teaching them their duty; without which also, and it deserves a very serious consideration, they can no more hope for comfort in them here, than for acceptance with God hereafter. And therefore, both the Old Testament directed the Jews to teach their children diligently the words of God, Deut. vi. 6, 7; and the New enjoins Christians to bring up their's in the nurture and admonition of the Lord. Sometimes indeed want of leisure, sometimes of knowledge and ability, obliges parents to commit part, it may be a considerable one, of the instruction of their children to other persons. But far from being ever discharged of the whole burden, they must always remember, that unless they assist and enforce what others endeavour, it will seldom produce any valuable effect; and much less, if some of the things which their children hear them say, and see them do almost every day, are directly contrary to those, which they pretend they would have them believe and learn. Abp. Secker.

5. — in singleness of your heart,] With all diligence and sincerity, "as unto Christ," who sees the heart, and is the author of this command. Dr. Hammond.

6. Not with eyeservice, as menpleasers;] It is the duty of servants to obey their masters with diligence: to spend as much time in work, and follow it as closely all that time, as can be fairly expected from them; "not with eyeservice, as menpleasers," (these are the words of Scripture twice repeated there, see Col. iii. 22,) "but in singleness of heart, fearing God." Whatever industry therefore a reasonable master would require, when his eye is upon them, the same, in the main, honest servants will use, when his eye is not upon them: for his presence or absence can make no difference in their duty. He hath agreed with them for their time and pains; and he must not be defrauded of them. Abp. Secker.

7. With good will doing service,] Not murmuring, not behaving gloomily and sullenly, but doing their duty respectfully and readily. Abp. Secker.

9. — forbearing threatening:] Forbearing all passionate and violent expressions towards them, and forgiving their pardonable faults. Pyle.

10. — be strong in the Lord, &c.] Take courage in the Christian combat, to which ye are called, and sustain yourselves by the consideration of His power, whose grace is able to sustain you against all your enemies. Dean Stanhope. If the Apostle had concluded with admonishing us to "be strong," the exhortation would have been to little purpose. He who exhorts a weak man to become strong, only mocks and insults him, unless the means are pointed out by which this change may be effected; unless the source be discovered, from whence strength is derived. By adding "be strong in the Lord, and in the power of His might," that, which was wanting, is fully supplied. Our Redeemer is Almighty; He is with us by His Spirit, and His strength is ours. Bp. Horne.

11. Put on the whole armour of God,] Consisting of such things as either are in us, as truth, faith, righteousness, peace, the hopes of salvation; or are to be used by us, as prayer and attendance upon the word of God. These are here styled "the whole armour of God," nothing more being requisite to enable us to come off victors in this combat. Dr. Whitby. They are styled the armour of God, not only on account of the service they do in promoting godliness, but because they are entirely formed and furnished by Him. The truth and the righteousness, the peace and the faith, the salvation and the word, are His gifts. It deserves also our very diligent attention, that in order to our safety the whole armour of God is absolutely necessary. Profession of the truth will not suffice without practice: nor works of righteousness without peace: and so on. But all together will enable us to "withstand in the evil day, and having done all, to stand." Dean Stanhope.

12. For we wrestle not against flesh and blood,] That is, not only or chiefly against flesh and blood, against human enemies, but we must grapple and contend with angelical powers. Burkitt.

—— but against principalities, against powers,] Such as Christ triumphed over, Col. ii. 15; "against the rulers of the darkness of this world," that is, those evil spirits, which still rule in those heathen nations which are yet in darkness, chap. v. 8; 1 Thess. v. 5; and "against spiritual wickednesses in high places," that is, against those evil spirits, which have their stations in the regions of the air: see the note on chap. ii. 2. Dr. Whitby. The account of the spiritual enemies of mankind, given by the Apostle in this passage, is agreeable to the doctrine of the other inspired writers; particularly St. John, who represents the heathen world, given up to idolatry and wickedness, as lying under the dominion of the devil, 1 John v. 19. It was by the suggestions and temptations of evil spirits, that mankind were so universally seduced to idolatry. And since the professed design of the Gospel was to destroy these evils, the devil and his angels would undoubtedly oppose its progress, by stirring up their adherents to persecute both the preachers and the believers of the new religion. The combat, which the first Christians were maintaining against the devil and his subjects, the abettors of idolatry, was with great propriety ascribed to the Ephesians, as their city was the very throne of idolatry, by means of the worship of Diana then performed with the greatest splendour and celebrity of rites, in the most magnificent temple in the world, and with a vast concourse of priests, votaries, and retainers of all sorts, Acts xix. 28, 29. Dr. Macknight.

13. Wherefore take unto you the whole armour of God,] We must not so rely on the Divine assistance, as to neglect our own exertions. Besides the strength communicated, as occasion requires, from above, there must be a certain fixed and lasting disposition wrought in the mind, which may render it all times prepared and qualified to resist the enemy. These are represented as so many different pieces of armour, which altogether compose what is styled "the whole armour of God." From Him we receive it, and by Him we are enabled to use it. It is to be put on and worn constantly; no more to be laid aside than our limbs or our faculties. Nor must any part be omitted; "put on the whole armour of God." Bp. Horne.

—— in the evil day,] In the day of trial, persecution, and temptation. See the note on chap. v. 16. Dr. Whitby.

14. — having your loins girt about with truth,] See the note on Isai. v. 27. By "truth" here may be understood, the Gospel of Christ; and by being girded with that truth, such a firm persuasion of all the doctrines contained there, as strengthens the weakness of human nature, renders us active in our Christian warfare, and will not suffer us to give way either to the corruptions or the terrours, which would shake our belief, or taint our sincerity in the profession of it. Dean Stanhope.

—— and having on the breastplate of righteousness;] A just and holy conversation; such as is at once a consequence and an evidence of the sincerity spoken of before. This is very fitly called "the breastplate," the proper use of which is to defend the heart. Dean Stanhope. In the parallel passage, 1 Thess. v. 8, this is called "the breastplate of faith and love." Perhaps the Apostle here alluded to Isai. lix. 17, where the Messiah is said to have "put on righteousness as a breastplate;" that is, by the uprightness of His conduct, and His consciousness thereof, He defended Himself from being moved by the calumnies and reproaches of the wicked. Dr. Macknight.

An holy life is of the same use to a Christian, that a breastplate is to a soldier, to keep off blows in the day of battle. For though "all our righteousnesses," as the Prophet speaks, Isai. lxiv. 6, "are as filthy rags," yet having the testimony of a sincere desire to please God, God for His Son's sake accepts of our work and our persons, and then the enemy is at a loss what to say against us. A Christian will not say, I am righteous, and therefore I am secure; but he will say, I have lived in all good conscience, I have been sincere, though I have not been perfect; and Satan himself knows, that God for Christ's sake will accept of this instead of a perfect obedience. Bp. Wilson.

15. And your feet shod with the preparation of the gospel of peace;] That is, maintaining the practice of Christian charity and peaceableness, that ye may go on readily in the Christian course, and not fall or miscarry by the way, secure from those obstructions which might otherwise wound and gall you, and hinder your progress. Dr. Hammond. Shoes were anciently a part of military armour. Dr. Whitby.

16. Above all, taking the shield of faith,] A firm and steady faith in the promises of the Gospel. Pyle. That faith, which is the confident expectation of things hoped for, "the evidence of things not seen," Heb. xi. 1; "for this is the victory that overcometh the world, even our faith," 1 John v. 4. Dr. Whitby. By comparing faith to a shield, its universal efficacy is intended. As the shield defends the whole body, so faith defends the whole man. Dean Stanhope, Burkitt.

—— the fiery darts] Used figuratively for the temptations of Satan. The expression seems an allusion to those javelins or arrows, which were sometimes used by the ancients in sieges and battles. Livy describes a weapon of this kind, as being surrounded at the upper part with combustible matter, which being set on fire, the weapon was darted against the enemy. Parkhurst.

17. And take the helmet of salvation,] Or, as the Apostle elsewhere explains himself, "the hope of salvation," 1 Thess. v. 8: namely, a due sense of the inestimable prize promised to them who conquer, and an assured expectation of obtaining it, provided we "strive lawfully." As an helmet guards our principal part, the seat of our understanding, and the source of our animal powers, so will this hope effectually secure us against all attempts upon our life made by suggestions to sin; the force and danger of which consist chiefly in such motives, as are by no means comparable to the advantages which must be lost by any wicked compliances. Dean Stanhope.

He who possesses "the hope of salvation," through the power of such hope, can do all things, and bear all things; because he still looks forward to the end of his hope, which will reward all his actions, and make ample amends for all his sufferings: but that once given up, there is nothing any longer worth contending for, or thinking about. The mind, turning itself on every side to seek rest, and finding none, sinks into all the wretchedness of utter despondency, and the agonizing groan of suicide is heard! Evermore then let us remember to "take for an helmet the hope of salvation;" and put it not off, till the contest be finally over, and hope ceases by our becoming possessed of its object. Bp. Horne.

—— and the sword of the Spirit, which is the word of God:] The understanding whereof will enable you, not only to resist, but to assault your adversaries. Pyle. We have an example of the wonderful efficacy of this part of our spiritual armour, and a pattern set us for the use of it, in the victorious "Captain of our salvation," who did with it hew the snares of the ungodly in pieces, when tempted by the devil in the wilderness. Dean Stanhope.

To the Christian, armed for defence in the day of battle, the Apostle recommends only one offensive weapon: but it is abundantly sufficient; "the sword of the Spirit, which is the word of God;" sharper than any two-edged sword fabricated by the art of man, piercing even to the dividing asunder of soul and spirit, and of the joints and marrow; reaching the very thoughts and intentions; subduing and mortifying evil desires and blasphemous imaginations, as they arise within; confuting and silencing infidelity and errour, as they assault us from without. A single text, well understood, and rightly applied, pierces the heart of a temptation, or an objection, and lays the most formidable adversary dead at our feet. With this weapon the blessed Jesus conquered in the wilderness; by the same weapon, and no other, must every disciple of His expect to conquer in the world. Bp. Horne.

18. Praying always &c.] Praying heartily and fervently, upon every opportunity and time of need. Dr. Hammond. "In the Spirit" denotes here the same thing that is denoted in chap. v. 19, by the phrase "in the heart;" that is, with the sincere affection of the heart. Dr. Wells.

To all the foregoing particulars, we must add "prayer and supplication," and perseverance in these; by which we shall be able either to prevent or remove all the evils we are subject to, or have the grace to bear them with satisfaction and patience. All the fore-mentioned graces are the gift of God; from Him we must ask them, and from Him we must receive them, if ever we have them. But then we must learn to ask them with the humility of creatures, that know their wants; with the reverence of people, that know their distance; and with the earnestness of Christians, who know they are undone unless their petitions are granted. And whoever with these dispositions lays his wants before God, lamenting his own miseries, and earnestly begging the graces of God's Holy Spirit to support him in his Christian warfare, shall certainly find the good effect of his prayers. For, saith our Lord Christ, "If ye, being evil, know how to give good gifts unto your children; how much more shall your Father which is in heaven give" the Holy Spirit, and therewith all "good things, to them that ask Him?" Bp. Wilson.

THE EPISTLE OF PAUL THE APOSTLE

TO THE PHILIPPIANS.

INTRODUCTION.

PHILIPPI was a city of Macedonia, and a Roman colony, not far from the borders of Thrace. It was the first place at which St. Paul preached the Gospel upon the continent of Europe, in the year 51. He made many converts there, who soon afterwards gave strong proofs of their attachment to him, chap. iv. 15. He was at Philippi a second time, but nothing which then occurred is recorded.

The Philippian Christians, having heard of St. Paul's imprisonment at Rome, with their accustomed zeal sent Epaphroditus to assure him of the continuance of their regard, and to offer him a supply of money. This Epistle was written in consequence of that act of kindness; and it is remarkable for its strong expressions of affection. As the Apostle tells the Philippians, that he hoped to see them shortly, chap. ii. 24, and there are plain intimations, chap. i. 12, and ii. 26, in the Epistle, of his having been some time at Rome, it is probable that it was written in the year 62, towards the end of his confinement.

St. Paul, after a salutation in his own name and that of Timothy, declares his thankfulness to God for having made the Philippians partakers of the blessings of the Gospel, and prays for their farther improvement in knowledge and righteousness; he informs them that his confinement had contributed to the furtherance of the Gospel, and declares his readiness to die in its cause, or live for its promotion; he exhorts them, with great warmth and earnestness, to live as it becometh the Gospel of Christ, being in nothing terrified by their adversaries, chap. i.; to live in harmony with each other, and to practise the virtue of humility after the example of Christ: he encourages them to work out their salvation, and expresses his intention of sending Timothy to them soon, and some hope of visiting them himself; in the mean time he tells them, that he had sent back Epaphroditus their messenger, who had been detained at Rome by a dangerous illness, chap. ii.; he cautions them against false teachers, with particular reference to Judaizers, and gives some account of himself and of his zeal for the Gospel, which he advises the Philippians to imitate. In the last chapter he adds farther exhortations, expresses his satisfaction and thankfulness for their liberality, and concludes with salutations, and his usual benediction.

'It is a strong proof,' says St. Chrysostom, 'of the virtuous conduct of the Philippians, that they did not afford the Apostle a single subject of complaint; for in the whole Epistle, which he wrote to them, there is nothing but exhortation and encouragement, without the mixture of any censure whatever.' Bp. Tomline.

As the excellent characters of the first believers and teachers of Christianity are in general a strong recommendation of it to mankind; so that of St. Paul in particular shines with distinguished lustre through his whole history, but especially his Epistles, the faithful pictures of his soul. Even in this short one to the Philippians it is surprising to observe, how great a variety of most exalted and engaging virtues he shews. The authority of the Apostle is so perfectly tempered with the condescension of the fellow-christian; the expressions of his tenderness for those, to whom he writes, are so endearing and instructive at the same time; his acknowledgments of their kindnesses to him so equally full of dignity, humility, and disinterestedness; his mention of his past persecutions is so mild, and of his present danger (for he wrote from a prison) so cheerful; his attention to the supporting of their courage is so affecting; and his confidence, that both he and they should persevere and conquer, is so noble and yet so modest; his deliberation, whether life or death be eligible, is so calm; and his preference to live, even in misery, for their sakes and that of the Gospel, is so genuinely heroick, yet fully equalled by the composed and triumphant mention, which he elsewhere makes, of his approaching martyrdom; his zeal for propagating religion is so ardent, yet attended with so deep a concern, that it be indeed true religion; he is so earnest to guard them, both against a superstitious reliance on outward ordinances, and a licentious abuse of the doctrines of faith and grace; so solicitous to improve them in rational piety, and meek beneficent virtue; so intent to fix their minds on every thing worthy and amiable, and raise them above every thing gloomy or anxious; his warmth in this glorious cause is so far from being affected or forced; and every expression so evidently flows from a heart, which cannot help overflowing: that whoever shall read but this one Epistle with attention and fairness, under all the disadvantages of a translation made word for word, and broken into short verses, will feel a strong impression on his mind, that the writer of it must have been an uncommonly great and good man, every way deserving of the high rank, which he claims, of a commissioned servant of God, and incapable of claiming it falsely. Abp. Secker.

CHAP. I.

3 He testifieth his thankfulness to God, and his love toward them, for the fruits of their faith, and fellowship in his sufferings, 9 daily praying to him for their increase in grace: 12 he sheweth what good the faith of Christ had received by his troubles at Rome, 21 and how ready he is to glorify Christ either by his life or death, 27 exhorting them to unity, 28 and to fortitude in persecution.

Chap. I. The design and scope of the Apostle in this first chapter is, to encourage the Philippians to constancy in the faith, and to perseverance in holiness; that so they might not be discouraged by his sufferings for the Gospel, since Christianity had already gained very much, and would, he was confident, gain much more, by the sufferings he underwent for it. Accordingly he exhorts them to courage and constancy by several weighty arguments. Burkitt.

Ver. 1. — with the bishops and deacons:] The words "bishop" and "elder," or "presbyter," are often used promiscuously in the writings of the New Testament. The Bishop, properly so called, of Philippi, being by the ancients said to be Epaphroditus, who was with St. Paul at the time of this Epistle being written, and who carried it from Rome, hence by "bishops" here are generally understood only "elders" or "presbyters" properly so called. Drs. Wells and Whitby. See the note on chap. ii. 25.

3. I thank my God] This being in the singular number, shews St. Paul to have been the author of the Epistle, though Timothy was joined with him in the salutation. Pyle, Dr. Whitby.

5. For your fellowship in the gospel &c.] That by our ministry ye have been brought to the communion and fellowship of the profession of the Gospel; and have so continued from the first day that you heard of it, until now. Bp. Hall. "Fellowship" here signifies the communion of the Philippians with the Apostles in the Gospel, as it does 1 John i. 3, 7. Dr. Whitby. The phrase includes the attention, with which they heard the Gospel, and the readiness of mind with which they embraced it, and their perseverance in the profession of it, in opposition both to the heathens and to the Jews. Dr. Macknight.

6. Being confident of this very thing, &c.] The Apostle says this from a judgment of charity, conjecturing, saith Theophylact, from what was past, what they would be for the future: because, he adds, it seems just or fit for me to conceive this good hope of you, by reason of that great affection you retain for me, and your patience in enduring the like afflictions. The words do not convey any opinion concerning the election of all the Philippians to eternal life, or concerning the certainty of their perseverance to the end, by virtue of that election: for such an opinion is inconsistent both with the reasons which he assigns for his confidence, and also with his exhortations to them to "work out their salvation with fear and trembling," chap. ii. 12; to "stand fast in the Lord," chap. iv. 1; and to retain "the word of life, that he might have joy in the day of Christ, that he had not run in vain, neither laboured in vain" among them, chap. ii. 16. Dr. Whitby.

7. — because I have you in my heart;] Or, as in the margin, 'because you have me at heart.' Pyle. That is, because you have had your hearts upon me in my bonds, sending Epaphroditus to minister to me in my necessities, chap. ii. 25; and contributing to me of your own substance, chap. iv. 14. These things confirm my hope concerning you, especially when I find you yet standing firm under the like afflictions; see ver. 30. Dr. Whitby.

—— ye all are partakers of my grace.] That is, of the honour of suffering the same things that I have suffered in defence of the Gospel. Dr. Hammond. Or, Ye are enabled by the like grace of God, as I am, to suffer for the Gospel. Dr. Wells.

8. — in the bowels of Jesus Christ.] With the highest and most passionate degree of Christian love. Dr. Hammond.

10. That ye may approve things that are excellent;] Rather, 'the things that are excellent.' Dr. Whitby. All such things as the Gospel requires. Burkitt. The truth of God as distinguished from the vain fancies of men. Bp. Hall.

—— till the day of Christ;] That is, till death; but he rather mentions the day of judgment, because then will be rendered the complete reward. Bp. Fell.

11. — filled with the fruits of righteousness, — unto the glory and praise of God.] Nothing can be more plain from hence than this; that we then advance the glory and praise of God, when our love towards others does abound, when we are sincere and without offence, being filled with the fruits of righteousness, to which the Gospel of Christ obliges us. Abp. Sharp.

12. But I would ye should understand, brethren, &c.] The Apostle here proceeds, according to the desire of the Philippians, to give them an account of his present state and condition; assuring them, lest they should stumble at his present sufferings, that the things, which had happened to him through the malice of his persecutors, had turned out to the furtherance, rather than the hinderance, of the Gospel. Pyle, Burkitt.

13. So that my bonds in Christ are manifest in all the palace,] He means, that his imprisonment for the Gospel was manifestly taken notice of in the court of the emperour, as well as elsewhere in 18 What then? nothwithstanding, every way, whether in pretence, or in truth, Christ is preached; and I therein do rejoice, yea, and will rejoice.

15. Some indeed preach Christ even of envy and strife;] Envying the success of the Apostle's ministry, and endeavouring to draw people off from approving him, to applaud them; hoping to grieve and afflict him thereby: others preached the Gospel of Christ "of good-will," with a purity of intention and sincerity of affection, both towards Christ and towards the Apostle. Burkitt.

From whatever motive Christ was preached, provided it was the truth concerning Him, it was matter of joy to the Apostle. Dr. Macknight.

19. For I know that this shall turn to my salvation &c.] The meaning may be an expression of the Apostle's confident persuasion, that all the designs of his adversaries against him should be so overruled and ordered by God, that, through the influence and supplies of the Holy Spirit, all should work together for good, and his eternal salvation be advanced thereby, through the concurrence and assistance of their prayers. Burkitt.

20. — Christ shall be magnified in my body,] For if I live in the body, the power of Christ will be magnified in delivering me out of so great a danger; but if I be put to death for His sake, that power will be magnified, which enables me to die for the faith so cheerfully as I am ready to do. Dr. Whitby.

21. For to me to live is Christ, and to die is gain.] The only difference between life and death to me is, that by the one I shall continue the longer in Christ's service, and by the other shall be the sooner rewarded. Pyle.

22. — this is the fruit of my labour:] That is, the service of Christ in converting or strengthening others is well worth my labour: so that were it left to my choice I should be in a strait, which of the two conditions to choose. Drs. Wells and Whitby.

23. — which is far better:] Namely, for myself, than continuing in this life, if I had respect only to my own ease. Dr. Wells. The original phrase, which may be literally rendered 'by much far better,' is the highest superlative which it is possible to form in any language. Dr. Macknight.

25. — I know that I shall abide and continue with you] I am fully persuaded that God will so order it, that I shall live and see you again. Pyle.

28. And in nothing terrified by your adversaries:] It evidently appears from this, and from several other passages in this Epistle, that the Philippians were now in a suffering state, which is a circumstance to be borne in mind as we go on, since it illustrates several masterly strokes in the Apostle's address to them. Dr. Doddridge.

—— which is to them an evident token of perdition,] The meaning is, either that the threats and persecutions of the adversaries shew them to be an obstinate and incurable people, bent on their own destruction: or the word "which" may refer to the Philippians "standing fast;" and the "token of perdition to them" may signify, that their adversaries took this steadfastness of theirs to be a token of their perdition; but, says the Apostle, look you upon it as a token of your salvation. Pyle.

29. For unto you it is given &c.] Namely, by God, as a special favour. Dr. Whitby. St. Paul wished the Philippians to consider their sufferings for Christ as an honour, and to rejoice in them. Thus it is said of the Apostles, Acts v. 41, "They departed from the presence of the council, rejoicing that they were counted worthy to suffer shame for His name." Dr. Macknight.

Acts xvi. 22—24. The passage in the Epistle is very remarkable. I know not an example in any writing of a juster pathos, or which more truly represents the workings of a warm and affectionate mind, than what is exhibited in this passage. The Apostle reminds his Philippians of their being joined with himself in the endurance of persecution for the sake of Christ; he conjures them by the ties of their common profession, and their common sufferings, to "fulfil his joy;" to complete, by the unity of their faith, and by their mutual love, that joy, with which the instances he had received of their zeal and attachment had inspired his breast. Now if this was the real effusion of St. Paul's mind, of which it bears the strongest internal character, then we have, in the words "the same conflict which ye saw in me," an authentick confirmation of so much of the Apostle's history in the Acts, as relates to his transactions at Philippi: and therefore that of the intelligence and general fidelity of the historian. Archdeacon Paley.

Chap. II. The Apostle proceeds to exhort the whole church at Philippi to unity, meekness, and humility, from the great example of Christ suffering for us; and to steadiness in Christian principles and practices, now in his absence from them: he expresses his hopes to send Timothy to them: in the mean while he recommends their messenger Epaphroditus, the bearer of this letter, to them. Pyle.

Ver. 1. If there be therefore any consolation in Christ, &c.] As if he had said, If ever you have tasted, by means of my ministry, any sweetness and consolation in Christ and His holy religion, if ever you have found any comfort in His love, if ever you have enjoyed any communion with His Spirit, if ye be men, and have any bowels of mercy for yourselves, if ye be Christians, and have any pity for me in my bonds, fulfil ye my joy, &c. Burkitt. These words are not an expression of doubt, but the strongest affirmation that there is the greatest consolation in Christ, &c. 2 Cor. i. 4. Dr. Macknight.

3. —let each esteem other better than themselves.] This refers not to judgment, for it is not in our power always thus to esteem of others, but to practice; as if he had said, Be as ready to assist others, as if you were their subjects and inferiours: so the example of Christ requires, and so the precept runs, that "he who is the greatest should be a servant" to others. Dr. Whitby.

6, 7. Who, being in the form of God, thought it not robbery to be equal with God: But made himself of no reputation, &c.] Who being very God, and knowing it to be no presumption in Him to equalize Himself to God the Father, yet voluntarily humbled and abased Himself, and took upon Him a mean and contemptible condition here on earth; and, as He stooped so low as to become man, so he framed Himself to the state and yielded to the infirmities of man. Bp. Hall.

The Apostle here illustrates the dignity of our Lord's person in terms which speak Him very God, and very man. "The form of God" as strongly infers the former, as "the likeness and fashion of man" does the latter; if we regard only the force of the expressions themselves. And as the whole course of His conversation gives incontestable proofs of the truth of His human nature, so the argument of St. Paul establishes the truth of His Divine nature. Dean Stanhope. The Apostle begins with the dignity of our Saviour's person, expressed thus, "that He was in the form of God, and that He thought it not robbery to be equal with God:" then His humiliation comes, that "He made Himself of no reputation, but took upon Him the form of a servant," the same word with that used in the former verse: after which follows His exaltation, and "a name" or authority "above every name" or authority is said to be given Him, so that "all in heaven, in earth, and under the earth," which seems to import angels, men, and devils, "should bow at His name, and confess that He is Lord." In the progress that is made in these words it is plain, that the dignity of Christ's person is represented as antecedent both to His humiliation, and to His exaltation. It was that which put the value on His humiliation, as His humiliation was rewarded by His exaltation. Bp. Burnett.

It is evident from this Scripture, that Christ was as much in the form of God as in the form of a servant, and did as really subsist in the Divine nature, as in the nature of man. For He was so "in the form of God," as thereby "to be equal with God." But no other form, beside the essential, which is the Divine nature itself, could infer an equality with God. "To whom will ye liken Me, and make Me equal, saith the Holy One?" Isai. xl. 25, and xlvi. 5. There can be but one infinite, eternal, and independent Being; and there can be no comparison between that, and whatsoever is finite, temporal, and depending. He therefore, who did truly think Himself equal with God, as being in the form of God, must be conceived to subsist in that one infinite, eternal, and independent nature of God. Bp. Pearson.

Bp. Bull takes his stand on this verse, and asserts, that 'it is alone sufficient for the refutation of all heresies against the Person of our Lord Jesus Christ;' an assertion, which Bp. Pearson had fully established in his admirable exposition of this passage in his great work on the Creed. We may therefore justly maintain that this passage, and the same may be said of the beginning of St. John's Gospel, ought to convince all who profess themselves to be Christians, who do not deny the Christian religion to be true, or the Holy Scriptures to be of Divine authority, that Christ is properly and truly God. Bp. Burgess.

7. But made himself of no reputation, and took upon him the form of a servant, &c.] And yet being thus truly God, He set Himself at nought, lessened and humbled Himself from the condition of being Lord of all, to that of a subject and ordinary man. Dr. Hammond. By taking upon Himself a created nature, Christ became essentially a servant to God, whereas He was before equal to the Father as to His Godhead. Dr. Wells. All the words of this verse together are not properly three distinct propositions, without any dependence of one upon the other, but an expression of Christ's emptying of Himself, with an explication shewing in what it consisted: which will plainly appear by this literal translation; 'But emptied Himself, taking the form of a servant, being made in the likeness of men.' Where if any man doubt how Christ emptied Himself, the text will satisfy him, by "taking the form of a servant;" if any still question how He took the form of a servant, he hath the Apostle's resolution, by "being made in the likeness of men." In the next verse he proceeds to another act of Christ's humiliation, consisting in His obedience unto death. Bp. Pearson.

This exinanition, or emptying of Himself, seems to be spoken of our Saviour as voluntary; beginning at His incarnation and continued till His ascension. From hence it was that He was first conceived, and afterwards anointed, by the Holy Ghost; that He grew in grace; was ignorant of the day of judgment; was comforted by angels; and raised by the power of the Father; and the like. And it seems a satisfactory answer to many of those arguments made against His divinity: as do these make very much to prove it: 1st, that the same word is here used, form of God, and form of man, &c.; but He was really a man, a servant; therefore also God naturally: 2dly, that taking upon Him such a form, He was, before He took it upon Him: and 3dly, that it being no injury to be equal, He was equal to God. Bp. Fell.

9. Wherefore God also hath highly exalted him, &c.] Upon which wonderful humiliation of His, it hath pleased God the Father to advance Him, in His human nature, to an answerable height of glory; having given unto Him both that title, and that state and power, which is far above any title, or state, or power, of whatsoever finite creature; having publickly to the world declared and approved Him to be God Almighty. Bp. Hall.

10. That at the name of Jesus every knee should bow, &c.] That in the acknowledgment of this just title and Divine power of His, every creature should bow and stoop unto Him, both the angels of heaven, &c. Bp. Hall. Ireneus quotes this verse, and, describing what sort of adoration was paid to Christ, says, that 'every knee should bow to Him, as to our Lord, and God, and Saviour, and King.' Leslie.

11. —that Jesus Christ is Lord,] That even that Jesus, who was thus abased, is the God and Lord of all. Bp. Hall.

"Lord," or as St. John more emphatically styles Him, "King of kings, and Lord of lords," Rev. xix. 16. Nor are men only, but "all the angels of God" required to "worship Him," as such, Heb. i. 6. Created beings, of how exalted ranks soever, can only be faithful as servants in the house of God, "but Christ as a Son over His own house," which Himself hath builded, Heb. iii. 3, 5, 6. Abp. Secker.

—— to the glory of God the Father.] Who delights to be honoured in the belief and obedience, paid to His blessed Son and His Gospel. Dean Stanhope.

The Apostle's great design and scope, in setting before the Philippians the humiliation and exaltation of Jesus Christ, was to excite them to the grace and duty of humility, that the same humble mind might be in them which was also in Christ Jesus: as if he had said, Our Lord Jesus Christ humbled Himself greatly for us, and afterwards was highly exalted by God above us: so in proportion may you expect to be exalted by God, if you humble yourselves in order to maintain the peace and unity of the church: for before honour is humility. Burkitt.

In this passage it is to be observed, that the Apostle here evidently points out to us three different states and conditions of Christ; the first is His state of dignity from which He willingly descended, expressed in those words, "who being in the form of God:" the second is, the state of humility to which He descended, in those words, "He made Himself of no reputation:" the third is, His state of glory and exaltation, intimated in those words, "wherefore God also hath highly exalted Him." These three states or conditions of Christ are essential to the Apostle's argument; for take away any one of them, and the example which the Apostle would propose is lost; not only the force of the argument is lessened, but the argument itself is entirely destroyed. For instance, if you remove the first state, that of His natural dignity and excellence, the second state will no longer be a state of humiliation, nor Christ any longer an example of humility; for if He was no better than a servant before He was a servant, His being a servant was His lot and condition, not His choice; it was owing to the order of nature and Providence, and not to His humility; and He was no more humble in being born to be a servant, than others who are born in the same state; and often too without the humility which is necessary to their condition.

Secondly, it is implied in the argument, that He was in possession of whatever belonged to His state of dignity and excellence, before He underwent any thing that belonged to His state of humiliation; for His voluntarily descending from His dignity, to a lower and meaner state, is the very act and real ground and foundation of His humility; and therefore whatever is meant by His being in the form of God, or whatever is meant by His being in the likeness of men, thus much at least is evident, that He was in the form of God, before He was made in the likeness of man; because His being made in the likeness of men, is given as one great instance of His humility; but His being in the form of God, was His very dignity and excellence; and therefore, as it is necessary to suppose that His dignity was antecedent to His humility, it is likewise necessary to assert, that He was "in the form of God," before He was made "in the likeness of men."

Thirdly, it is necessarily implied in the argument, that He underwent whatever belonged to His state of humiliation, before He enjoyed any thing that belonged to His state of exaltation; because His exaltation was the effect and reward of His humility; and being purchased and obtained by His humility, it could not be antecedent to it: consequently it necessarily follows, that His natural state of dignity, and His acquired state of exaltation, are two perfectly different and distinct states; since one was evidently antecedent to, the other as evidently consequent to His humiliation: from whence it follows, that His being in the form of God, being the dignity which He was possessed of before His humiliation, does not belong to Him in virtue of any thing He did or suffered; nor is any part of that glory to which He was exalted, or which He received after or upon account of His sufferings.

This ought to be the more particularly insisted on, because it is a common mistake to think, that, because Christ was exalted to glory at His resurrection, and "for the suffering of death crowned with glory and honour," as the Apostle to the Hebrews speaks; therefore all glory and honour, and all dignity and excellence, which are ever ascribed to Him, belong to Him only in consequence of His sufferings and obedience. From hence it is that some men think it a sufficient answer to all arguments, drawn from the attributes of power and knowledge, and the like, to prove the eternity and divinity of the "Word," to say that Christ received His glory at His resurrection, and was made perfect through sufferings; and therefore the glory and power, which are any where ascribed to Him, are not His natural perfections, but His acquired honours, and of no ancienter date than the redemption. But this is not to answer the arguments, but to confound the distinct states of glory which belong to Christ; the glory which He had with the Father before the worlds, and the glory which He received from the Father at the redemption; one the glory of nature, the other the glory of office; one the glory of the eternal "Word," the other the glory of the "Son of man." *Bp. earnestly to do all that is requisite on your part for the attainment of salvation. Bp. Hall. Though there be an ambiguity in the connexion of this clause, if the grammar only be considered, I think the sense obliges us to join it with the following, rather than with the preceding words. There seems no reason to apprehend that the Philippians were less obedient to St. Paul, when he was with them, than to any messages they may have received in his absence. Dr. Doddridge.

13. For it is God which worketh in you &c.] This passage is to be understood in connexion with the foregoing exhortation of "working out their own salvation with fear and trembling." As that which is done by God is done of His own free mercy, without any merit of ours to claim it from Him, and therefore requires not only our humility, but our diligence, and caution, and solicitude, and fear of displeasing so gracious a Father, who may, if He be provoked by our unworthiness, withdraw His working from us; so it is not to be conceived to be wrought by God in such an irresistible manner, as that it shall be impossible for those, in whom God thus works, to contradict or resist His working: for if it were so, there could be no room for the exhortation to do that, which could not be otherwise, namely, "to work out their own salvation." When it is said then, that "God worketh in us both to will and to do," it is meant that He gives us that strength, works in us those abilities, which are requisite to our willing and working, as necessary to prepare and assist us to do either. And this is a great encouragement to our diligence, which might otherwise be disheartened by the difficulty and impossibility of the task. Be we never so weak and insufficient of ourselves, God hath all-sufficient strength, and by that strength of His He "worketh in us both to will and to do;" and so, if we be not wanting to ourselves, but work, and work out our own salvation with all diligence, we shall have no reason to complain of want of strength; "we are able to do" what He requires of us, "through Christ which strengtheneth us." Dr. Hammond. The whole is, that we can do nothing without God, and He will do nothing without us: we can do nothing without His assistance, He will do nothing without the concurrence of our endeavours: "He worketh in us both to will and to do," and we must work with Him in order to the working out of our salvation. Burkitt.

What should hinder us then from "working out our own salvation," when God is ready to "work in us both to will and to do;" both good desires, and the accomplishment of them? Our bad inclinations may be too hard for us, but not for Him. He will certainly qualify us for what He commands and expects: else His precepts would be mockery, and His punishment cruelty. Abp. Secker.

God has done, and will do, great things for us: let not this make us vain and presumptuous, but let it excite our care, that the gift of God may not be bestowed upon us in vain: and let us always bear in mind the Apostle's advice, "Work out your own salvation with fear and trembling, for it is God which worketh in you both to will and to do." Some imagine that God's working with us, is a reason why we should be confident and secure of our salvation: but you see St. Paul was of another mind. He writes to those who certainly had the Spirit; for he tells them, that God did work in them both to will and to do: but does not tell them, that they were safe and secure and out of danger! no, he says nothing like it; on the contrary, he calls upon them to fear and tremble, lest, having received so great a gift, they should by their negligence, as thinking themselves secure, forfeit all the hopes of the Gospel. Bp. Sherlock.

15, 16. — as lights in the world; Holding forth the word of life;] Beza thinks this is an allusion to those towers, which were built at the entrance of harbours, and on which fires were kept burning, to direct ships into the port. Thus understood the allusion is beautiful. For the doctrine and holy lives of the faithful must in those early ages have had a great influence on unbelievers, to direct them into the safe harbour of the Gospel. Dr. Macknight.

17. Yea, and if I be offered upon the sacrifice and service of your faith,] Literally, 'if I be poured out upon the sacrifice,' &c. Dr. Wells. The Apostle here hath an elegant allusion to the Jewish sacrifices: they were prepared for the altar, on which they were to be offered, by the Levites and the priests; and this was their "service;" and there was poured upon the sacrifice oil or wine, which was the libation: if then, saith the Apostle, whilst I am thus wholly employed in rendering you Gentiles an acceptable "sacrifice" to the Lord, my blood should be the libation, to be poured out upon this sacrifice, I should rejoice even thus to die in your service, and for the confirmation of your faith. See Rom. xv. 16. Dr. Whitby.

20. For I have no man likeminded,] No man, so heartily affected both to you and to me. Bp. Hall. It appears from Acts xxvii. 1, that Aristarchus and St. Luke accompanied the Apostle to Rome. And during his confinement there, other faithful assistants came to him, who were equally well disposed with Timothy, to take care of the affairs of the Philippians. We must therefore suppose, that, at the time the Apostle wrote this, these faithful teachers were not at Rome, having gone away for a little while on some business. For surely the Apostle could not say of them, "All seek their own, not the things which are Jesus Christ's." Dr. Macknight.

—— who will naturally care for your state.] He being as it were my son in the service of the Gospel, will care for you with the same sincerity as I. Dr. Wells.

21. For all seek their own,] That is, the generality of them who are with me. Dr. Wells. They seek their own interests and safety, and not the things which are Jesus Christ's; that is, comparatively to Timothy and Epaphroditus, mentioned ver. 25. I find others too generally more concerned for their own safety than for advancing the kingdom of Christ with the hazard of their own lives and fortunes. Dr. Whitby.

Epaphroditus is accordingly by all antiquity reckoned the first bishop of Philippi. Wheatly, Dr. Whitby.

—— he that ministered to my wants.] Who brought your contributions for the relief of my wants. Dr. Wells.

27. For indeed he was sick nigh unto death:] Those, who possessed the power of miracles, could not exercise it according to their own pleasure, but according to the direction of the Holy Ghost; otherwise St. Paul would doubtless have healed Epaphroditus, who, as is intimated ver. 30, had fallen into this dangerous sickness through the fatigue which he underwent in assisting the Apostle. These gifts were generally given for the benefit of unbelievers, to convince them of the truth of the Christian faith. Drs. Macknight and Whitby.

28. I sent him therefore the more carefully,] On which account I was the more careful, or the more desirous, to send him. Drs. Hammond and Wells.

—— that I may be the less sorrowful.] Finding your sorrow for him turned into joy. Dr. Whitby.

30. — to supply your lack of service toward me.] To do that, which by reason of your absence you, however willing, were not able to perform. Dr. Hammond, Pyle.

Chap. III. The Apostle encourages the Philippians to a cheerful profession of Christianity; and to a dependence on it alone, without regard to the Jewish law, according to his own example; and warns them against the principles and practices of the Jewish zealots, upon whom he makes very just and severe reflections. Pyle.

Ver. 1. — To write the same things] Which I have delivered to you by word of mouth. Dr. Whitby, Burkitt.

—— but for you it is safe.] Because things, delivered only by word of mouth, may slip out of the memory. Here is St. Paul's judgment against oral tradition, which the church of Rome prefers before the written word. Dr. Whitby, Burkitt.

2. Beware of dogs,] So the Jews, by way of contempt, used to style all heathens: and now, as a just return for their contentions and obstinate opposition to the true religion, the Apostles, St. Paul and St. John, retort it upon themselves. See Rev. xxii. 15; Ps. xxii. 16. Pyle. Perhaps the unbelieving Jews are called "dogs," to signify that in the sight of God they were now become as abominable for crucifying Christ and persecuting His Apostles, as the idolatrous heathens were in the sight of the Jews. In Rev. xxii. 15, the atrociously wicked are called "dogs." Dr. Macknight.

—— beware of evil workers,] For they labour only to pull down God's building, and to destroy the church of Christ. Elsewhere he styles them "deceitful workers," 2 Cor. xi. 13. Dr. Whitby.

—— beware of the concision.] By this name St. Paul calls the Jewish teachers, who were not only circumcised themselves, but now, after the coming of Christ, taught that the outward circumcision of the flesh was necessary to salvation, whilst they were at the same time destitute of the circumcision of the heart. Parkhurst.

3. For we are the circumcision,] We Christians are alone the true and spiritual circumcision, and are accounted circumcised by God, because we have that which the outward rite signified, namely, the circumcision of the heart, and the mortification of all carnal lusts and desires. Burkitt.

4. Though I might also have confidence in the flesh. &c.] As if he had said, Think not, O Philippians, that I therefore speak lightly of those privileges and advantages, which the Jews among you so much boast of, upon this account because I have none of them myself. No, on the contrary, if I would value myself on such outward carnal things, I have as much reason as any. Nay, there is not a Jew among you, that perhaps can say so much on his own behalf, in this respect, as I can. Accordingly he proceeds to specify his privileges in the 5th and 6th verses. Abp. Sharp.

——of the tribe of Benjamin,] Of a noble tribe, as well as of an honourable people: a tribe, which together with Judah kept close to God, when the other tribes revolted to the worship of Jeroboam's calves. Burkitt, Dr. Whitby.

——an Hebrew of the Hebrews;] "An Hebrew" is a native Jew in opposition to an "Hellenist," or one who had been converted from heathenism to Judaism. "An Hebrew of (or from) Hebrews," is one descended from Hebrews, or native Jews, both by the father's and mother's side. Parkhurst.

——as touching the law, a Pharisee;] One of the strictest sects of the Jewish religion. Dr. Whitby. See Acts xxiii. 6; xxvi. 4, 5.

6. —touching the righteousness which is in the law, blameless.] So strict and punctual in the observation of the prescriptions of the law, that no man could tax me for the breach or violation thereof. Bp. Hall. I may truly, in the Jewish notion of righteousness, be accounted a righteous person. Abp. Sharp.

7. —those I counted loss] Whatever advantages I enjoyed as a Jew, I may well part with for Christ; and if they would keep me in the least degree from embracing the Christian doctrine, they would be very far from being advantages to me, but would be losses rather. Dr. Hammond.

8. —that I may win Christ,] That is, obtain an interest in Him, and in the blessings purchased by Him. Dr. Whitby, Burkitt. As if he had said, Not only the above-named privileges, but all other things whatsoever, wealth, greatness, fame, friends, and life itself, I account them all very pitiful things, if they be compared with the inestimable advantages of being a Christian. As I have once forsaken, so will I again readily forsake all, part with all things that the world holds most dear and valuable; nay, I will trample them under my feet, like dirt and dung, provided I may obtain the favour of Christ. Abp. Sharp.

9. —the righteousness which is of God by faith:] See the notes on Rom. i. 17.

The plain sense of the verse seems to be this: That which above all things I desire, is to be found in Christ, that is, to be a disciple of His, ingrafted into Him, by being a member of His church; "not having mine own righteousness, which is of the law," namely, not being content with those outward privileges, and that outward obedience, which by my own natural strength I am able to yield to the precepts of the law, which is that righteousness, in which the Jews expect to be justified before God; "but that which is through the faith of Jesus Christ, the righteousness which is of God by faith;" that is, that righteousness which I desire, and in which only I shall have the confidence to appear before God, is an inward principle of holiness; that spiritual renewed obedience to God's laws, which He doth require as the condition of His favour and acceptance, and which I can never attain to, but by the faith of Christ, by becoming a Christian. This is none of my own righteousness, but God's; it being wrought in me by His Spirit, accompanying the preaching of the Gospel; and as it is His gift, so He will own it, and reward it at the last day. Abp. Sharp.

10. That I may know him,] To be the Messiah, and the Saviour of the world, which knowledge is necessary to life eternal, John xvii. 3; 1 Cor. ii. 2. Dr. Whitby.

——and the power of his resurrection,] So as to be enabled, by my knowledge and faith through grace, to rise from the death of sin to the life of righteousness; and not only this, but if He calls me thereto, that I may know also "the fellowship of His sufferings," or, may be ready also to suffer, as Christ did, for the Gospel. Dr. Wells.

This, saith the Apostle, is the righteousness that I aspire after, that I may know Christ, not only by a notional belief of the doctrines, or profession of His religion, but by a spiritual experimental knowledge of Him, such a knowledge as transforms me into His Spirit and temper; and that I may know the power of His resurrection, namely, that I may experience in myself all the good effects that His resurrection has a power to work in me; that I may feel the virtue and efficacy of it in my daily dying to sin, and rising again to a new, holy, and heavenly life. This is that righteousness I long for, and in comparison of which, I account all things in the world but as loss, and as dung. Abp. Sharp.

11. If by any means I might attain unto the resurrection of the dead.] Namely, an happy resurrection. Dr. Wells. Promised by Him to all His faithful servants and sufferers. Dr. Whitby.

12. Not as though I had already attained,] Not as if I had already gotten my crown or reward. The term is taken from the Grecian games, and is used of him that hath finished his race and course, conquered and gained the prize, although he have not yet received it. As if the Apostle had said, Not that I have finished my course, or that my crown is yet assigned me so immutably and irreversibly, that I should speak confidently of it. That which is fitter for me to employ my thoughts about, is to use all diligence that I miscarry not. Dr. Hammond.

——either were already perfect:] This phrase, like the former, is in this passage an agonistick term, denoting the finishing of one's race, (compare 2 Tim. iv. 7;) and the receiving of one's complete reward. Dr. Hammond, Parkhurst. Not as if I had already reached the goal. For the original verb is properly used by the Greeks of runners in the race-course, who had reached the goal, and conquered in the contest, and so being declared conquerors, were decorated with the proposed rewards. Schleusner.

——but I follow after,] Or pursue eternal happiness with all care and industry. Dr. Wells. The word expresses the contention in the race, and signifies the endeavouring to get before those that are before us, that we may "apprehend" or lay hold on the prize by being foremost. Dr. Hammond, Parkhurst.

——for which also I am apprehended of Christ Jesus.] For when I fled from Him, He caught hold on me, converted me to the faith, that believing in Him I might obtain life everlasting, 1 Tim. i. 15, 16. Dr. Whitby.

13. —I count not myself to have apprehended:] I do not think that I have my crown, or that I am so sure of it that I cannot miss it. Dr. Hammond. Though an Apostle, and one that has done and suffered so much for Christ, I nevertheless do not count myself to be secure of eternal happiness. Dr. Wells.

A distinguishing character of enthusiasts is, their proneness to believe they have already attained the summit of moral perfection, and a full security of Divine approbation, so that further improvement is impossible, and even further vigilance unnecessary; for to such excess has fanaticism carried its extravagance, that weak and depraved mortals have dared to presume they were exalted so high above their fellow men by the immediate hand of Heaven, as to be incapable of deviating into errour, or sinking into guilt. Very opposite to this is the humble, but soul-exalting morality of the Gospel of Christ, which on the one hand forbids the most wicked sinners to despair, and animates them to reform, by the heart-reviving assurance, that if they will repent "and turn to their God, He will abundantly pardon," through the mediation of that Christ, "who came into the world to save sinners;" while on the other, it inculcates humility and self-abasement on all the sons of men, declaring, that "there is none righteous, no not one;" holding out a spotless model, which we should perpetually labour to imitate; still however convinced, that in this state of trial and discipline we must never cease to advance with humble caution and vigilant self-government, conscious we are still frail unprofitable servants. How admirably does St. Paul exemplify this calm and humble frame of mind, even at the period when he was gifted with every apostolick power, employing his every faculty for the glory of God, and the salvation of man, and was prepared to seal his testimony to the Gospel of Christ even with his blood! If such a man were an enthusiast, would he not, in such circumstances, feel, and loudly proclaim himself, the chief favourite of his God, purified from all moral imperfection, and secured from fall? Not so the Apostle. "What things were gain to me, those I counted loss for Christ. Yea doubtless, and I count all things but loss for the excellency of the knowledge of Christ Jesus my Lord:—if by any means I might attain unto the resurrection of the dead. Not as though I had already attained, either were already perfect:—but this one thing I do, forgetting those things which are behind, and reaching forth unto those things which are before, I press toward the mark for the prize of the high calling of God in Christ Jesus." And in another passage he uses these striking words, "I keep under my body, and bring it into subjection, lest that by any means, when I have preached to others, I myself should be a cast-away," 1 Cor. ix. 27. Thus does the Gospel temper the fervour of devotion, by the meekness of humility, and guard alike against that despair, which would prevent the reformation of vice, and that presumptuous security, which would endanger the fall of virtue; bearing in both views the genuine characters of that wisdom which descends from above, which is fully acquainted with every weakness of human nature, and for every weakness graciously provides a support. Dr. Graves.

14. I press toward the mark for the prize] "The mark," or the goal: "the prize," or crown, which either hung over the goal, or was given to the conqueror by the judges: and so the meaning of the passage is, that the racer takes the goal in the way to the crown; first conquers, and then is rewarded; the goal being the conclusion of the race, but the way to the crown. Dr. Hammond.

The Apostle throughout these verses makes a continual allusion to the race run in the Olympian games, where he that run was continually upon the stretch and pressing forwards, without looking back to those whom he had left behind, but pursuing the goal; in order that first coming to it he might catch hold of the prize, and so be crowned with it. And two things are here noted by the Fathers, worthy of our observation. 1st, That if this great Apostle, who had suffered so many things, and was in deaths often, and who had laboured so abundantly, was not yet confident of a blessed resurrection, but only striving, if so he might attain unto it; persons, such as we are, must have less ground of confidence. 2dly, What continual diligence and labour this pursuit requires; for you know, saith St. Chrysostom, with what great earnestness the pursuer runs; he looks upon no man; he throws out of the way every thing that might hinder him; he employs his body, eye, strength, soul, and mind, upon the work, looking to nothing else, but only to the prize. Dr. Whitby.

As the worst of men ought not to give up themselves as incapable of becoming good, nor those in the lowest rank of goodness to despair of becoming eminent in time; so neither should those who are in the highest indulge too great complacency in their own improvements; much less a contempt of others, or an imagination which the great Apostle disclaims, as though they "had already attained, either were already perfect." But the common duty of all, to express it in his following words, is, "forgetting those things which are behind, and reaching forth unto those things which are before, to press toward the mark for the prize of the high calling of God in Christ Jesus." Abp. Secker.

We find that the best and most excellent of the New Testament saints obeyed God, and suffered for Him, upon the motive and inducement of the heavenly reward. The great Apostle of Christ, St. Paul, speaking of himself, says, "I press toward the mark, for the prize of the high calling of God in Christ Jesus," where that by the "prize of the high calling of God in Christ," is meant the future eternal glory to which God calls us by the Gospel of Christ, as to the reward of our obedience thereunto, is agreed on by all interpreters. The expression is metaphorical, and borrowed from the ancient custom in races, wherein the judge, he that held and bestowed the prize, sat in some high place, and from thence by an herald or cryer called to each of the racers, acquainted him with the prize, and offered it to him that should best acquit himself in the race. Thus God from the highest heaven calls to us by Christ, and offers us the inestimable prize of eternal glory, if we run well that race of virtue and obedience, which in the Gospel of Christ is marked out and prescribed unto us. Now St. Paul here plainly signifies, that he himself throughout his whole Christian race had a continual eye to this prize of the high calling of God in Christ, and that the obtaining thereof was his aim and end, his great design and business. It is evident therefore that St. Paul, as well as Moses, served God with respect to the recompense of reward. Bp. Bull.

15. —as many as be perfect,] Or thoroughly instructed in our Christian duty. Dr. Whitby. See the note on 1 Cor. ii. 6.

——be thus minded:] As I have told you I am: namely, so as to believe the circumcision of the Spirit, not that of the flesh, and the righteousness which is of God by faith, to be the things especially to be regarded for the obtaining of this prize. Dr. Whitby.

——if in any thing ye be otherwise minded, &c.] If any one differs in understanding any particular thing, there is no reason that such a difference should create any division among you, disturb or break the peace which is most precious to be preserved: for though at present ye are not, yet hereafter ye may, no doubt, be instructed in all that is necessary for you. Dr. Hammond.

16. Nevertheless, whereto we have already attained, &c.] In the mean time, for so much of the truth of God, as we have already attained the knowledge of, let us therein walk on peaceably and lovingly: following one and the same rule of the word of God, and conspiring in all Christian unanimity and concord to do all good offices to God and each other. Bp. Hall.

17 Brethren, be followers together of me, and mark them which walk so as ye have us for an ensample.

20 For our conversation is in heaven; from whence also we look for the Saviour, the Lord Jesus Christ:

21 Who shall change our vile body, that it may be fashioned like unto his glorious body, according to the working whereby he is able even to subdue all things unto himself.

3 And I intreat thee also, true yokefellow, help those women which laboured with me in the gospel, with Clement also, and with other my fellowlabourers, whose names are in the book of life.

4 Rejoice in the Lord alway: and again I say, Rejoice.

---

17. Brethren, be followers together of me,] By propounding his own practice to these Philippians, as a pattern for their imitation, the Apostle hath at once intimated to us the duty, both of all who are entrusted with the ministry of the Gospel to set, and of all who live under their ministry to follow, such examples as may express and adorn the Christian religion. Dean Stanhope.

18. — they are the enemies of the cross of Christ:] Because they preached up the necessity of circumcision, and the observation of the ceremonial law; and so in effect denied Christ to be come in the flesh, or affirmed that He died in vain. Burkitt.

19. — whose God is their belly, &c.] They devote themselves wholly to luxury and lust; they take a pride in the practices, which are really a reproach to them; and set their hearts upon the profits and pleasures of this world only. Dean Stanhope.

To whom we make ourselves servants, him we make our Lord and God. The covetous worldling therefore, by "serving Mammon," Matt. vi. 24, maketh Mammon his God: which caused St. Paul two several times to set the brand of idolatry upon covetousness, Eph. v. 5; Col. iii. 5. And the voluptuous epicure is here for this reason said to make his "belly his god," because he "serveth his own belly," as the phrase is, Rom. xvi. 18. Upon the same ground the devil is called "the god of this world," 2 Cor. iv. 4, because the men of this evil world, by doing him service, do make a god of him. Bp. Sanderson.

21. Who shall change our vile body,] This passage indicates the Divine power of Christ, to whom is here ascribed that resurrection, which is frequently made an indication of the Godhead, it being God who raiseth from the dead, Rom. iv. 17; Acts xxvi. 8; and which is ascribed to the exceeding greatness and to the energy of His mighty power, Eph. i. 19; and yet is here ascribed to the energy of Christ. Dr. Whitby.

—— that it may be fashioned like unto his glorious body,] That, as Ireneus saith, 'it may be transformed from a mortal and corruptible, into an immortal and incorruptible body.' We may here note, what a value is put upon the resurrection and redemption of the body from corruption, as if it were the chief thing which Christians waited for, and expected from our Saviour at His coming, Rom. viii. 23. We may also note the pious observation of the Fathers, that the folly of those can never be sufficiently lamented, who deprive themselves of such a glorious resurrection. Dr. Whitby. At the same time the change here described should be seriously attended to, as affording the best mitigation of the concern so apt to overwhelm us, upon the account either of our own death, or of the death of those who are very dear to us. The bodies of the righteous are not swallowed up by the grave as a prey, but deposited there as a trust: which will surely be demanded back again, and of which a punctual restitution will be expected. So our admirable Liturgy hath taught us in the office of interment to commit the bodies of the deceased to the ground, "in sure and certain hope of the resurrection" of the righteous "to eternal life, through our Lord Jesus Christ: who," as this portion of Scripture assures us, "shall change our vile body," this earth, and ashes, and dust, "that it may be like unto His glorious body, according to the mighty working, whereby He is able to subdue all things to Himself." Dean Stanhope.

Chap. IV. The encouragements to Christian constancy, cheerfulness, and resignation, are continued. The Apostle expresseth the due sense he had of the Philippians' kindness to him, and professes his courage and contentedness under all conditions of life. The salutations and conclusion. Pyle.

Ver. 1. — dearly beloved &c.] It is scarce possible to express affection more strongly than the Apostle hath done in this short verse, by the various tender epithets which he bestowed on the Philippians from the real feelings of his heart, penetrated, not only with gratitude for their attention to him in his distress, but with esteem on account of the excellence of their character and behaviour. Dr. Macknight.

3. — true yokefellow,] Whom the Apostle particularly means, is not agreed upon by interpreters. Pyle. He probably means Epaphroditus, whom, in chap. ii. 25, he had called his "companion in labour." Schleusner.

—— with Clement also,] The ancient Christian writers tell us, that this is the Clement who afterwards became Bishop of the church at Rome; and who, to compose some dissensions in the church at Corinth about their spiritual guides, wrote to the Corinthians an Epistle, which is still extant. Dr. Macknight.

—— whose names are in the book of life.] "The book of life" refers to the custom of well-ordered cities, which kept registers containing all the names of the citizens. Out of these registers as apostates, and fugitives, and infamous persons were erased, agreeably to which there is mention of "blotting names out of the book of life," Rev. iii. 5; so the names of those, who continued obedient orderly citizens, were still continued in. Accordingly, since "life" in this place signifies spiritual life, the state of grace and favour of God, the beginning of that future eternal life, therefore "the book of life" here is the register of all sincere Christians, as "the book of the living," in the Psalmist, is the number of men that live in this world, from which they are expunged that cease to be such. Dr. Hammond.

4. Rejoice in the Lord alway:] Even under your greatest afflictions. Dr. Wells. The Apostle enforces and insists upon this duty of religious joy in the latter part of the verse, because in times of persecution, and in circumstances so distressed as those of the Philippians, it might at first view look like a duty, impracticable and unseasonable. Dean Stanhope.

Anno DOMINI 64.

7 And the peace of God, which passeth all understanding, shall keep your hearts and minds through Christ Jesus.

Anno DOMINI 64.

8 Finally, brethren, whatsoever things are true, whatsoever things are ‖ honest, whatsoever things are just, whatsoever

‖ Or, venerable.

This is not a duty to be performed only now and then, but at all times, upon all occasions, in all conditions: whatsoever happens, we must still take care to keep our hearts in such a temper, that we may "rejoice in the Lord," whether we have, or have not, any thing else to rejoice in. In prosperity we must strive all we can, not to take up with the seeming pleasures of the world, instead of that real and substantial joy, which is to be had in Him who gave them, and who gave them on purpose that we might rejoice the more in Him. And if they who are in adversity would rightly consider, they will find that they have then also cause to rejoice in the Lord, as well as in the greatest prosperity: forasmuch as that also is a sign of that fatherly care and love which He hath for all His sons and servants: "For whom the Lord loveth He chasteneth, and scourgeth every son whom He receiveth," Heb. xii. 6. Bp. Beveridge.

5. Let your moderation be known unto all men.] Your patient enduring of afflictions. Dr. Hammond. Your meekness and patience under all your trials. Compare Wisd. ii. 19, to which the Apostle probably alludes in this place, and where the Greek word is nearly the same. Drs. Whitby and Wells.

The word "moderation" signifies in the original that reasonableness of mind, which curbs the exorbitancies of all our passions, appetites, and imaginations; confining us to proper degrees of being affected by the things about us, and of exerting ourselves in relation to them: from which larger meaning it is naturally and easily contracted to express more especially the due restraints of desire and anger, fear and sorrow. The avoiding of excessive anxiety under the troubles of life, as it is a very common meaning of the word, was that in all likelihood which St. Paul had chiefly in his mind. For it immediately follows, "Be careful for nothing," &c. Abp. Secker.

—— be known unto all men.] This expression comprehends several particulars of great moment: that we should not be satisfied with our own opinion, that we rule our passions well, (a matter, about which we are daily deceived,) but proceed in the discipline of them, till every one else allows us to be masters; that the good effects of our composure should be perceived and felt, not only at some times and by some persons, but always by all who are concerned with us; and lastly, that we should be careful to shew the world around us, by our example, set before them with decency and modesty, how possible, how becoming, how beneficial the practice of this virtue is. Abp. Secker.

—— The Lord is at hand.] By which some understand, that God is always present with us, a strict observer of our actions, a ready help in our troubles, and an irresistible avenger of our wrongs. Others, perhaps more agreeably to the Apostle's intent, interpret this of Christ's coming to judgment. And, if we consider that particular judgment, which each of us undergoes at the day of his death, which determines that state of our accounts, wherein the general judgment will certainly find us, in this sense it is evident to demonstration, that "the Lord is at hand," and His coming cannot be at any great distance from any man whatsoever. Dean Stanhope. The phrase, however, may have respect to the coming of the Lord, to put an end to the state of the unbelieving Jews, the most cruel persecutors of the Christians. Drs. Whitby and Wells.

It is a most weighty consideration, that the time which we have, either for busying and gratifying ourselves here, or preparing for hereafter, is of small duration. For "the Lord is at hand." All that we can hope or dread, enjoy or suffer, in the present state, will soon be over, possibly very soon: and all that we can do to qualify us for the next, how much soever we want, must be done in a very short space of time. The holy and self-denying Jesus, who expects and will assist us to imitate Him, but will cast us off entirely if we neglect it, He hath said, "Behold, I come quickly; and My reward is with Me, to give every man according as his work shall be," Rev. xxii. 12. The truth of these things we all know; the consequences of them we all must see; and no words can make them plainer. Abp. Secker.

6. Be careful for nothing;] Or, anxiously solicitous. Dr. Whitby. See the note on Matt. vi. 25.

—— with thanksgiving] On this Beza remarks, that David, after beginning his prayers with complaints and tears, generally ended them with thanksgivings. The exhortation in this verse implies, not only that the afflicted have many mercies, for which they ought to give God thanks, but that they ought to be thankful for their very afflictions, because they are the means, by which the Father of their spirits maketh them partakers of His holiness, in order to fit them for living with Himself in heaven for ever. Dr. Macknight.

—— let your requests be made known unto God.] By this concluding exhortation it is intimated, that in order to our "rejoicing in the Lord," as is before commanded, we must not suffer our hearts to be distracted with the cares of this life, but let them hang loose and indifferent to all things here below, and fixed only upon God. We must live above this world, and have our conversation in heaven, where only these true joys are to be found: otherwise we can never have them. Bp. Beveridge.

7. —the peace of God,] Or, that inward tranquillity and comfort of mind, which will arise from living according to the rules here given, and from a sense of God's favour thereupon. Dr. Wells. The Apostle promises, not deliverance from calamities, but inward peace and tranquillity of mind under them; and that as the effect of constant prayer, and a sense of the Divine favour. Dr. Whitby.

—— which passeth all understanding,] Which exceeds all understanding, fully and perfectly to comprehend the value of it. Dr. Wells.

That inward sense of our Maker's goodness to us, which even now is delightful beyond the conception of those who have not experienced it; and shall hereafter be so heightened, as vastly to exceed the present conceptions of the best of us. Abp. Secker.

—— shall keep your hearts and minds through Christ Jesus.] The word rendered "keep" is a military term, proper to garrisons; and importing that this inward peace is a strong and impregnable defence, such as will suffer neither the "heart" to be overpowered, that is, the affections to be vitiated, by immoderate fears or hopes or desires of earthly objects; nor the "mind" to be captivated, that is, the understanding and judgment to be imposed upon, by false notions of temporal good or evil. Most seasonable and wise is the use, which our excellent Church makes of these words in dismissing her children after the most solemn acts of worship, with this passage of St. Paul, in form of a blessing; imploring that what he foretells and promises here may be made good to the whole congregation. And most properly does she regard the distinction, generally observed here, between the "heart" and "mind," by begging that her children and members may be kept "in the knowledge and love of God, and of His Son Jesus Christ our Lord." Dean Stanhope.

8. Finally, brethren, &c.] Besides being moved with the admirable spirit expressed, and the sublime precepts diffused, throughout the whole of this Epistle, (see the Introduction,) it is a new subject of wonder and esteem, to see the force and substance of them all collected at last into one brief exhortation, comprehending in so narrow a space the entire compass of virtuous dispositions and right behaviour, as is done in this passage. There is a remarkable accuracy and beauty in these words of the Apostle: each of them singly hath a distinct sense; and joined together they form a connected and complete body of duty. Abp. Secker.

—— whatsoever things are true,] The truths, which St. Paul here exhorts the Philippians to think on, are undoubtedly the truths of the Gospel of Jesus Christ, which he had delivered to them. These he would have them think on, and persist in, and never be prevailed upon by any temptation to depart from them. Abp. Sharp.

—— whatsoever things are honest, —just,] The next thing the Apostle recommends is universal honesty, and justice, and righteousness in our conversation. The two words, "honest" and "just," may be joined together, as importing much the same thing. For though the word rendered "honest" might be rendered grave, or "venerable," as in the margin; yet since that other signification falls in most properly under the last head of the exhortation, the word may be taken here as our translation gives it. Indeed, it is vain to expect any advantage from our profession of the truth, if we be not sincerely just and honest in our actions. Whoever can allow himself in the practice of any dishonest, knavish, indirect dealing, let that man be never so orthodox in his belief and opinions, yet we may be sure he is no Christian. Abp. Sharp.

—— whatsoever things are pure,] Next to justice the Apostle ranks a virtue, seldom violated without grievous injustice; that of shunning the pollution of criminal pleasures, and practising "whatsoever things are pure." Some kinds of sensual excess, as gluttony and drunkenness, are acknowledged to be contemptible and hateful vices. And however favourably too many look on the free indulgence of another appetite, at least in one sex, yet their opinion cannot alter the nature of things. Irregular gratifications must still remain what they are, dishonourable to our reason, destructive to our happiness. And it is surprising that they, who have any rightness of mind, can fail either to discern or to reflect, what meanness it is to make these things the business of their being; and associate, for the sake of them, with the profligate and abandoned; what imprudence to ruin or to hazard their healths, fortunes, or reputations in such wretched courses: and what mischief, to destroy the virtue and peace of the innocent, and harden the guilty in their crimes; to violate faith and honour, distress families, embitter the nearest and tenderest relations of life, confound descents and inheritances, extend infamy, and perhaps diseases also, to successive generations. Abp. Secker.

—— whatsoever things are lovely, &c.] The Apostle having instanced in the things necessary to be daily thought on and pursued by all Christians, sums up his advice in general terms: namely, that, as we are Christians, we should not only take care of the things before mentioned, but should make it our business to improve ourselves in every other sort of virtue; nay, in every other sort of thing, that is praiseworthy, or that is well esteemed among the sober part of mankind. So that really it should be the endeavour of our lives, to render ourselves as excellent, and as exemplary for all sorts of amiable qualities, as it is possible for men to be in this world. Abp. Sharp.

The good nature and agreeableness, here required by the Apostle, is not to supply the room of the justice and purity required before; nor can possibly make amends for the want of them: but we must first resolve to be innocent, then study to be amiable. Now the two great branches of amiable conduct, are those on which the Gospel hath laid so peculiar a stress; mildness in bearing injuries, and bounty in relieving necessities: one of them expressly made the condition of our being forgiven; the other the foundation of our being rewarded. But, besides these endearing virtues, the Apostle undoubtedly designed to enjoin every other act of a generous and disinterested, a candid and sympathizing, heart; every instance of gentleness to the faults, and condescension to the weaknesses, of men; moderation and humility in advantageous circumstances, and patient composedness in low and afflicted ones; every ornamental, as well as more substantial, duty of life; affability of conversation, obliging attentions, kind compliances; whatever will make our common journey through the world mutually comfortable and pleasing, without making it dangerous; and exhibit religion in its native cheerfulness, as a reasonable service paid to an infinitely good Being. For all these things are comprehended under the character of "lovely;" and constitute a much more valuable part of Christian practice than many seem to be aware of. Indeed piety and virtue, however unpolished, deserve high esteem: and it would be a most unhappy mistake, to prefer superficial accomplishments before intrinsick worth. But still, both religion and morals, disguised under a forbidding look, appear so much less to advantage, than when they wear an inviting one; that we wrong our profession, as well as ourselves, if we neglect to shew it in as much beauty, as a modest simplicity will permit; and thus to "adorn the doctrine of God our Saviour in all things," Tit. ii. 10. Abp. Secker.

—— think on these things.] A general observation, which we may make on this direction of the Apostle, is, that we cannot "think on these things" in earnest, as enjoined by our religion, without honouring it highly, and being strongly moved by it to every part of right temper and right conduct. Such precepts evidently prove, that Christianity is not a contrivance to make men, by faith in speculations, and exactness in observances, happy in another world, without being good in the present. Articles of belief, and institutions of worship are instruments only: proper indeed, and appointed ones: and we must never hope to be amended or accepted, unless we take the way to be so, which God hath marked out. But neither must we hope, that a formal use of the means will be sufficient, without serious care to attain the end. "Now the end of the commandment is charity," love to God and man, "out of a pure heart, and of a good conscience, and of faith unfeigned," 1 Tim. i. 5; which words express the very same temper with those of the Apostle in this passage. Abp. Secker.

This is the morality of the Gospel, entirely free from that enthusiastical pride, which, elated with its supernatural sanctity, stoops not to the control of reason; and utterly remote from that enthusiastical extravagance, which, hurried away by spiritual raptures and ecstacies, spurns the feelings of nature, and the restraints of decorum. The Gospel guards the dignity of religion, by engaging in its support truth and justice, order and propriety. Dr. Graves.

9. Those things, which ye have both learned, &c.] To his exhortations St. Paul subjoins with conscious boldness, appealing to all which "they had learned, and received, and heard, and seen in him," that this had been his own disposition and behaviour: yet humbly considers himself as "not having already attained, nor being already perfect," but merely as "pressing toward the mark for the prize of the high calling of God," chap. iii. 12, 14; and not only uses his own "prayers," but begs theirs also, that, "through the supply of the Spirit of Jesus Christ," all things may "turn to his salvation," chap. i. 19, 20. We cannot help honouring such a character: but, if we hope to be better for it, we must also imitate it. Abp. Secker.

11. — I have learned, in whatsoever state I am, therewith to be content.] The Christian traveller, considering himself as such, and looking to the end of his journey, takes up with the accommodations he finds on the road, and learns to be "content with such things as he hath." No traveller was ever in greater straits than St. Paul. But read what he says of himself in this and the next verse. Were we settled upon earth for ever, there would be some excuse for our being solicitous where we lived, what we ate, what we drank, and wherewithal we were clothed. But when we consider in how very short a time it will be exactly the same thing, whether we dwelt in a palace or in a cottage; whether we sat down to two courses or two dishes; whether our garments were made of silk, or of wool; whether we were waited on by twenty servants, or by one; it is not worth while to break the peace of our minds about such unessential circumstances. If God vouchsafe us a share of the good things of the world in our passage through it, let us enjoy them with thankfulness, and let us be charitable and kind to our fellow-travellers, who are not so well provided for. If such good things are denied us, still let us be thankful for what we have. It is far better to want them than to be wedded to them. Bp. Horne. Contentment, even in a prosperous situation, is a commendable quality, since it depends much upon goodness of heart, and a right temper of mind, and without them is not attainable in any condition; yet it must be confessed that when there is an affluence of all accommodations, it is no extraordinary accomplishment to be satisfied; so that this virtue is better tried, and appears to more advantage, when we are deprived of the things which are generally valued, and might be innocently enjoyed. St. Paul says in the text, that he had learned to be contented in all states. And what state was his? The history of the Acts of the Apostles, and his own Epistles, will inform us that it was a state, which to the greater part of men would be very unacceptable and very irksome. Dr. Jortin.

13. I can do all things] Required by Christianity. Dr. Whitby. Behave myself as I ought in every state of life. Dr. Wells. This is not arrogant boasting: for the Apostle glories not in his own strength, but in the strength of another. The Fathers observed three things on this passage: 1st, that the virtue of contentment requires much exercise, learning, and meditation: 2dly, that it is as difficult to learn how to be full, as to be hungry; abundance having destroyed more men than penury, and exposed them to more pernicious lusts: 3dly, that our proficiency in this or in any other virtue is to be ascribed, not to ourselves, but to the Divine assistance. Dr. Whitby.

We are taught by the Scripture, as well as by our own experience, that of ourselves, or by our own natural strength, we can never do all the commandments of God, at least, not so as we are there commanded to do them. Wherefore we are farther taught in the holy Scripture, how to obtain the grace and assistance of God Himself in doing whatsoever He hath commanded, even by faith in Jesus Christ; that if we believe in Him, and accordingly trust on the promises, which God hath made in Him to that purpose, His Spirit shall be always ready to assist us, His "grace shall be sufficient for us, and His strength made perfect in our weakness." So that, as the Apostle here says of Himself, "we can do all things through Christ which strengtheneth us." Bp. Beveridge.

15. — no church communicated with me &c.] That is, I have received supplies from no church but yours. Dr. Whitby.

17. Not because I desire a gift: &c.] The purpose of my commending you, ver. 14, is not that I may receive from you the more for my own benefit, but to give you occasion of exercising your liberality, in proportion to which the richer will be your reward from God. Dr. Hammond.

18. — an odour of a sweet smell, &c.] There were two altars in the temple of the Jews; the altar of incense, within the temple, properly so called, and the altar of sacrifice, without, in the court. On these two were offered all things that were offered to God: and under these two heads, "an odour" of incense, and a "sacrifice," are works of charity here represented, as being the prime things now under the Gospel to obtain God's favour and acceptation. Drs. Hammond and Whitby.

19. — according to his riches in glory] That is, according to the glorious riches of His goodness. Dr. Wells.

THE EPISTLE OF PAUL THE APOSTLE

TO THE COLOSSIANS.

INTRODUCTION.

THE Christians of Colosse, a city of Phrygia, in Asia Minor, having heard of St. Paul's imprisonment at Rome, sent Epaphras thither to inform him of the state of their affairs, and to inquire after his welfare. In return for that mark of attention, St. Paul, while he was still in confinement, and probably in the year 62, wrote this Epistle to the Colossians, and sent it to them by Tychicus and Onesimus. Epaphras was cast into prison after his arrival at Rome; and it is generally supposed that he had provoked the displeasure of the Roman government by his zeal in preaching the Gospel.

We learn from the Acts of the Apostles, that St. Paul was in Phrygia, both in his second and third apostolical journies, in the years 51 and 53; but it is thought by many persons, that this Epistle contains internal marks of his never having been at Colosse when he wrote it. This opinion rests principally upon the following passage: "For I would that ye knew what great conflict I have for you, and for them at Laodicea, and for as many as have not seen my face in the flesh," chap. ii. 1. I must own that these words are not in my judgment conclusive; if they prove any thing upon this question, they prove that St. Paul had never been either at Colosse or Laodicea: but surely it is very improbable that he should have travelled twice into Phrygia for the purpose of preaching the Gospel, and not have gone either to Laodicea or Colosse, which were the two principal cities of that country; and more especially as in the second journey into those parts it is said that he "went over all the country of Galatia and Phrygia, strengthening all the disciples;" and moreover we know, that it was the Apostle's practice to preach at the most considerable places of every district into which he went. However, I confess that there is no proof either in this Epistle, or in the Acts, that St. Paul ever was at Colosse; and therefore after all it is a point which must be left in some degree doubtful. Nor can we ascertain by whom the church at Colosse was founded: for it is possible that St. Paul might have gone thither after some other Apostle or teacher had founded a church there. Some have concluded from the two following passages in this Epistle, that the Colossians were first converted by Epaphras: "As ye also learned of Epaphras our dear fellow servant, who is for you a faithful minister of Christ," chap. i. 7. "Epaphras, who is one of you, a servant of Christ, saluteth you, always labouring fervently for you in prayers, that ye may stand perfect and complete in all the will of God," chap. iv. 12. These passages do not appear to prove that Epaphras originally converted the Colossians to the Gospel, although they shew that he had been an active minister among them; and indeed the expression, "Epaphras, who is one of you," places Epaphras and the other Colossians upon the same footing, and is scarcely consistent with the opinion, that Epaphras was the person through whom the inhabitants of Colosse had embraced Christianity. Upon the whole, I am inclined to think that St. Paul founded the church at Colosse, and my opinion rests principally upon those terms, both of affection and authority, in which this Epistle was written. Dr. Lardner, after quoting and arguing upon several passages of this kind, says, 'From all these considerations, it appears very probable that the church at Colosse had been planted by the Apostle Paul, and that the Christians there were his friends, disciples, and converts.'

This Epistle greatly resembles that to the Ephesians, both in sentiment and expression. After saluting the Colossian Christians in his own name, and that of Timothy, St. Paul assures them, that since he had heard of their faith in Christ Jesus, and of their love to the Christians, he had not ceased to return thanks to God for them, and to pray that they might increase in spiritual knowledge, and abound in every good work; he describes the dignity of Christ, and declares the universality of the Gospel dispensation, which was a mystery formerly hidden, but now made manifest; and he mentions his own appointment, through the grace of God, to be the Apostle of the Gentiles; he expresses a tender concern for the Colossians and other Christians of Phrygia, and cautions them against being seduced from the simplicity of the Gospel by the subtilty of Pagan philosophers, or the superstition of Judaizing Christians, chap. i, ii.; he directs them to set their affections on things above, and forbids every species of licentiousness; he exhorts to a variety of Christian virtues, to meekness, veracity, humility, charity, and devotion; he enforces the duties of wives, husbands, children, fathers, servants, and masters, chap. iii.; he inculcates the duty of prayer, and of prudent behaviour towards unbelievers, and after adding the salutations of several persons then at Rome, and desiring that this Epistle might be read in the church of their neighbours the Laodiceans, he concludes with a salutation from himself, written as usual with his own hand, chap. iv. Bp. Tomline.

1 After salutation he thanketh God for their faith, 7 confirmeth the doctrine of Epaphras, 9 prayeth further for their increase in grace, 14 describeth the true Christ, 21 encourageth them to receive Jesus Christ, and commendeth his own ministry.

PAUL, an apostle of Jesus Christ by the will of God, and Timotheus our brother,

2 To the saints and faithful brethren in Christ which are at Colosse: Grace be unto you, and peace, from God our Father and the Lord Jesus Christ.

3 We give thanks to God and the Father of our Lord Jesus Christ, praying always for you,

4 Since we heard of your faith in Christ Jesus, and of the love which ye have to all the saints,

5 For the hope which is laid up for you in heaven, whereof ye heard before in the word of the truth of the gospel;

6 Which is come unto you, as it is in all the world; and bringeth forth fruit, as it doth also in you, since the day ye heard of it, and knew the grace of God in truth:

7 As ye also learned of Epaphras our dear fellowservant, who is for you a faithful minister of Christ; Anno DOMINI 64.

8 Who also declared unto us your love in the Spirit.

9 For this cause we also, since the day we heard it, do not cease to pray for you, and to desire that ye might be filled with the knowledge of his will in all wisdom and spiritual understanding;

10 That ye might walk worthy of the Lord unto all pleasing, being fruitful in every good work, and increasing in the knowledge of God;

11 Strengthened with all might, according to his glorious power, unto all patience and longsuffering with joyfulness;

12 Giving thanks unto the Father, which hath made us meet to be partakers of the inheritance of the saints in light:

13 Who hath delivered us from the power of darkness, and hath translated us into the kingdom of † his dear Son:

† Gr. the Son of his love.

14 In whom we have redemption through his blood, even the forgiveness of sins:

15 Who is the image of the invisible God, the firstborn of every creature:

Chap. I. The Apostle praises God that the Gospel had been preached to the Colossians by Epaphras, and had had great success among them; and beseeches the Lord to fill them more and more with the knowledge of His will, and with all kind of spiritual gifts. The Apostle represents Christ as the only author of salvation; as Him who created the angels and all other creatures; and by whom all men, the Gentiles in particular, have been perfectly reconciled unto God. St. Paul speaks thus to the Colossians, to convince them that the doctrine of Christ was sufficient to bring men to perfection and salvation, without any necessity of the law of Moses, or any other doctrines. Lastly, he assures them that the sufferings which he endured ought not to stagger them in the profession of the Gospel; and that the end of his preaching was to bring the Gentiles and all men to salvation. Ostervald.

Ver. 3.—to God and the Father &c.] To God, namely, the Father, or who is the Father &c. Dr. Whitby.

4. Since we heard of your faith] Your fidelity or steadiness, namely, to the Christian religion, without the observance of the ceremonial law. Pyle. Whether St. Paul had ever been himself at Colosse, and there preached the Gospel, before he wrote this Epistle, is uncertain. Be that as it may, by "faith" here it seems most reasonable to understand, not so much the first conversion of the Colossians to the Gospel, but rather or principally their constancy in adhering to the true faith, which they had formerly received; in one word, their faithfulness. This is most agreeable to the inscription of the Epistle, ver. 2, "to the faithful brethren in Christ." Compare Eph. i. 15. Dr. Wells.

6.—as it is in all the world;] That is, in all the Roman empire: compare Luke ii. 1; Acts ii. 5; Ezra i. 2. When this Epistle was written, the Gospel had been preached and received in most of the countries within the Roman empire, and had produced a great change in the manners of those who received it. Dr. Macknight.

8.—your love in the Spirit.] That Christian charity, for which, by the grace of God inclining your hearts, ye are become so conspicuous. Dean Stanhope. The love, wrought in you by that Spirit, whose fruit is love. Dr. Whitby.

10. That ye might walk worthy of the Lord unto all pleasing,] That is, so as to please Him in all things. We may here remark the end of all our Christian knowledge; namely, a conversation fruitful in good works, and a life acceptable and well-pleasing to God. Dr. Whitby.

He, that would do any good at all, must be careful to do all he can: otherwise he can never be said to "bring forth much fruit," as all Christians are obliged to do, inasmuch as they desire to live as becometh Christians. This is what St. Paul means by praying, that the Colossians "might walk worthy of the Lord unto all pleasing, being fruitful in every good work:" implying, that it is by our being fruitful, not only in some, but in every good work, that we walk in a manner worthy of so great a Lord as our Lord is, and suitable to our profession of His holy Gospel. Bp. Beveridge.

The Apostle seems here to propose the great subject and design of this Epistle, which was chiefly intended to excite them to a temper and behaviour worthy of their Christian character. And this indeed is the leading view in all the Epistles of this excellent Apostle; and the want of regard to so obvious a key has led many into subtilties of interpretation, which have had no foundation but in their own ingenious reveries. Dr. Doddridge.

13. Who hath delivered us from the power of darkness,] "Darkness" signifies the state of heathen ignorance. The "power" of it is that power, which Satan, the prince of darkness, had over the heathen world, to keep them in idolatry and brutish lusts, Eph. ii. 2. Compare Acts xxvi. 17, 18. Dr. Whitby. The Apostle here speaks of himself, as one of the Gentile converts, as his usual method is. See Eph. i. 2, 3. Pyle.

15. Who is the image of the invisible God, &c.] Who is unto us that only and perfect means, in and by whom, God, which is by nature invisible, is manifested and revealed to mankind: in the Son, as in a clear and perfect glass, we see the Father; that eternal Son had His being of and with the Father, before ever any creature was made. Bp. Hall.

Christ is here styled the image of God by reason of the clear declarations of Divine power, wisdom, majesty, and goodness, which shined forth in His works of creation. Dr. Whitby.

As to the expression, "firstborn of every creature," the Apostle has explained it in the 17th verse, where he says of Christ, "He is before all things." That the phrase is equivalent to 'born before every creature,' is evident from the original of John i. 30, where the declaration of John the Baptist concerning our Saviour is properly rendered, "He was before me." So that from this expression of St. Paul, rightly understood according to his own explication, it is to be rightly inferred, that Christ is truly and essentially God: for He, that is before all things created, is Himself uncreated, and consequently truly God. Dr. Wells.

In these words our Saviour is expressly styled the "firstborn of every creature," that is, begotten by God, as "the Son of His love," antecedently to all other emanations, before any thing proceeded from Him, or was framed and created by Him. And that precedency is presently proved by this undeniable argument, that all other emanations or productions came from Him, and whatsoever received its being by creation, was by Him created. Which assertion is delivered in the most proper, full, and pregnant expressions imaginable. First, in the plain language of Moses, as most consonant to his description: "for by him were all things created, that are in heaven, and that are in earth;" signifying thereby that he speaketh of the same creation. Secondly, by a division which Moses never used, as describing the production only of corporeal substances: lest therefore those immaterial beings might seem exempted from the Son's creation, because omitted in Moses's description, he addeth "visible and invisible;" and lest in that invisible world, among the many degrees of the celestial hierarchy, any order might seem exempted from an essential dependence on Him, he nameth those which are of greatest eminence, "whether they be thrones, or dominions, or principalities, or powers," and under them comprehendeth all the rest. Nor doth it yet suffice, thus to extend the object of His power by asserting all things to be made by Him, except it be so understood as to acknowledge the sovereignty of His person, and the authority of His action. For lest we should conceive the Son of God framing the world as a mere instrumental cause which worketh by and for another, he sheweth Him as well the final as the efficient cause; for "all things were created by Him and for Him." Lastly, whereas all things first receive their being by creation, and when they have received it, continue in the same by virtue of God's conservation, "in whom we live, and move, and have our being;" lest in any thing we should be thought not to depend immediately upon the Son of God, He is described as the conserver, as well as the creator, for "He is before all things, and by Him all things consist." If then we consider these two latter verses by themselves, we cannot deny but they are a most complete description of the Creator of the world; and if they were spoken of God the Father, could be no way injurious to His majesty, who is no where more plainly or fully set forth unto us as the Maker of the world. Bp. Pearson.

The sentiments, that we are to entertain of the Son's dignity from considering these acts of Omnipotence, which he was able to perform, can be no other than the most sublime and exalted, the most reverential and grateful. For He, who had the power of calling into existence the very first elements of all material substance, must be endued with might past all comprehension. He, who hath imparted to us our life, our faculties, the various blessings which we enjoy, must have been infinitely benevolent to mankind. His power excites our admiration: His benevolence claims our veneration and love. Bp. Huntingford.

18. And he is the head of the body, the church:] And another title He hath to us, besides that of Creator; as He hath redeemed us, and purchased us to be a congregation called by His name, a church of Christians, and as by rising from the dead He hath conquered death, and given us victory over it, that we may after Him rise also; and so by all titles He hath right of dominion over all. Dr. Hammond.

—— who is the beginning,] Who is the first cause of all things, giving a beginning unto them all, and restoring them all again by the power of His resurrection, as being the omnipotent raiser of Himself from the dead, and He by whose power all others have risen or shall rise. Bp. Hall. The Greek philosophers expressed the first cause, or efficient principle of things, by the word here rendered "beginning." Dr. Macknight.

—— the firstborn from the dead;] So called, as being the first that rose from the dead, no more to die. For no one has yet risen to an immortal and incorruptible life, but our Saviour Jesus Christ. Parkhurst. See the note from Abp. Tillotson on 1 Cor. xv. 20.

—— that in all things he might have the pre-eminence.] Namely, in respect both of the first and of the second creation: in respect of the creation, properly so called; and of the redemption or restoration of mankind. Dr. Wells.

19. — that in him should all fulness dwell;] All perfection of grace, of wisdom, of power, of goodness, and mercy. Bp. Hall. All fulness of Divine power, to create, redeem, preserve, and raise the church, which is His body. Dr. Whitby.

St. Paul tells us expressly, that Christ is head of the church; a title founded in the right of redemption, that in all things He might have the pre-eminence; that, as He was head of all creatures in virtue of having created them, so He might be the head of the church, the elect people of God, in virtue of having redeemed them; "for it pleased the Father, that in Him should all fulness dwell;" that is, that Christ should be all in all, the head of the second as well as of the first creation; according to St. Paul's reasoning here, if any other person had redeemed the world, or if the world had been redeemed without Christ, He would not "have had the pre-eminence in all things," which yet He had before sin came into the world; and consequently, the sin of the world would have been the diminution of the headship and power of Christ. Upon these principles of the Gospel revelation, we may discern some propriety in Christ's coming to redeem the world: the work was such, that no person with less power could undertake it, and His relation to the world was such, as made it fit and proper to commit the work to Him. Bp. Sherlock.

20. — whether they be things in earth, or things in heaven.] This phrase may be understood according to the Hebrew manner, as equivalent with the world or the whole creation; and so may signify all men of all nations, Gentiles as well as Jews, particularly the Gentile idolaters mentioned in the following verse. Dr. Hammond. Or, by "things in heaven," may be understood the saints departed; intimating that the blood of Christ expiated the guilt of those persons who lived before Him, as well as of those who died after Him: Patriarchs, Prophets, and all the faithful, whether in heaven or in earth, were all reconciled in order to their being saved. Burkitt.

21. And you, that were sometime alienated &c.] You, Colossians and other Gentiles, that were strangers from the worship of the true God, and had engaged yourselves in idolatry and all the wicked practices which attend it. Drs. Wells and Hammond.

24. — of the afflictions of Christ] Every saint of God is a member of Christ's body, and Christ therefore suffers in him. Bp. Hall. Nothing could be farther from the Apostle's intention, as we may learn from the whole tenour of his writings, than to intimate that the sufferings of Christ were imperfect, as to that fulness of atonement which was necessary in order to the justification of believers. But he deeply retained in his mind the impression of that first lesson which he had from his Saviour's mouth, namely, that He was persecuted in His members, Acts ix. 4. He therefore considers it as the plan of Providence, that a certain measure of sufferings should be endured by this body, of which Christ is the head; and he rejoices to think that what he endured in his own person was congruous to that wise and gracious scheme. Dr. Doddridge.

Or, the phrase "afflictions of Christ" here signifies, not the afflictions which Christ suffered, but the afflictions which He appointed the Apostle to suffer, in order to the building of the church. Dr. Macknight. Compare 2 Cor. i. 5, 6.

25. — to fulfil the word of God;] That is, fully to preach it. Dr. Whitby. The meaning of the phrase is, to fulfil the preaching or publishing of the Gospel, or to proceed as far in the preaching of it, as by all his care and diligence he could do, by himself and others: thus being unable to preach it himself to the Colossians, he had sent Epaphras to them, ver. 7. The like phrase in Rom. xv. 19, is rendered, "I have fully preached the Gospel of Christ:" namely, from city to city, from Jerusalem as far as to Illyricum. Dr. Hammond.

26. Even the mystery] See the notes on Eph. i. 9; iii. 5.

27. — which is Christ in you, the hope of glory:] Which mystery in short is the preaching of Christ among you Gentiles, and through Him "the hope of glory." Dr. Wells.

28. Whom we preach, &c.] Whose doctrine we now publish to the world, His precepts of Divine purity, and His glorious promises; first preaching the fundamental heads of the truth of Christ, and then building upon them all further knowledge of Christian duties, that we may bring in all men, Gentiles as well as Jews, to serve God in all that holiness of life, which Christ Jesus Himself exemplified and prescribed. Dr. Hammond.

We may here observe what were the principal subject, manner, and end of the Apostle's preaching. The great subject of it was Christ: the manner was by informing the understanding and judgment of men, by directing their practice, and by warning them of the evil of sin, and the danger of continuing in it: the end was, to present every man perfect in Christ Jesus, complete in knowledge, and complete in obedience. Burkitt.

29. Whereunto I also labour, striving] 'Combating vigorously,' exerting courage, vigour, and diligence, like those who combat in the games. The original word denotes the exertions of those who contended in the Grecian games. To these combatants St. Paul fitly compared himself, because every where he met with the greatest opposition from evil spirits and wicked men; and in preaching the Gospel he sustained toils and sufferings, much greater than those which the combatants sustained in their conflicts. See chap. ii. 1. Dr. Macknight. It may be doubted whether we ought to admire more, the indefatigable pains and diligence used by the Apostle in his ministry, intimated by the words "labouring" and "striving;" or his humility and gratitude, in acknowledging the blessing of the Divine assistance, and ascribing the success of his ministry to the mighty operation of God. Burkitt.

Chap. II. The Apostle repeats his earnest concern and prayer for them; the better to warn them against the errour and subtilty of heathen philosophy, and the vanity of Jewish tradition; encouraging them to depend upon Christ and His religion alone, without any regard to the Jewish ceremonies, or mixing any part of heathen devotion with their Christian worship, especially that of the worship of angels or inferiour demons, as mediators with God, under a pretence of religious humility. Pyle.

Ver. 1. — and for them at Laodicea,] Laodicea was the metropolis of the greater Phrygia; so called from Laodice the wife of Antiochus, son of Stratonice. It was the seat of a Christian church of such note, that one of the seven epistles in the Revelation was directed to its bishop. Dr. Macknight.

2. — and unto all riches of the full assurance of understanding,] That is, the richest and most assured understanding. This is an extremely emphatical phrase, and it is one of the many instances of that strong manner of speaking, with which the writings of the Apostle abound. Dr. Doddridge.

And so these words may be construed, 'the mystery of both the Father, and Christ.' Dr. Whitby.

—— joying and beholding] That is, with joy beholding. Dr. Wells.

8. Beware lest any man spoil you] Plunder you, rob you, cheat you of all that you have, your principles of Christian knowledge. Dr. Hammond.

—— through philosophy and vain deceit,] The meaning is, through an empty and deceitful philosophy. The Apostle does not condemn sound philosophy, but that kind of it, which hath no foundation in truth; and being formed merely from imagination, aided by the pride of human reason, is supported by the "tradition," that is, the affirmation of the inventors, handed down from one to another. The doctrine of the heathen philosophers is called, "the tradition of men," because it was received solely on the authority of the master who delivered it. Dr. Macknight.

—— after the rudiments of the world,] The heathen religions or worship, so called because they contained only the first principles of piety, exceedingly corrupted by idolatry and superstition. Dr. Macknight. In Gal. iv. 3, St. Paul thus denominates the ceremonial ordinances of the Mosaick law. But here "the rudiments," or "elements of the world," are so closely connected with "philosophy and vain deceit," or an empty and deceitful philosophy, that they must be understood to include at least the dogmas of Pagan philosophy; to which, no doubt, many of the Colossians were in their unconverted state attached, and of which the Judaizing teachers, who also were probably themselves infected with them, took advantage, to withdraw the Colossian converts from the purity of the Gospel, and from their true head Christ. And from the general tenour of this chapter, and particularly from ver. 18—23, it appears that these philosophical dogmas, against which the Apostle cautioned his converts, were partly Platonick, and partly Pythagorean: the former teaching the worship of demons or angels, as mediators between man and God; the latter enjoining such abstinence from particular kinds of meat and drink, and such severe mortifications of the body, as God had not commanded. Parkhurst.

9. For in him dwelleth all the fulness of the Godhead bodily.] For in Him the whole Godhead dwelleth essentially, and the Divine nature is not only united to the soul of Christ, but to the body also; and in Him hath God fully revealed Himself to the world. Bp. Hall. Most Christians, agreeably to the literal import of the word, rendered "fulness," hold that "the fulness of the Godhead" consisteth in the fulness of perfection and government, which is essential to the Godhead; and that fulness they believe is essential to Christ as the Son of God. Dr. Macknight. "Bodily;" that is, in the body of Christ, as opposed to the Jewish tabernacle or temple; truly and really, in opposition to types and figures; not only effectually, as God dwells in good men, but substantially or personally, by the strictest union, as the soul dwells in the body, so that "God and man is one Christ." Compare John ii. 21; xiv. 9—11. Parkhurst.

By this phrase the Apostle means, that in Christ, as man, all the fulness of the Godhead, the whole Divine essence and glory dwelleth, not in a figure, like a shadow, or in appearance only, but in a bodily substantial manner, in His very body: for I look upon this word "bodily," as used by the Apostle also for explication, to shew that when he said, that "the fulness of the Godhead dwelleth in Christ," his meaning was, that it dwelleth in His body or flesh, according as he himself elsewhere explains it, saying, that "God was manifest in the flesh," 1 Tim. iii. 16. Although He was truly man, and, whilst He was on earth, in all outward appearance seemed to be no other than an ordinary man, of an earthly body, informed with a reasonable soul, as other men have; yet in that body dwelt all the fulness of the Godhead, the whole Divine essence being fixed in it, and united to it, in such a wonderful and Divine manner, that He was, and is also, truly God manifest in the flesh, the one living and true God, the Creator and Governour of all things, Jehovah, "the Lord, the Lord God, merciful and gracious, longsuffering, and abundant in goodness and truth," Exod. xxxiv. 6; or, as St. John expresses it, "full of grace and truth," John. i. 14. Bp. Beveridge.

It is to be here observed, that Christ is not said to be filled with the fulness of God, as the church is, by reason of the gifts with which she was replenished, and the doctrine she had received from God, Eph. i. 23: but the whole fulness of the Godhead is here said to reside in Him, which must argue Him to be no less than truly and really God, His complete essence dwelling in Him. Well therefore might the Apostle add in the next verse, "Ye are complete in Him," ye need not go to the philosophers for knowledge; ye want no other requisite to your salvation; ye have all that is required, if ye believe and obey and worship Him, who is "the head of all principality and power." Burkitt, Drs. Whitby and Wells.

11. — the body of the sins of the flesh] This phrase may signify, either the body with its sinful lusts; or the whole mass of the sins of the flesh, according to the use of the word "body" in the Hebrew language. The Colossians are said to have been circumcised by the putting off of the sins of the flesh, in respect of their baptism, as is plain from the next verse. For, according to the emblematical meaning of that rite, it signified the crucifixion and burial of their old man, or corrupt nature, with Christ. Now this, being an inward circumcision, may fitly be called a "circumcision made without hands." Dr. Macknight.

12. Buried with him in baptism,] The outward symbol of our spiritual circumcision, and so dead unto sin, Rom. vi. 2—4. Dr. Whitby. See the notes on the passage here referred to.

13. And you, being dead in your sins &c.] Being heathens and uncircumcised, and so without requiring those legal performances of you, He hath received you into covenant, having taken you out of your heathen, dark, dead condition. Dr. Hammond. The Apostle, having said ver. 12, that the Colossians were risen with Christ, adds the present clause, not as a new distinct particular, but only as a farther illustration of the grace of the Gospel; namely, that God had so quickened and raised them up together with Christ, "even when they were dead in their sins." Wherefore the conjunction in this place is best rendered, not "and," but "even;" as it is in the parallel place, Eph. ii. 5. Dr. Wells.

14. Blotting out the handwriting of ordinances &c.] An allusion to a practice among men who cancel bills and bonds and all obligations, wherein they stood bound, when once the debt is satisfied. Now, says the Apostle, your debt of sin is paid to the justice of God by the death of Christ; and seeing the obligation is cancelled, it would be madness and impiety to renew it again, as those do who plead for circumcision, and practise the legal ceremonies. Burkitt. The commentators observe, that in the expression "blotted out" there is an allusion to the discharging of a debt, by defacing the writing which contained the obligation to pay; as in the subsequent expression, "nailing it to the cross," there is an allusion to the ancient custom of abrogating laws, by driving a nail through the tables on which they were written and hung up to publick view. Dr. Macknight.

15. And having spoiled principalities and powers, &c.] Namely, the powers of wickedness, the spirits of Satan: see Luke xxii. 53; Eph. ii. 2; John xii. 31; xiv. 30; and compare Eph. vi. 12. These powers Christ destroyed by His cross; see Heb. ii. 14, 15: by the name of a crucified Jesus, and by the very sign of the cross, despoiling the prince of this world of his dominion, putting him to silence, casting him out of his temples and oracles, and out of those human bodies which he possessed; and so openly convincing the heathens that the deities they so long had worshipped were evil spirits; and, by the miracles wrought in His name, drawing them from their idolatrous practices to the true Christian faith. Drs. Whitby, Hammond, and Wells.

16. Let no man therefore judge you] As if ye did amiss, in not observing the legal distinction "in meat or in drink," or in respect of your not observing "an holyday," &c. Dr. Wells. This, and what follows to the end of the chapter, is founded on the doctrine delivered ver. 10, that the Colossians were made "complete in Christ," as to every thing necessary to salvation. For in that case they were under no obligation to obey the Judaizing teachers, when they enjoined the rites of Moses, the worship of angels, or bodily mortifications, as the means of salvation. Dr. Macknight.

—— an holyday, or of the new moon, or of the sabbath days:] The days observed amongst the Jews were of three sorts: anniversary, which returned every year, called here "an holyday;" lunary, which returned every month, the first day of every "new moon;" weekly, which returned every week, and on the seventh day of the week; all these are abrogated, even the Jewish seventh-day sabbath; and the Lord's day, or the Christian first-day sabbath substituted in its room, 1 Cor. xvi. 2. Burkitt, Dr. Whitby.

From this text it has been rashly concluded, that the sanctification of the seventh day is no indispensable duty in the Christian church; that it is one of those carnal ordinances of the Jewish religion which our Lord hath blotted out. The truth is, however, that in the apostolical age, the first day of the week, though it was observed with great reverence, was not called the sabbath day, but the Lord's day; that the separation of the Christian church from the Jewish communion might be marked by the name as well as by the day of their weekly festival: and the name of the sabbath days was appropriated to the Saturdays and certain days in the Jewish church, which were likewise called sabbath days in the law, because they were observed with no less sanctity. The sabbath days therefore, of which St. Paul speaks in this passage, were not the Sundays of Christians, but the Saturdays and other sabbaths of the Jewish calendar. The Judaizing hereticks, with whom St. Paul was all his life engaged, were strenuous advocates for the observation of these Jewish festivals in the Christian church; and his admonition to the Colossians is, that they should not be disturbed by the reproaches of those who censured them for neglecting to observe these Jewish sabbaths with Jewish ceremonies. It appears from the first Epistle to the Corinthians, that the Sunday was observed in the church of Corinth with St. Paul's own approbation; it appears from the Apocalypse, that it was generally observed in the time when that book was written by St. John; and it is mentioned by the earliest apologists of the Christian faith as a necessary branch of Christian worship. But the sabbaths of the Jewish church are abolished; nor is the Christian, in the observance of his own sabbath, to conduct himself by the childish rules of the old Pharisaical superstition. Bp. Horsley. See the note from Abp. Wake on Exod. xx. 11; and from Bp. Horsley on Deut. v. 14.

17. Which are a shadow] Or faint and imperfect representation "of things to come" under the Gospel; that is, of Christian duties; "but the body is of Christ;" that is, the substance, or real duties and virtues shadowed by the legal rites, are those which are instituted and required by the Gospel. Dr. Wells.

18. — in a voluntary humility and worshipping of angels,] See the note from Parkhurst on ver. 8. That is, by seducing you to worship angels, as a piece of voluntary humility acceptable to God. Dr. Wells. Pretending probably, that it was presumptuous to go to God immediately, without the mediation of those excellent creatures. Burkitt. Or that those spirits, who were employed by God in the ministry of the Gospel, ought in gratitude for that service, and out of respect to their dignity, to be worshipped. St. Paul condemns all this, without any reserves made for lower degrees of worship: he charges the Christians to beware of that "vain philosophy," ver. 8, and not to be deceived by those shews of "humility," or the speculations of men, who pretended to explain what they did not know, as "intruding into things which they had not seen, vainly puffed up by their fleshly mind." with the Christian religion, this was the proper place for declaring them: but the condemning of that matter so absolutely looks as a very express prohibition of all sort of worship to angels. Indeed Christ is always proposed to us, as the only Person by whom we come unto God: and when the Apostle speaks against the worshipping of angels, he sets Christ out in His glory in opposition to it. "For in Him dwelleth" &c. see verses 9, 10. Bp. Burnett.

The worship which so many Christians pay to angels, to saints, to images, to bones, and relicks, and to the blessed Virgin, whom they style our Lady, and the mother of God, and the queen of heaven, is really a false worship hardly distinguishable from idolatry. When it is said, by way of excuse, that they worship these only as mediators, that alters the case very little, since to apply to a false mediator is as much a departure from Jesus Christ our only Advocate, as to worship a fictitious deity is withdrawing our faith and allegiance from the true God. St. Paul saith expressly, Let no man beguile you of your reward by a voluntary humility and worshipping of angels, intruding into those things which he hath not seen, vainly puffed up in his fleshly mind, and not holding the Head, which is Christ. Thus he forewarned Christians; but the worshipping of angels and saints, as mediators, crept into the church about four hundred years afterwards, and hath continued ever since, in defiance of his admonitions, and against the whole tenour of the sacred writings. Dr. Jortin.

There is not one text in the scriptures of the New Testament to warrant angel-worship: but on the contrary we have here a very plain prohibition of it in general terms: where the worshipping of angels condemned, being joined with voluntary humility, plainly enough signifies such worship of angels as is performed under colour of humility, that is with this pretence, that it is a kind of presumption in us vile sinners to make our addresses immediately to the supreme God by His eternal Son; to apply ourselves to the angels, the heavenly ministers; and by their merits and intercessions to convey our petitions to the great King of heaven. And who sees not, this is the very same angel-worship which the Papists at this day practise and defend, and that under the same colour and pretence? Bp. Bull.

—— intruding into those things which he hath not seen, &c.] Thus did the philosophers, and those Christians who embraced their sentiments, in all their inducements to worship these angels and inferiour spirits: and thus also do the Romanists in saying, that saints and angels see all things, or perceive our prayers, by seeing Him who seeth all things; that they are worshipped by the Divine law and counsel; and that by invoking them we do a thing grateful to God: it being certain that nothing of this kind can be proved from Scripture. Dr. Whitby.

19. — the Head, from which all the body &c.] As, in every living creature, perception and motion proceed from the head; so to every Christian, knowledge of God's will, and power to obey it, flow from Christ. As the head governs and directs each limb, so Christ is the Sovereign and Lawgiver of each believer. As being joined to the head makes the whole body one animal frame; so being joined to Christ makes the whole number of Christians one spiritual society. As communication with the head preserves our natural life; so communion with Christ supports our religious life. He therefore is to the church what the head is to the body: and each person who belongs to the church is a member of that body: or in the language of the Catechism, "a member of Christ." For He, as St. Paul expresses it, is "the head: from which all the body having nourishment ministered, and knit together by joints and bands, increaseth with the increase of God." And this manner of speaking is frequently repeated in Scripture, as it well deserves; being not only admirably fitted to represent the happy relations in which we stand to our Redeemer, but also to remind us of the duties which are derived from them: of the honour and obedience due to Him who is "Head over all things to His body, the church;" of our continual dependence on Him, "since He is our life;" and of the tenderness and kindness which we owe to our fellow Christians, and they to us, being all united through Him so intimately to each other. Abp. Secker.

—— increaseth with the increase of God.] That is, in all piety and virtue, and so in that righteousness, which is accepted by God unto salvation, without any heathen or Jewish rites. Dr. Wells.

20. Wherefore if ye be dead with Christ from the rudiments of the world,] If by taking upon you Christianity ye have renounced, as ye ought, the observance of heathen and Jewish rites. Dr. Wells. See the note on ver. 8.

21. (Touch not; taste not; handle not;] The Apostle here personates the false teachers delivering these precepts to their disciples. Dr. Macknight.

22. Which all are to perish with the using;)] Or, 'All which things are to perish in the using:' these words are to be understood as in a parenthesis. Parkhurst. The Apostle adds his reasons, why under the Christian dispensation acceptable worshipping of God does not consist in such observances; both because meats and drinks are designed for the benefit of man, for preserving his temporal life, and are consumed in their use. They all come to corruption, and are consumed in doing us service: they cannot otherwise be of use. Poole.

—— after the commandments and doctrines of men?] See the note from Parkhurst on ver. 8.

23. — in will worship,] Voluntary worship, performed without any positive command, or absolute obligation: the word manifestly refers to "the worshipping of angels," ver. 18, and must therefore be understood in a bad sense. Parkhurst.

—— and neglecting of the body; not in any honour &c.] Or, 'in severity to the body, not in any respect or regard' paid to the body, namely, "for the satisfying of the flesh." Parkhurst. The Apostle means, that the body is as real a part of our nature as the soul, and ought to have such food and recreation as are necessary to its health and vigour; otherwise it cannot serve the soul in the ordinary functions and offices of life. And therefore the wisdom, which teaches the neglecting of the body, is not wisdom but folly. Dr. Macknight.

Chap. III. From the consideration of the happiness of a future state, now assured to them by their Christianity, the Apostle exhorts the Colossians to renounce all those vicious practices they were subject to, in their heathenish condition; among which, inordinate anger, revenge, and filthy conversation were the chief. He shews them their great obligation to purity, peaceableness, and charity; and to an exact observation of the relative duties,

Ver. 1. If ye then be risen with Christ, &c.] The genuine method of paying honour to every article of our creed is allowing it the proper influence on our hearts and lives. Christ's resurrection is vain with respect to us, unless we be raised by it to the faith of a better world; and the firmest faith of that is vain also unless it excite us to love, and "seek those things which are above." This passage of St. Paul therefore is justly made one principal part of our Easter-day's service: and the degree of our practical regard to it, will be the true measure of our improvement by the discipline of the past season of Lent, and of God's acceptance of our celebration of Easter. Abp. Secker.

1, 2. —seek those things which are above,—Set your affection on things above,] These phrases seem to import, that we should put the highest estimation and value on things above: that we should have them fixed in our spirits, and familiarly occurring to our thoughts by fervent meditations and serious reflections on them: that we should have our wills inclined to them, and our affections possessed with frequent love and passionate desires of them: and that we should employ our faculties and members in pursuit of them with diligence and constancy. Dr. Whitby.

Christ, having purchased for us life by His death, hath given us assurance of it by His resurrection, and, in effect, raised up us the same time with Himself. "If then we be" thus "risen with Christ, where shall our hearts be, but where our treasure is:" fixed on Him, whose compassion planned the scheme of our salvation; on Him, whose love executed it; on Him, whose grace enables us to share in it; on that kingdom of glory, in which we shall reign after death; on those heavenly doctrines and precepts, by which we are to prepare ourselves for it in the mean while? That we "walk not by sight, but by faith;" that "we labour not for the meat which perisheth, but for that which endureth to everlasting life;" that we "love not the world, neither the things that are in the world," but have "our conversation in heaven," as "fellowcitizens of the saints," and members "of the houshold of God." Abp. Secker. As if the Apostle had said, Aspire to that heavenly glory, of which Christ your Lord and head is already possessed, and that in the most eminent degree; having all power in heaven given to Him, and so the power of bestowing the same heavenly glory on all such as shall tread in His steps and obey His precepts. Direct your thoughts, desires, and affections, towards that solid, stable, lasting, yea everlasting felicity; and suffer them not to settle or rest in the transitory, vanishing, and perishing enjoyments of this earth. And to the same sense and purpose the Holy Ghost speaks in very many other places of Scripture. It is therefore so far from being sinful, in the course of our Christian obedience, to cast an eye towards the heavenly reward for our encouragement, that we sin if we do not do so: yea, if we do not fix our eye on it, and employ our chief studies, cares, and desires about the obtaining of it. For unless we do thus, we transgress the plain commandment of God, who alone hath power to determine what we ought to do, and who best knows what is fittest for us to do. Bp. Bull.

3. For ye are dead,] To the world, and to all the vain and sinful motions and desires thereof. Bp. Hall.

——and your life is hid with Christ in God.] Namely, your true life, which consists in fruition of God, and which you shall live for ever with Him, is hid with Christ, who is now removed from your sight, and placed at the right hand of God: for "it doth not yet appear what we shall be," 1 John iii. 2. Dr. Whitby.

4. When Christ, who is our life, shall appear, &c.] Though the excellence of our immortal life do not yet appear, because He, who now lives in our human nature, is absent and unseen; yet, when He comes again, the glories of it shall be manifested in the person, not of Him only, but of every good Christian. Dean Stanhope.

5. Mortify therefore your members which are upon the earth;] This may engage you to subdue and bring down all those vicious affections that are in your members, and that savour and desire nothing but earthly things. Dr. Hammond. The Apostle, having represented the vicious appetites and passions of the human heart under the idea of a "body," chap. ii. 11, "the body of the sins of the flesh," because they have their seat in the body, in this passage elegantly calls the sinful actions, to which these bad affections prompt men, "the members" of that body, or old man. Dr. Macknight, Dean Stanhope.

——covetousness, which is idolatry:] See Eph. v. 5, and the note there.

When persons, having no practical sense of religion, no fear and no love of God, place their whole trust in the riches and the power of this present world, they are idolaters in the figurative sense. Covetousness, says St. Paul, is idolatry, and the covetous man is an idolater. He chargeth them who are rich in this world, not to trust in uncertain riches, but in the living God. So because very vicious and debauched persons are wholly intent upon gratifying their sensual inclinations, the same Apostle represents these also as figurative idolaters, whose god is their belly. Dr. Jortin. See Bp. Sanderson's note on Phil. iii. 19.

6. —the children of disobedience:] See Eph. ii. 2, and the note there.

7. In the which ye also walked some time, when ye lived in them.] Or, 'among them.' Of which sins ye formerly were guilty, when ye conversed among the heathens, and followed their idol-worship. Dr. Hammond.

8. But now ye also put off all these; &c.] But now that you are Christians, ye are obliged to put off all, not only these forenamed, but of the other sort of affections; all sudden inflammations of anger, all rising of it to any height, all continuance of it upon you, until it be increased into malice; and for the tongue, let not that be guilty of any reproachful, unclean, or false discourse. Dr. Hammond, Burkitt.

"Blasphemy" signifies, either the wounding of another's reputation by evil reports, evil speaking, calumny, railing; or, speaking impiously against God or religion. Here it appears to have the former sense: in Eph. iv. 31, the same Greek word is rendered "evil-speaking." Parkhurst.

—— but Christ is all, and in all.] In the profession of the Gospel it matters not what be a man's natural condition: it is sufficient for his pardon and salvation that he becomes a Christian and lives up to the precepts and faith of the Gospel. Pyle.

12. — as the elect of God, holy and beloved,] That is, persons chosen to be His people and church, and to whom now belong the titles formerly given to the Jews. Dr. Wells. That the Apostle speaks not here of any absolute election of some particular persons to eternal life, but of the Colossians being chosen out of the heathen world, to be His church and people, is evident, because he speaks to the church in general: and yet to these elect he promises the blessings of Christianity, only "if they continue in the faith grounded and settled, and be not moved away from the hope of the Gospel," expressing his care and fear lest they should be deceived and "beguiled of their reward;" chap. i. 23; ii. 4, 18. Dr. Whitby.

16. Let the word of Christ] The doctrine of the Gospel. Dr. Hammond, Dean Stanhope. So called, because it has Christ for its author, Christ for its object, and Christ for its end. Burkitt.

17. — do all in the name of the Lord Jesus,] For He is the only person, by whom our prayers and praises must be offered to His Father under the Gospel, as through Him are derived down to us all mercies, for which we address prayers or praises to God. Dean Stanhope. See the note on Eph. v. 20.

In many ways and particular respects, we may, and we ought, to perform all we do, "in the name of Jesus." We should do every thing out of grateful affection and respect to Him, as our chief principle; every thing, as His servants, aiming especially at the pleasing of Him, and promoting His honour, as our principal end; every thing according to His will and commandment, as our constant rule; every thing after His example, as our best pattern; every thing in confidence of His gracious assistance and blessing, as our only strength and support; every thing with hope of acceptance purely on His account; every thing with thankful sense and acknowledgment to God for the mercies and favours conveyed unto us by His means, conferred upon us for His sake; every thing with humble invocation of Him, or with prayer to God in His name; in sum, every thing with a due and proper regard had to Him; so that He be not passed over or left out in any thing we undertake; but come always into consideration, according as our relations to Him, and our obligations to Him, do require. In the performances of which duties the life indeed of our religion, of all our good practice, of all our devotion, doth consist. Dr. Isaac Barrow.

18. Wives, submit yourselves &c.] See the notes on Eph. v. 21.

22. Servants, obey in all things your masters &c.] From servants is due, in the first place, respectful and ready obedience; diligence, joined with care that no business be neglected, or delayed, or mismanaged; honesty, truth, and secrecy; sobriety and chastity; peaceableness and good temper. These are the duties of servants: and as the faithful performance of them is the surest way of serving themselves, and being happy in this world; so, if it proceed from a true principle of conscience, God will accept it, as service done to Himself, and make them eternally happy for it in the next: whereas wilfully transgressing, or negligently slighting, the things which they ought to do, whatever pleasure or whatever advantage it may promise or produce to them for a while, will seldom fail of bringing them at last to shame and ruin even here, and will certainly bring them, unless they repent and amend, to misery hereafter. *Abp. —— and there is no respect of persons.] With Christ, who will judge both masters and servants according to the rules of justice. Dr. Wells.

As there are duties which servants owe to their employers, so there are duties also, and very necessary ones, which masters and mistresses owe to their servants: such as to behave towards them with meekness and gentleness, not imperiously and with contempt; and to restrain them, as far as may be, from giving bad usage one to another; never to accuse, threaten, or suspect them, without or beyond reason; to hear patiently their defences and complaints; and bear, with due moderation, their mistakes and faults: neither to make them, when in health, work or fare harder than is fitting; nor suffer them, when in sickness, to want any thing requisite for their comfort and relief: if they be hired servants, to pay their wages fully and punctually at the time agreed: if they are put to learn any business or profession, to instruct them in it carefully and thoroughly; not only to give them time for the exercises of religion, but assistance to understand, and encouragement to practise, every part of their duty; to keep them, as much as possible, both from sin and temptation, and particularly from corrupting each other: to shew displeasure, when they do amiss, as far, and no farther than the case requires; and to countenance and reward them, when they serve well, in proportion to the merit and length of such service. For all these things are natural dictates of reason and humanity: and clearly implied in this comprehensive rule of Scripture, "Masters, give unto your servants that which is just and equal; knowing that ye also have a Master in heaven." Abp. Secker.

Chap. IV. The first verse concludes the exhortations of the latter part of the foregoing chapter, and ought to have been joined to it. Then the Apostle exhorts the Colossians to constant prayer for themselves, and for him their Gentile Apostle; to discretion in their behaviour toward infidels, and to prudence in their words and expressions to all men: introduces salutations to and from several Christians: orders this Epistle to be read to the Laodiceans, and theirs to be read by the Colossians: and annexes a warning to Archippus. His own salutation and conclusion. Pyle.

Ver. 2. Continue in prayer,] This direction, being given here and at Eph. vi. 18, immediately after the Apostle's exhortation to relative duties, may have been intended to teach us, that they who live in one family should often join in social prayer for God's assistance, that they may be enabled to perform their duties to each other. Dr. Macknight.

3. —— a door of utterance,] Plentiful opportunities and liberty publickly to preach the Gospel. Dr. Hammond.

5. —— that are without,] That is, not of the church, whether Jews or Gentiles. Dr. Wells. See the note on Eph. v. 16.

Our Saviour says to His disciples, "Beware of men," and, "Be wise as serpents:" and St. Paul here exhorts Christians, to "walk in wisdom toward" the Gentiles. By which counsels may be meant, that they should stand upon their guard, and use all honest methods, all arts consistent with the honour of God and the duties of religion, to secure their lives, liberties, fortunes, and reputation; to expose and disappoint wicked designs formed against them; to win over an adversary by affability and compliance; and to gain the affection and esteem of those with whom they should dwell. Dr. Jortin.

6. Let your speech be alway with grace,] Mild and courteous; "seasoned with salt," wise and discreet. Salt, on account of its use in preserving men's food and rendering it palatable, was anciently the emblem of wisdom and virtue. It is so used Matt. v. 13; Mark ix. 50. Drs. Whitby and Macknight.

By "speech with grace" the best interpreters understand graceful speech. The observing of this both expresses and increases mutual goodwill; and enables us, from being innocently entertaining, to become seriously useful. Abp. Secker.

10. Aristarchus — Marcus,] See Acts xix. 29; xx. 4; xxvii. 2. It seems evident hence, that St. Paul's displeasure against St. Mark, mentioned Acts xv. 37, 38, lasted not long: for he desires Timothy to bring him with him, as being "profitable to him for the ministry," 2 Tim. iv. 11; and styles him his "fellow-labourer," Philem. ver. 24. Dr. Whitby.

15. —the church which is in his house.] His Christian household. Dr. Whitby. See the note on 1 Cor. xvi. 19.

16. —the epistle from Laodicea.] Probably the epistle to the Ephesians, a copy of which may have been sent by direction of the Apostle to the Laodiceans, whose city lay between Ephesus and Colosse, at least not far out of the road, with an order to them to communicate it to the Colossians. Drs. Wells and Macknight.

17. And say to Archippus, &c.] Generally supposed to be the same mentioned Philem. ver. 2. What station Archippus held in the church at Colosse is not known. It is supposed by some that the Apostle in these words directed the Colossians to rebuke him for some negligence in the performance of his duties. Others are of opinion that the Apostle meant the Colossians to encourage Archippus to diligence, because the false teachers at Colosse were active in spreading their errours. This latter opinion is more agreeable to the respectful manner in which Archippus is addressed in the Epistle to Philemon, written and sent at this time. Dr. Macknight.

THE FIRST EPISTLE OF PAUL THE APOSTLE

TO THE THESSALONIANS.

INTRODUCTION.

IT is recorded in the Acts, chap. xvii. 1—9, that St. Paul, in his first journey upon the continent of Europe, preached the Gospel at Thessalonica, at that time the capital of Macedonia, with considerable success; but that after a short stay he was driven thence by the malice and violence of the unbelieving Jews. From Thessalonica St. Paul went to Berea, and thence to Athens, at both which places he remained but a very short time. From Athens he sent Timothy to Thessalonica, to confirm the new converts in the faith, and to inquire into their conduct. Timothy upon his return found St. Paul at Corinth. Thence probably, in the year 52, St. Paul wrote this Epistle to the Thessalonians; and it is to be supposed that the subjects of which he treats were suggested by the account which he received from Timothy. It is now generally believed that this was written the first of all St. Paul's Epistles, but it is not known by whom it was sent to Thessalonica. The church there consisted chiefly of Gentile converts, chap. i. 9. St. Paul, after saluting the Thessalonian Christians in the name of himself, Silas, and Timothy, assures them that he constantly returned thanks to God on their account, and mentioned them in his prayers; he acknowledges the readiness and sincerity with which they embraced the Gospel, and the great reputation they had acquired by turning from idols to serve the living God, chap. i.; he reminds them of the bold and disinterested manner in which he had preached among them; comforts them under the persecutions which they, like other Christians, had experienced from their unbelieving countrymen, and informs them of two ineffectual attempts which he had made to visit them again, chap. ii.; and that being thus disappointed, he had sent Timothy to confirm their faith, and inquire into their conduct; he tells them that Timothy's account of them had given him the greatest consolation and joy in the midst of his affliction and distress, and that he continually prayed to God for an opportunity of seeing them again, and for their perfect establishment in the Gospel, chap. iii.; he exhorts to purity, justice, love, and quietness, and dissuades them against excessive grief for their deceased friends; hence he takes occasion to recommend preparation for the last judgment, the time of which is always uncertain, and adds a variety of practical precepts. He concludes with his usual benediction, chap. iv, v.

This Epistle is written in terms of high commendation, earnestness, and affection. Bp. Tomline.

CHAP. II.

1 In what manner the gospel was brought and preached to the Thessalonians, and in what sort also they received it. 18 A reason is rendered both why Saint Paul was

God," "the election of grace," means men chosen to be partakers of the blessings of the Gospel, and to be God's peculiar church and people. For the Apostle doth not here speak of any absolute election of the whole church of the Thessalonians to eternal life, because he could have no certain knowledge of it; and, if he had, he could not have been under any just grounds of fear, as we find he was, "lest by some means the tempter should have tempted them, and his labour should be in vain" among them, Chap. iii. 5. Dr. Whitby.

The "election" here spoken of is similar to that which Moses has described, Deut. vii. 6. "The Lord thy God hath chosen (elected) thee to be a special people unto Himself, above all people that are upon the face of the earth." But the Judaizing teachers denied the election of the Gentiles to be the people of God, whilst they refused to subject themselves to the law of Moses. Wherefore it was highly proper to assure the Thessalonians that they were "elected," or made the people of God, by faith in Christ alone. The controversy, agitated in latter times concerning particular election, was not known in the primitive church. Dr. Macknight.

This passage is addressed to all the Thessalonians; to the whole body of Christians at Thessalonica; and the election here spoken of means their being called to the knowledge of the Gospel; and their "work of faith," and "labour of love," and "patience of hope," here commended, refer to the sincerity and firmness with which they adhered to the Christian profession. Again the Apostle says, "God hath from the beginning chosen you to salvation, through sanctification of the Spirit, and belief of the truth, whereunto He called you by our Gospel," 2 Thess. ii. 13, 14: "the sanctification of the Spirit and belief of the truth," which were common to every true convert, are here denominated the being "chosen to salvation;" that is, the Thessalonians, by embracing Christianity, were now enabled to obtain salvation: but that this salvation was not certain and infallible, is evident from the numerous exhortations and precepts contained in these Epistles, and particularly from the following earnest entreaty: "Furthermore then we beseech you, brethren, and exhort you by the Lord Jesus, that as ye have received of us how ye ought to walk and to please God, so ye would abound more and more," chap. iv. 1: a continual progress in obedience to the instructions which St. Paul had given to the Thessalonians was therefore necessary on their part to secure their salvation. St. Paul was also under apprehension, "lest by some means the tempter should have tempted them, and his labour be in vain;" which could not have been the case, if their election was a proof of their salvation being irreversibly decreed. It appears from the second Epistle to the Thessalonians, that some of them did "walk disorderly," and that St. Paul doubted whether they would obey his precepts, 2 Thess. iii. 11, 14; that is, whether they would be saved: and consequently the being from the beginning chosen by God to salvation, the sanctification of the Spirit, and the belief of the Gospel, did not prevent disorderly behaviour, or necessarily cause obedience even to the commands of an inspired Apostle. Bp. Tomline.

5.— in power, and in the Holy Ghost, and in much assurance;] With miracles, and extraordinary gifts, and matter of abundant conviction. Dr. Hammond.

—— what manner of men we were among you for your sake.] How we were enabled by these things to give full proof of our ministry. Dr. Whitby. Or, after what manner we demeaned ourselves among you, with what meekness, patience, diligence, (more especially with what disinterestedness, Dr. Macknight,) for the winning of your souls. Bp. Hall.

6. — with joy of the Holy Ghost:] With a most cheerful mind, assisted with the inward comforts of the Holy Spirit. Pyle. In the foregoing verse the Apostle lays before them the outward testimonies of the truth of Christianity from the miracles wrought, and the gifts of the Holy Ghost exercised amongst them: here he appeals also to the inward testimonies they had received of it, even a strong spiritual joy wrought in them by the Holy Ghost under the sharpest sufferings, according to the words of St. Peter, 1 Pet. iv. 14. Dr. Whitby.

7. — in Macedonia and Achaia.] See note at Acts xvi. 9.

8. For from you sounded out the word of the Lord &c.] Hereby may be understood, either that the Gospel itself was published thence into the other parts of Macedonia and Achaia; or else that the fame of the great success of the Gospel at Thessalonica was so published, and did dispose others to embrace the Gospel; or jointly both. Dr. Wells.

9, 10. — to serve the living and true God; And to wait for his Son from heaven,] By their worshipping "the living and true God," as opposed to lifeless and fictitious deities, the Thessalonians were distinguished from the heathens: and by their "waiting for the Son of God from heaven," they were distinguished from the Jews. The second coming of Christ, to punish His enemies and reward His faithful servants, was twice promised by Himself, Matt. xvi. 27; John xiv. 3; was foretold by the angels at His ascension, Acts i. 11; and was always a principal topick, on which the Apostles insisted in their discourses; consequently it was a principal article of the faith and hope of the first Christians, a frequent subject of their conversation, and a powerful source of consolation to them in all their afflictions and troubles. May it ever be the object of our faith and hope, and the source of our consolation, especially at death! Dr. Macknight.

"To wait for the Son of God from heaven," signifies to continue with patience and well-doing, in expectation of the coming of our Saviour and Judge; which sense is completely expressed, Phil. iii. 17, 20, 21. The expectation of Christ coming to judge the world is peculiar to Christians; and it is supported by the belief of the resurrection of Christ, that great and main point of faith, which the Apostles were commissioned to teach and establish in the church of God. Bp. Sherlock.

Chap. II. The Apostle reminds the Thessalonians that he had preached the Gospel to them with sincerity, and without any view to interest; and, that he might not be burdensome to them, he had supported himself by his own labour; and that he had always exhorted them to live to the honour of that God who had called them to His glory. Secondly, he blesses God that his so long absent from them, and also why he was so desirous to see them.

FOR yourselves, brethren, know our entrance in unto you, that it was not in vain:

2 But even after that we had suffered before, and were shamefully entreated, as ye know, at Philippi, we were bold in our God to speak unto you the gospel of God with much contention.

3 For our exhortation was not of deceit, nor of uncleanness, nor in guile:

4 But as we were allowed of God to be put in trust with the gospel, even so we speak; not as pleasing men, but God, which trieth our hearts.

5 For neither at any time used we flattering words, as ye know, nor a cloke of covetousness; God is witness:

6 Nor of men sought we glory, neither of you, nor yet of others, when we might have ‖ been burdensome, as the apostles of Christ.

‖ Or, used authority.

7 But we were gentle among you, even as a nurse cherisheth her children:

8 So being affectionately desirous of you, we were willing to have imparted unto you, not the Gospel of God only, but also our own souls, because ye were dear unto us.

Anno DOMINI 54.

9 For ye remember, brethren, our labour and travail: for labouring night and day, because we would not be chargeable unto any of you, we preached unto you the gospel of God.

10 Ye are witnesses, and God also, how holily and justly and unblameably we behaved ourselves among you that believe:

11 As ye know how we exhorted and comforted and charged every one of you, as a father doth his children,

12 That ye would walk worthy of God, who hath called you unto his kingdom and glory.

13 For this cause also thank we God without ceasing, because, when ye received the word of God which ye heard of us, ye received it not as the word of men, but as it is in truth, the word of God, which ministry had been effectual among them, and that they had endured with so much constancy the persecutions, which at that time were every where raised against the Christians by the Jews, whose hatred he himself had experienced during his stay at Thessalonica, finding them the bitterest enemies of the Gospel. Thirdly, he expresses the desire which he had to see the Thessalonians, and his ardent affection towards them. Ostervald.

Ver. 1. — that it was not in vain:] Or, 'that it was not vain;' either as to its motive, or to its effect. Dr. Wells. It was not chargeable with any fallacious or treacherous aim, since the persecution and tribulations he experienced at Philippi would have discouraged a worldly designer from going farther. Dr. Hammond. And it was not without such Divine assistance, as was sufficient to work conviction in the hearers, and to engage them to embrace the truth delivered to them. Dr. Whitby.

2. — with much contention.] With much fervency of zeal, and with powerful opposition of the gainsayers. Bp. Hall.

3. For our exhortation was not of deceit,] That is, it did not proceed from imposture, properly speaking, as if we went about to impose upon or seduce you: nor was it "of uncleanness," or any wicked design to corrupt your morals by preaching doctrines agreeable to the corrupt desires of the flesh: nor was it "in guile," or cunning, to promote any worldly interest of our own. Dr. Wells. Or, my arguments to you were free from all sinister and selfish designs; void of all deceitful purposes to ingratiate myself with men, for the gratification of any sinful passions of my own. Pyle. In this and what follows, the Apostle delineates his own character and the character of his assistants, to make the Thessalonians sensible that they had nothing in common with impostors, who are always found to use the mean vicious practices which the Christian teachers disclaimed. Dr. Macknight.

5. — nor a cloak of covetousness;] The phrase denotes a pretence, of piety or zeal for instance, covering or cloaking covetousness: 'a cloak over covetousness,' as Dr. Macknight renders it. Parkhurst. Flattery and covetousness were vices, to which the teachers of philosophy in ancient times were remarkably addicted. In truth these vices enter, more or less, into the character of all impostors. The Apostle appealed to the Thessalonians for his not using "flattering words," because that was an outward matter of which they could judge: but he appealed to God for his being free from "covetousness," because it was a secret of the heart, which God alone knew. Here therefore is great propriety of sentiment. Dr. Macknight.

From this example of St. Paul it appears that an oath is lawful to a Christian. He may solemnly appeal to God, and call Him to witness the truth of what he says, upon a just and great occasion. Burkitt.

6. Nor of men sought we glory,] In requiring greater deference to be paid to us outwardly, or liberal provision to be made for us. Dr. Wells.

—— when we might have been burdensome, &c.] When we might have taken upon us, and have required a chargeable maintenance, and have used authority as the Apostles of Christ. Bp. Hall. See the margin.

7. — even as a nurse] Or rather 'a nursing-mother.' Parkhurst. Even as a nurse, who is also the mother, cherisheth her own children, and waiteth upon them with the tenderest love. Schleusner.

8. So being affectionately desirous of you,] That is, of your good. Dr. Whitby.

—— but also our own souls,] Or 'lives.' Dr. Wells. To have spent our lives in your service. Dr. Whitby.

11. — as a father doth his children,] The Apostle, having compared his gentleness towards the Thessalonians to the tenderness of a nursing-mother for her infant children, here compares the affection and earnestness, with which he recommended holiness to them, to the affection and earnestness of a pious father, engaged in the instruction of his own children. An admirable mixture of meekness and gentleness with gravity and authority. Dr. Macknight, Burkitt.

12. — who hath called you unto his kingdom and glory.] To the honour and privilege of being Christians here, and, if you continue constant in the faith, glorified saints in heaven. Dr. Hammond.

13. — not as the word of men, but as it is in truth, the word of God,] The word which St. Paul preached, though they heard it of him, yet it was not his word, not the word of any man, but it was, in deed and in truth, the word of God Himself; and they effectually worketh also in you that believe.

14 For ye, brethren, became followers of the churches of God which in Judea are in Christ Jesus: for ye also have suffered like things of your own countrymen, even as they have of the Jews:

15 Who both killed the Lord Jesus, and their own prophets, and have ‖ persecuted us; and they please not God, and are contrary to all men:

‖ Or, chased us out.

16 Forbidding us to speak to the Gentiles that they might be saved, to fill up their sins alway: for the wrath is come upon them to the uttermost.

17 But we, brethren, being taken from you for a short time in presence, not in heart, endeavoured the more abundantly to see your face with great desire.

18 Wherefore we would have come unto you, even I Paul, once and again; but Satan hindered us.

19 For what is our hope, or joy, or crown of ‖ rejoicing? Are not even ye in the presence of our Lord Jesus Christ at his coming?

‖ Or, glorying.

CHAP. III.

1 Saint Paul testifieth his great love to the Thessalonians, partly by sending Timothy unto them to strengthen and comfort them: partly by rejoicing in their well doing: 10 and partly by praying for them, and desiring a safe coming unto them.

WHEREFORE when we could no longer forbear, we thought it good to be left at Athens alone;

2 And sent Timotheus, our brother, and minister of God, and our fellowlabourer in the gospel of Christ, to establish you, and to comfort you concerning your faith:

3 That no man should be moved by these afflictions: for yourselves know that we are appointed thereunto.

4 For verily, when we were with you, we told you before that we should suffer tribulation; even as it came to pass, and ye know.

5 For this cause, when I could no longer forbear, I sent to know your faith, lest by some means the tempter have tempted you, and our labour be in vain.

---

received it as spoken to them from God. And so all ought to receive whatsoever was spoken by Moses and the Prophets, or by Christ and His Apostles, and is now written in the books of the Old and New Testaments: for it is all equally the word of God: all Scripture, as the Apostle saith, being "given by inspiration of God," 2 Tim. iii. 16. And therefore whoever spoke or wrote it, it was still God's word they spoke or wrote: and all men are bound to look upon it and receive it with the same respect and reverence, as if God had spoken it to them with His own mouth, or had written it with His own finger, as He did the Ten Commandments. Bp. Beveridge.

—— which effectually worketh also in you that believe.] Being not barely received or heard by you, but also bringing forth in your practice, as other good fruits, so particularly the fruits of Christian patience. Dr. Wells.

15. — and are contrary to all men:] It is well known what invincible prejudices the Jews in general entertained against all other nations; and several passages might be produced from Tacitus and other heathen writers, in which they are represented as bearing an inveterate hatred against all the rest of mankind. And nothing certainly could afford a stronger proof of this malignant temper, than that perverse opposition to so benevolent a scheme as the Gospel, for which the Apostle passes this severe censure upon them. Dr. Doddridge.

16. — to fill up their sins alway:] Filling up the measure of their sins, and so accomplishing the prediction of our Saviour, that to the murder of the Prophets they should add the murder of Him, and of those Prophets and wise men, whom He should send among them, Matt. xxiii. 32—35. Dr. Whitby.

——for the wrath is come] Or is just coming or hastening "upon them," not for a punishment during a short time, as was the Babylonian captivity, but "to the uttermost," or so as to make an utter end both of their religious and of their civil state. Dr. Wells.

17. — being taken from you for a short time &c.] The Apostle means, that when he fled from Thessalonica to Berea he proposed to be absent only a few days, until the rage of the Jews should be abated: after which he intended to return. Accordingly he tells them, he the more earnestly on that account endeavoured to return, and actually made two attempts for that purpose. But the coming of the Jews from Thessalonica, to stir up the people in Berea against him, frustrated his design, and obliged him to leave Macedonia. Dr. Macknight.

18. — but Satan hindered us.] Satan stirred up these envious Jews to raise oppositions against me, and by these means hindered my journey to you. Bp. Hall. Hence we may learn, that they who obstruct the progress of the Gospel, and persecute the promoters of it, are the instruments and ministers of Satan, and therefore fitly bear his name. So chap. iii. 5; 2 Cor. xi. 15; Rev. ii. 10. Burkitt, Dr. Whitby.

Chap. III. The Apostle testifies his great affection for them, in sending Timothy, to know how they did, to comfort them under their persecutions, and confirm their Christian resolution. He then expresses the satisfaction he reaped from the good account which Timothy brought him of their church: and adds his prayers for their final perseverance. Pyle.

Ver. 1. Wherefore when we could no longer forbear,] The Apostle means, that his ardent affection for the Thessalonians put him under such dread and concern at the persecutions they were exposed to from the malicious Jews, that he no sooner left them and arrived at Athens, but he sent Timothy back again to see how they did, and to comfort and support them under their distresses. Pyle.

3. — for yourselves know that we are appointed thereunto.] "For hereunto are we called," 1 Pet. ii. 21. Dr. Whitby. St. Paul here reminds them, of what he says he had often told them before, namely, that Christianity was a state of trials and sufferings. Pyle.

5. — lest — the tempter have tempted you,] The expression "have tempted" here evidently signifies having brought them into sin, that is, wrought upon them, corrupted them by temptations: for otherwise the Apostle's "labour" in preaching the Gospel to them would not "become vain" by those means. So when God is said to "give" men to Christ, John vi. 37, the meaning is, that by God's preventing and preparing grace they do effectually come to Christ, receive and embrace the Gospel. Dr. Hammond. See the note on chap. ii. 18.

Anno DOMINI 54.

6 But now when Timotheus came from you unto us, and brought us good tidings of your faith and charity, and that ye have good remembrance of us always, desiring greatly to see us, as we also to see you:

7 Therefore, brethren, we were comforted over you in all our affliction and distress by your faith:

[a] Rom. 7. 9.

8 For now we [a] live, if ye stand fast in the Lord.

9 For what thanks can we render to God again for you, for all the joy wherewith we joy for your sakes before our God;

10 Night and day praying exceedingly that we might see your face, and might perfect that which is lacking in your faith?

‖ Or, guide.

11 Now God himself and our Father, and our Lord Jesus Christ, ‖ direct our way unto you.

12 And the Lord make you to increase and abound in love one toward another, and toward all men, even as we do toward you:

13 To the end he may stablish your hearts unblameable in holiness before God, even our Father, at the coming of our Lord Jesus Christ with all his saints.

CHAP. IV.

Anno DOMINI 54.

1 He exhorteth them to go on forward in all manner of godliness, 6 to live holily and justly, 9 to love one another, 11 and quietly to follow their own business: 13 and last of all to sorrow moderately for the dead. 17 And unto this last exhortation is annexed a brief description of the resurrection, and second coming of Christ to judgment.

FURTHERMORE then we ‖ beseech you, brethren, and ‖ exhort you by the Lord Jesus, that as ye have received of us how ye ought to walk and to please God, so ye would abound more and more.

‖ Or, request. ‖ Or, beseech.

2 For ye know what commandments we gave you by the Lord Jesus.

3 For this is the will of God, even your sanctification, that ye should abstain from fornication:

4 That every one of you should know how to possess his vessel in sanctification and honour;

5 Not in the lust of concupiscence, even as the Gentiles which know not God:

6 That no man go beyond and ‖ defraud his brother ‖ in any matter: because that the Lord is the avenger of all such, as we also have forewarned you and testified.

‖ Or, oppress, or, overreach. ‖ Or, in the matter.

7 For God hath not called us unto uncleanness, but unto holiness.

8 He therefore that ‖ despiseth despiseth

8. For now we live, &c.] Your constancy to Christianity is the great comfort of my life. Pyle. "To live" in a scriptural sense frequently signifies to be cheerful, to rejoice. Dr. Hammond.

11. — and our Lord Jesus Christ,] The Apostle here invokes our Lord Jesus Christ together with God the Father. This invocation of Him by all Christians in all places, must suppose Him to be omniscient, omnipresent, and the searcher of the heart: and since these are the properties of God alone, it must also suppose Him to be truly God. Burkitt, Dr. Whitby.

13. To the end he may stablish your hearts unblameable &c.] Hence it may be observed, that a general and abounding charity to all men, being that by which we become most like to God, tends to "establish our hearts unblameable before God in holiness," and to procure our acceptance with Him at the great day of our account, Matt. xxv. 35, 36. Dr. Whitby.

Chap. IV. The Apostle warns the Gentile converts of the Thessalonian church against the vices, to which they had been most addicted in their heathenish state; particularly against uncleanness. He then gives them an encouragement to mutual love and charity, and to industry in their callings: and a consolation for the death of their Christian friends, from the assurance of Christ's glorious appearance, and our future resurrection. Pyle.

Ver. 1. — so ye would abound more and more.] Daily making further improvements in piety and virtue. Dean Stanhope.

2. — what commandments we gave you by the Lord Jesus.] Hence we may learn, that the instructions and rules for a holy life, which the Apostles gave to the churches, are to be regarded as the commandments of the Lord and as the will of God; they being dictated by His Spirit, and delivered by His authority. See Luke x. 16. Burkitt, Dr. Whitby.

3. — that ye should abstain from fornication:] That is, all uncleanness contrary to chastity. The language of the Apostle here intimates, that as there are no sins to which human nature is more inclined than the lusts of the flesh, so there are none which a Christian should more guard against, and strive to mortify and subdue, as being contrary to that purity of nature and life, which the Gospel requires, and which the Holy Spirit assists us in attaining. Burkitt.

4. — his vessel] That is, his body: thus the frail mortal bodies of Christian ministers are called "earthen vessels," 2 Cor. iv. 7. Parkhurst. The body was called by the Greeks and Romans "a vessel," because it contains the soul, and is its instrument. The Apostle's meaning may be, Let every man consider his body as a vessel consecrated to the service of God; and let him dread the impiety of polluting it, by any vile dishonourable indulgence whatever, or by putting it to any base use. Dr. Macknight.

5. — even as the Gentiles] Among whom these lusts abounded, and by whom they were allowed. See the notes on Eph. iv. 17, 18. These exhortations were particularly fit to be urged upon the Thessalonians, considering the licentiousness and impurity, which are described as prevailing among them in their heathen state. Dr. Whitby.

6. That no man go beyond and defraud his brother in any matter:] Rather, 'in this matter,' or 'in the matter,' namely, that beforementioned. See the margin. The meaning is, that no man invade another's right, or transgress the stated bounds, in such things especially as the Apostle has been speaking of. The Bishops of our Church in King Henry the Eighth's time, in the book named 'A necessary Doctrine and Erudition for any Christian man,' mentioning this text of Scripture in the discourse of matrimony, thus paraphrased and interpreted it: 'that no man should craftily compass and circumvent his brother to obtain his fleshly lusts.' Drs. Hammond and Whitby, Dean Stanhope.

8. He therefore that despiseth &c.] And let him, who refuses obedience to these commands, know that the contempt lights upon God; whose Holy Spirit, given to His Apostles, is affronted, when their authority is set at nought; and whose Spirit, given to every Christian at his baptism, is grieved, and resisted, and driven not man, but God, who hath also given unto us his holy Spirit.

9 But as touching brotherly love ye need not that I write unto you: for ye yourselves are taught of God to love one another.

10 And indeed ye do it toward all the brethren which are in all Macedonia: but we beseech you, brethren, that ye increase more and more;

11 And that ye study to be quiet, and to do your own business, and to work with your own hands, as we commanded you;

12 That ye may walk honestly toward them that are without, and that ye may have lack ‖ of nothing.

‖ Or, of no man.

13 But I would not have you to be ignorant, brethren, concerning them which are asleep, that ye sorrow not, even as others which have no hope.

Anno DOMINI 54.

14 For if we believe that Jesus died and rose again, even so them also which sleep in Jesus will God bring with him.

15 For this we say unto you by the word of the Lord, that we which are alive and remain unto the coming of the Lord shall not prevent them which are asleep.

16 For the Lord himself shall descend from heaven with a shout, with the voice of the archangel, and with the trump of God: and the dead in Christ shall rise first:

away, when such pollute themselves and profane the dwelling which He came to sanctify.

In the foregoing passage a modest intimation is given in general terms of actions, that cannot with decency be particularly named. For the same reason the interpreters of the Gospel cannot be expected to enlarge on the several ways, by which the sin of uncleanness pollutes. But the less capable this subject is of being conveniently treated in publick, the more exact it becomes persons to be in private, in the examination of their own consciences concerning it: especially since the Apostle hath used such pressing motives in this Scripture by saying, that our sanctification is the commandment of the Lord Jesus, and the will of God; that the contrary affections are the scandal of the Gentiles, "who know not God;" that Christians "are called, not unto uncleanness, but unto holiness;" and that any of those, who behave themselves unsuitably to that call, draw down vengeance upon their own heads, and "despise God and the Holy Spirit He hath given us." The sum of all which passages may be reduced to this, that sins of uncleanness in particular are a high provocation to Almighty God; that they forfeit the privilege, and defeat the ends, and become the greatest scandal and dishonour, of our Christian profession. Dean Stanhope.

9. — are taught of God] By this new commandment that we "love one another," 1 John iii. 11, 23; iv. 21; Matt. xxii. 39. We are taught by God, saith Clement of Alexandria, by having the holy Scriptures, and by the example of Christ who "loved us and hath given Himself for us," Eph. v. 2. Dr. Whitby. The Apostle alludes to Isai. liv. 13, where the Prophet speaks of the effectual instruction which believers should receive under the Gospel dispensation. Dr. Macknight.

11. — and to do your own business,] Not meddling with other men's matters. Drs. Hammond and Whitby.

Let a man, that desires to pass through this world inoffensively, resolve to be very diligent in his particular profession and calling; and if he has none, to make one for himself by some proper and suitable employment. He that is employed has no leisure to move in the little disputes and quarrels, which trouble the peace of the world, and which are chiefly kept up and bandied to and fro by those who have nothing else to do. The Apostle therefore, we may observe, in his exhortation, joins "studying to be quiet" with the "doing of our own business," as if the one was a natural and inseparable attendant upon the other. Bp. Atterbury.

12. — that ye may have lack of nothing.] He doth not say, that ye may abound in riches, purchase great estates, or advance your families; but "that ye may have lack of nothing;" which is enough in all reason; for he who lacks nothing is as rich as he that hath all things: for he hath all things he lacks. But for this purpose we must "study" first "to be quiet," to live peaceably with all men: and then we must study likewise "to do our own business," those things which are proper to ourselves and to our own calling, without meddling with other men's affairs any farther than to do them all the good we can. So that in short, whatsoever trade, calling, office, or employment a man is of, it is his duty to mind it; and to mind it also with care and diligence, that by God's blessing upon it he may be able to maintain himself and his family by it. Bp. Beveridge.

13. — that ye sorrow not, even as others which have no hope.] Namely, of a resurrection. Pyle. All sorrow for the death of friends is not unlawful or forbidden by the Christian religion: which does not destroy our natural affections, but teaches us to moderate them, and keep them under the government of reason and religion. Burkitt.

Amongst the temporal evils, to which we are exposed, is the loss of friends and near relations; that tax, which most of us pay for dwelling here any considerable time. In these trials sorrows will arise, and tears will flow. St. Paul sets this matter in its true light, requiring of us no stoical indifference and unconcern. He gives us leave to be sorrowful; and we could not help being so, whether he gave us leave or not. But he says, "Sorrow not" like the Pagans, like those "which have no hope: for if we believe that Jesus died and rose again, even so them also which sleep in Jesus will God bring with Him:—and so shall we ever be with the Lord. Wherefore comfort one another with these words." Dr. Jortin.

14. — even so &c.] The sentence is elliptical. "For if we believe that Jesus died and rose again, even so" are we to believe that "them also which sleep in Jesus, will God bring with Him" at His coming. Drs. Whitby and Wells.

15. — that we which are alive] That those, which shall be found alive at the second coming of the Lord to judgment. Bp. Hall. It is well observed by the Greek Scholiasts, that the Apostle speaks these words not of himself, but of the Christians that were to remain alive at the day of judgment: for he well knew he was not personally to live till the resurrection; nay, he himself expected a resurrection, see 2 Cor. iv. 14; and he laboured that he might "attain unto the resurrection of the dead," Phil. iii. 11. Dr. Whitby.

In his second Epistle to the Thessalonians, written the same year as this, he cautions them against misunderstanding, as it seems some of them had done, what he said on that head in his first; and mentions things which were to intervene between his own days and the resurrection, and must take up time, 2 Thess. ii. 1, &c. In other epistles too, he speaks of his own dying, first as likely, Phil. i. 20, then as certain to happen soon, 2 Tim. iv. 6. And therefore by "we," in the places misunderstood, he meant only in general, we, or such of us, Christians: not designing to intimate, that he himself should be one of the number. In this sense he frequently uses both "we," and even "I," elsewhere, as many approved authors have done in different nations and ages. Abp. Secker.

—— shall not prevent] That is, anticipate, or be before, those who are dead. Parkhurst.

16. — and the dead in Christ shall rise first:] Namely, before those who are alive shall be changed. Burkitt.

Anno DOMINI 54.

17 Then we which are alive and remain shall be caught up together with them in the clouds, to meet the Lord in the air: and so shall we ever be with the Lord.

‖ Or, exhort.

18 Wherefore ‖ comfort one another with these words.

CHAP. V.

1 He proceedeth in the former description of Christ's coming to judgment, 16 and giveth divers precepts, 23 and so concludeth the epistle.

BUT of the times and the seasons, brethren, ye have no need that I write unto you.

2 For yourselves know perfectly that the day of the Lord so cometh as a thief in the night.

3 For when they shall say, Peace and safety; then sudden destruction cometh upon them, as travail upon a woman with child; and they shall not escape.

4 But ye, brethren, are not in darkness, that that day should overtake you as a thief.

5 Ye are all the children of light, and the children of the day: we are not of the night, nor of darkness.

6 Therefore let us not sleep, as do others; but let us watch and be sober.

7 For they that sleep sleep in the night; and they that be drunken are drunken in the night.

8 But let us, who are of the day, be sober, putting on the breastplate of faith and love; and for an helmet, the hope of salvation.

9 For God hath not appointed us to wrath, but to obtain salvation by our Lord Jesus Christ,

10 Who died for us, that, whether we wake or sleep, we should live together with him.

13 And to esteem them very highly in love for their work's sake. And be at peace among yourselves.

‖ Or, beseech. ‖ Or, disorderly.

14 Now we ‖ exhort you, brethren, warn them that are ‖ unruly, comfort the feeble-minded, support the weak, be patient toward all men.

---

18. Wherefore comfort one another with these words.] That is, draw matter of consolation to yourselves from the foregoing considerations, against the loss of your deceased friends: intimating that the best and choicest comforts for supporting the spirits of men under afflictions in general, and the loss of their relations in particular, are drawn from the holy Scriptures, and especially from the assurances which they give us of a resurrection from the grave, and a state of future immortality to the faithful believers in Christ Jesus. Burkitt.

Chap. V. The Apostle represents it to be needless for Christians to know the fixed time of Christ's judgment; only he observes to them the suddenness and terrour of it to wicked men, and exhorts them to such care and purity of conversation, as will prepare them for it, and render it joyful to them. He then admonishes them to entertain due esteem, and to shew suitable respect to their spiritual governours: and recommends the exercise of unity, charity, patience, and forgiveness; of prayer and thanksgiving; of a just regard to prophetick and spiritual endowments; and of discretion in entertaining, and constancy in upholding the truth. His prayers, salutations, and conclusion. Pyle.

Ver. 1. — of the times and the seasons,] The time of the duration of the world, and the particular season at which Christ will come to judgment. Dr. Macknight.

4. — that day should overtake you as a thief.] As coming upon you unexpected, or when you are unprepared for it. Dr. Whitby. The Apostle means, that although the coming of Christ will be unexpected to the righteous as well as to the wicked, because unforeseen by both, yet it will not overwhelm the righteous with terrour, nor bring destruction on them as it will on the wicked. Dr. Macknight.

5. Ye are all the children of light, &c.] Your profession engages you to such practices, wherein if you live constant, none of these evils can befall you. Dr. Hammond.

—— we are not of the night, &c.] These are characters of the heathens, importing that they were living in ignorance of spiritual things. Dr. Macknight.

7. For they that sleep &c.] As if he had said, As night is the season wherein drunkards usually exercise their debaucheries, and sleep and inactivity possess us all; so a loose and unthoughtful life is the best that can be expected in a state of ignorance, blindness, and prejudice; but in a better and more enlightened condition, we are under an obligation of observing better and wiser courses. Pyle. Drunkenness in the day time was reckoned highly indecent and scandalous even by the heathens themselves. Burkitt, Dr. Macknight.

8. — the breastplate — and helmet,] See the notes on Eph. vi. 14, 17. These were the two principal parts of the ancient armour, as guarding the head and heart, the two chief fountains of life and sensation. Burkitt, Dr. Whitby.

9. For God hath not appointed us to wrath,] Namely, us believers, as He hath unbelievers. Dr. Wells. The design of God in sending His Son was not to condemn, but to save the world: they therefore, who are "appointed to wrath," are such only who wilfully and obstinately refuse to believe and obey the Gospel. Dr. Macknight.

10. — whether we wake or sleep,] That is, whether we be alive or dead at Christ's coming. Dr. Wells. To "wake" in this place signifies, to 'be alive,' as opposed to the sleep of our bodies in death. Compare chap. iv. 15; Rom. xiv. 8, 9. Parkhurst.

12. — to know them which labour among you, &c.] That you take special notice of, and give due regard to, those your spiritual overseers, who labour amongst you in word and doctrine, and have the charge of your souls committed unto them by the Lord, and do admonish you. Bp. Hall. See the notes on Heb. xiii. 17.

14. — warn them that are unruly,] Disorderly, irregular, violating the order prescribed by God. Compare 2 Thess. iii. 6, &c. Parkhurst, Schleusner. The original is a military term, and signifies those who break their ranks, or desert their post, so that they cannot perform their duty as soldiers, especially in battle. It is fitly used to denote those, who neglect the proper duty of their office or station. Dr. Macknight.

27 I ‖ charge you by the Lord that this epistle be read unto all the holy brethren.

‖ Or, adjure.

16. Rejoice evermore.] Rejoice in the Lord always; and let none of the outward crosses of this life rob you of your joy in the Holy Ghost. Bp. Hall. See the note on Phil. iv. 4.

17. Pray without ceasing.] Pray upon all occasions, and at all meet opportunities; and be evermore lifting up your hearts in heavenly ejaculations to God. Bp. Hall.

We are here commanded to "pray without ceasing:" but if any one should adhere to the precept so strictly, as to seclude himself from all company or employment, and waste himself in the fervours of devotion without intermission, till nature, oppressed and wearied, sunk into slumber, we need be but little surprised at the wildness and extravagance of his dreams, or at the strangeness of his opinions, after so fanciful a course of life. The same Apostle, who prescribes to "pray without ceasing," recommends his own example of "labouring night and day," 1 Thess. ii. 9; and a good consistent Christian will endeavour to reconcile both by neglecting neither. Dr. Glocester Ridley.

The proper meaning of this and similar precepts is, that we should never remit that devout frame and disposition of soul, which is always open to receive the Divine influence, and comply with its motions; expecting from our heavenly Father every good thing we want, directing all our actions in obedience to His will, and to His glory, and never wilfully omitting the daily stated opportunities of what is more properly and strictly called "praying." Dr. Glocester Ridley.

18. In every thing give thanks:] Wheresoever our gratitude for God's infinite wisdom, power, goodness, and mercy, is sincere and true, it always manifests itself in our words and actions. In our words, by praising and magnifying those Divine perfections, which we acknowledge in all God's dispensations towards us: and in our actions, for we must do it, 'not only with our lips but in our lives, by giving up ourselves to His service, and walking in holiness and righteousness before Him all the days of our life.' This is giving thanks for every thing indeed, when we serve and glorify God in every thing we do; for this is an open and actual acknowledgment that we have nothing but what we receive from His goodness and mercy, by employing every thing we have to His honour and glory. By this means, as every thing that God doth will afford matter of praise and thankfulness to us, so every thing that we do will be an expression of it to Him: and so we shall fully and effectually perform the great and heavenly duty here enjoined by the Apostle, saying, "In every thing give thanks." Bp. Beveridge.

——for this is the will of God in Christ Jesus concerning you.] It is "God's will," and therefore it is our duty: it is "God's will in Christ Jesus concerning us," and therefore it must needs be our interest too. Bp. Beveridge.

The three general rules, here given for all Christians to observe, are necessarily connected together. As we are to "rejoice in the Lord alway," so in order thereto we must "pray" unto Him "without ceasing," that being the means whereby to keep our minds always fixed upon Him, and so in a right frame and disposition to rejoice always in Him: but for that purpose, as we pray unto Him for what we want, we must likewise give Him thanks for what we have: and therefore he adds, "In every thing give thanks: for this is the will of God in Christ Jesus concerning you." All these duties have one and the same object, though not expressed, yet supposed as certainly known to all Christians, even the most High God. It is in Him we must "rejoice evermore." It is to Him we must "pray without ceasing." It is to Him we must "give thanks for every thing." Bp. Beveridge.

19. Quench not the Spirit.] By resisting His ordinary motions of grace, or by slighting and abusing His extraordinary gifts. Dr. Wells. Do not cool and discourage, and, as much as in you lieth, quench and put out the good graces of God's Spirit, either in yourselves or in others; but cherish and foster them. Bp. Hall.

20. Despise not prophesyings.] Despise not the preaching of the Gospel, upon any pretence soever, whether of the meanness of gifts, or of prejudice against the teachers; but reverence and honour it. Bp. Hall.

21. Prove all things; hold fast that which is good.] By the extensive word "all," the Apostle in this place evidently means no more, than "all things" which may be right or wrong in point of conscience. And by "proving" them he means, not that we should try them both by experience, which would be an absurd and pernicious direction; but that we should examine them by our faculty of judgment, which is a wise and useful exhortation. Accordingly Christianity recommends itself to us at first sight, by this peculiar presumption of its being the true religion, that it makes application to men as reasonable creatures, and claims our assent on account of the proofs which it offers. By these alone it prevailed originally: on these it still relies; and requires faith for the principle of our obedience, only because it produces evidence for the ground of our faith. Such an institution surely is entitled to receive the fair treatment which it gives, when it asks of mankind no more than this; that they should first consider well the several obligations they are under; then adhere to whatever they find to be enjoined them; and lastly, avoid whatever they conceive to be forbidden. Abp. Secker.

23. —your whole spirit and soul and body] All your inward faculties of understanding, will, affections, and all outward members of your bodies. Bp. Hall.

24. —who also will do it.] That is, who, inasmuch as He is faithful, will not be wanting in what is requisite on His part. The promise of God always supposes, as indeed it exacts of us, the exercise of our endeavours. Dr. Whitby, Burkitt.

27. I charge you by the Lord] In the margin, "I adjure you by the Lord." It has been sometimes supposed, that oaths are forbidden by the Christian religion. But besides other reasons to the contrary, it may be here observed, that one of the most eminent of our Saviour's disciples, St. Paul, hath in several of his Epistles made use of one form or another of swearing, on occasions, which he saw were proper: "God is my witness," Rom. i. 9; "I call God for a record upon my soul," 2 Cor. i. 23; "The things which I write unto you, behold, before God, I lie not," Gal. i. 20: and which is yet more, he here writes to the Thessalonians thus, "I adjure you by the Lord," for the marginal translation is the right one, I lay you under the tie of an oath, "that this Epistle be read unto all the holy brethren." It is impossible that he should understand so little, or observe so ill, the rules of that Gospel, which he had learned from Christ Himself by revelation, and received an extraordinary commission of Apostleship to teach, as both to do himself, and oblige others to do, what Christ had forbidden; and even be guilty of it in those very writings, which make part of God's word. Surely his practice, in these circumstances, is an abundantly sufficient commentary on our Saviour's doctrine. Abp. Secker. See Matt. v. 34; James v. 12; and the notes there.

THE SECOND EPISTLE OF PAUL THE APOSTLE

TO THE THESSALONIANS.

INTRODUCTION.

IT is generally believed that the messenger, who carried the former Epistle into Macedonia, upon his return to Corinth, informed St. Paul that the Thessalonians had inferred, from some expressions in it, (1 Thess. iv. 15, 17; v. 6,) that the coming of Christ and the final judgment were near at hand, and would happen in the time of many who were then alive. The principal design of this second Epistle to the Thessalonians was to correct that errour, and prevent the mischief which it would naturally occasion. It was written from Corinth, and probably at the end of the year 52.

St. Paul begins with the same salutation as in the former Epistle, and then expresses his devout acknowledgments to God for the increasing faith and mutual love of the Thessalonians in the midst of persecutions; he represents to them the rewards which will be bestowed upon the faithful, and the punishment which will be inflicted upon the disobedient at the coming of Christ, chap. i: he earnestly entreats them not to suppose, as upon any authority from him, or upon any other ground, that the last day is at hand: he assures them, that before that awful period a great apostasy will take place; and reminds them of some information which he had given them on that subject, when he was at Thessalonica: he exhorts them to steadfastness in their faith, and prays God to comfort their hearts, and establish them in every good word and work, chap. ii.: he desires their prayers for the success of his ministry, and expresses his confidence in their sincerity: he cautions them against associating with idle and disorderly persons, and recommends diligence and quietness. He adds a salutation in his own hand, and concludes with his usual benediction, chap. iii. Bp. Tomline.

CHAP. I.

1 St. Paul certifieth them of the good opinion which he had of their faith, love, and patience: 11 and therewithal useth divers reasons for the comforting of them in persecution, whereof the chiefest is taken from the righteous judgment of God.

PAUL, and Silvanus, and Timotheus, unto the church of the Thessalonians in God our Father and the Lord Jesus Christ:

2 Grace unto you, and peace, from God our Father and the Lord Jesus Christ.

3 We are bound to thank God always for you, brethren, as it is meet, because that your faith groweth exceedingly, and the charity of every one of you all toward each other aboundeth;

Anno DOMINI 54.

4 So that we ourselves glory in you in the churches of God for your patience and faith in all your persecutions and tribulations that ye endure:

5 Which is a manifest token of the righteous judgment of God, that ye may be counted worthy of the kingdom of God, for which ye also suffer:

6 Seeing it is a righteous thing with God to recompense tribulation to them that trouble you;

7 And to you who are troubled rest with us, when the Lord Jesus shall be

Chap. I. The persecutions of the Jewish zealots against this church still continuing and increasing, and the Apostle being, beyond his expectation, detained from paying them the visit he had promised, 1 Thess. ii. 17, 18; iii. 10, 11; he sends this second Epistle to revive and strengthen the encouragements he had given them. He here expresseth his thankfulness to God for their invaluable patience and steady progress in the Christian faith: strengthens their courage and hopes, from the consideration of the happy ends and effects of their present sufferings, the vengeance that would light on their persecutors, and the glorious reward which they themselves would reap at the great day of God's judgment and Christ's solemn appearance, to recompense all true believers, and to vindicate the honour of His holy religion. Pyle.

Ver. 5. Which is a manifest token &c.] "Which" your suffering "is a manifest token" or evidence "of the righteous judgement of God" that is to come, these persecutions and tribulations befalling you now, that by reason of your patience and faithfulness, "ye may be" then "counted worthy of the kingdom of God," which ye not only believe and hope for, but "for which ye also suffer." Dr. Wells.

CHAP. II.

1 He willeth them to continue stedfast in the truth received, 3 sheweth that there shall be a departure from the faith, 9 and a discovery of antichrist, before the day of the Lord come. 15 And thereupon repeateth his former exhortation, and prayeth for them.

NOW we beseech you, brethren, by the coming of our Lord Jesus Christ, and by our gathering together unto him,

2 That ye be not soon shaken in mind, or be troubled, neither by spirit, nor by word, nor by letter as from us, as that the day of Christ is at hand.

3 Let no man deceive you by any means: for that day shall not come, except there come a falling away first, and that man of sin be revealed, the son of perdition;

---

10. When he shall come to be glorified in his saints, &c.] When He shall come in wonderful and inconceivable glory, which He shall not reserve to Himself, but impart to His saints; in whose brightness, and conformity to the glorious body of Christ, His infinite goodness and mercy shall be then admired, even in the glorification of all that believe; amongst whom ye also have your part, forasmuch as ye believed the Gospel which we delivered unto you. Bp. Hall.

12. That the name of our Lord Jesus Christ may be glorified in you,] That His Gospel may be propagated, His church and kingdom upon earth defended and enlarged, His doctrine received, His laws obeyed, His praises celebrated, His servants encouraged, and His supreme authority and dominion owned, admired, and feared by all, that "every tongue may confess that Jesus Christ is Lord to the glory of God the Father." Bp. Beveridge.

Chap. II. The former chapter was occupied in a consolation against trouble; this in a caution against errours, or to rectify the judgment of the Thessalonians concerning the true time of Christ's second coming. An errour had crept in among them, concerning the speedy and immediate coming of Christ to judgment, whilst they were yet alive. To guard them against this errour is the Apostle's object in this chapter. Burkitt.

Ver. 1. Now we beseech you, brethren, by the coming of our Lord &c.] Rather, 'concerning the coming,' or, 'as to the coming.' Pyle. The preposition ought to have been translated 'concerning,' as it signifies in other places of Scripture, and in other authors. The coming of Christ to judgment is the subject of which the Apostle is speaking; and in relation to this subject, he desires them not to be disturbed or affrighted, either by revelation, or by message, or by letter, as from him, as if the day of Christ's coming was at hand. In the former Epistle the Apostle had exhorted the Thessalonians to moderate sorrow for the dead, by the consideration of the resurrection and the general judgment, chap. iv. 13, &c.; v. 1, 2. Some persons having mistaken his meaning, and inferred from some of these expressions, that the end of the world was now approaching, the Apostle sets himself in this place to rectify that erroneous notion, and beseeches the Thessalonians not to be shaken from their steadfastness, nor to be troubled and terrified, as if it were now at hand. It was a point of great importance for the early Christians not to be deceived in this particular; because, if they were taught to believe, that the coming of Christ was at hand, and He nevertheless did not come according to their expectation, they might be staggered in their faith, and finding part of their creed to be false, might be hasty enough to conclude that the whole was so. Bp. Newton.

3. —except there come a falling away first,] The Apostle here assures the Thessalonians, that other memorable events will take place before the coming of the Lord. The day of Christ shall not come, 'except there come the apostasy first.' The apostasy here described, is plainly of a religious nature; a defection from the true religion and worship, "a departing from the faith," 1 Tim. iv. 1; "a departing from the living God," Heb. iii. 12; as the word is used by the Apostle in other places. In the original it is 'the apostasy,' with an article to give it emphasis: the article being added, as Erasmus remarks, signifies that famous and beforepredicted apostasy, which Daniel had described, chap. vii. 25; xi. 36. This apostasy, all the concurrent marks and characters will justify us in charging upon the church of Rome. The true Christian worship is the worship of the one only God, through the only "one Mediator between God and men, the man Christ Jesus:" and from this worship the church of Rome hath notoriously departed, by substituting other mediators; worshipping images; invocating and adoring saints and angels; and offering prayers and praises to the Virgin Mary, as much as or more than to God blessed for ever. This is the grand corruption of the Christian church; this is 'the apostasy,' as it is emphatically called, and deserves to be called; the apostasy, that the Apostle had warned the Thessalonians of before; the apostasy, that had also been foretold by the prophet Daniel. Bp. Newton.

——and that man of sin be revealed, the son of perdition;] The article joined to these appellations is emphatical, importing that the ancient Prophets had spoken of these persons, though under different names; particularly the Prophet Daniel, whose descriptions of the little horn, and the blasphemous king, agree so exactly in meaning with St. Paul's description of the man of sin, and the son of perdition, that there can be little doubt of their being the same person. Dr. Macknight.

Literally, 'the man of sin,' with the like article, and the like emphasis, as in the former clause: and St. Ambrose, that he might express the force of the article, hath rendered it, as Erasmus remarks, "that man," as have also our English translators. The like arrogant and tyrannical power is described in the passages referred to in the last note by Daniel, from whom St. Paul hath not only borrowed his ideas, but hath even adopted some phrases and expressions. 'The man of sin,' may signify either a single man, or a succession of men. The latter, being meant by Daniel, is probably intended here also: and this is agreeable to the phraseology of Scripture. See Dan. vii, viii; Rev. xvii; Heb. ix. 7, 25. As 'the apostasy' points out the idolatry of the church of Rome, so 'the man of sin' is the pope; not meaning this or that pope in particular, but the pope in general, as the chief head and supporter of this apostasy. The apostasy produces him, and he again promotes the apostasy. He is properly 'the man of sin,' not only on account of the scandalous lives of many popes, but by reason of their more scandalous doctrines and principles, dispensing with the most necessary duties, and granting or rather selling pardons and indulgences to the most abominable crimes. Or, if by "sin" be meant idolatry particularly, as frequently in the Old Testament, it is evident how he hath corrupted the worship of God, and perverted it from "spirit and truth," to superstition and idolatry of the grossest kind. He also, like the false apostle Judas, is "the son of perdition," whether actively, as being the cause and occasion of destruction to others; or passively, as being destined and devoted to destruction himself. Bp. Newton.

4. Who opposeth and exalteth himself &c.] This is manifestly an allusion to Daniel. See as above. "Above all," that is, above every one, "that is called God or that is worshipped." He shall oppose, for the Prophets speak of things future as present; he shall oppose and exalt himself not only above inferiour magistrates, who are sometimes called "gods" in holy writ, but even above the greatest emperours, and shall arrogate to himself Divine honours. This has been the character of the pope. "He opposeth:" he has been the great adversary to God and man, excommunicating and anathematizing, persecuting and destroying by crusades and inquisitions, by massacres and horrid executions, those sincere Christians, who preferred the word of God to all the authority of men. "He hath exalted himself above all that is called God, or that is worshipped;" not only above inferiour magistrates, but likewise above bishops and primates, exerting an absolute jurisdiction and uncontrolled supremacy over all; not only above bishops and primates, but likewise above kings and emperours, deposing some, and advancing others, obliging them to prostrate themselves before him, to kiss his toe, to hold his stirrup, to wait bare-footed at his gate, treading even upon the neck, and kicking off the imperial crown with his foot; nor only above kings and emperours, but likewise above Christ and God Himself, "making the word of God of none effect by his traditions," forbidding what God hath commanded, as marriage, communion in both kinds, the use of the Scriptures in the vulgar tongue, and the like; and also commanding or allowing what God hath forbidden, as idolatry, persecution, works of supererogation, and various other instances. Bp. Newton.

—— so that he as God sitteth in the temple of God, &c.] "The temple of God," means the Christian church in the usual style of the Apostles. See 1 Cor. iii. 16, 17; 2 Cor. vi. 16; 1 Tim. iii. 15; Rev. iii. 12. The man of sin's "sitting in the temple of God," that is, in the church of Christ, implies his ruling and presiding there; and "sitting there as God," implies his claiming Divine authority in things spiritual as well as temporal; and "showing himself that he is God," implies his doing it with great pride and pomp, with great parade and ostentation. The pope is in profession a Christian, and a Christian bishop, having a seat or cathedra in the Christian church: and he "sitteth there as God," especially at his inauguration, when he sitteth upon the high altar in St. Peter's church, and maketh the table of the Lord his footstool, and in that position receiveth adoration. At all times he exerciseth Divine authority in the church, "shewing himself that he is God," affecting Divine titles and attributes, as holiness and infallibility, assuming Divine powers and prerogatives in condemning and absolving men, in retaining and forgiving sins, in asserting his decrees to be of the same or greater authority than the word of God, and commanding them to be received under the penalty of the same or greater damnation. He has been styled, and pleased to be styled, 'Our lord god, the pope; another god upon earth; king of kings and lord of lords.' The same is asserted to be the dominion of God and the pope. These and the like blasphemies have been not only allowed, but are even approved, encouraged, rewarded, in the writers of the church of Rome; and they are not only the extravagances of private writers, but are the language even of publick decretals and acts of council. So that the pope is evidently the god upon earth; at least there is no one like him, who "sitteth as god in the temple of God, shewing himself that he is God." Bp. Newton.

6. And now ye know what withholdeth that he might be revealed &c.] The man of sin therefore was not then "revealed." "His time" was not yet come, or the season for his manifestation. "The mystery of iniquity" was indeed "already working;" for there is "a mystery of iniquity," as well as a "mystery of godliness," 1 Tim. iii. 16, the one in direct opposition to the other. The seeds of corruption were sown, but they were not yet grown up to maturity. The leaven was fermenting in some parts, but it was far from having yet infected the whole mass. 'The man of sin' was yet hardly conceived in the womb; it must be some time before he could be brought forth. There was some obstacle that hindered his appearance, and this obstacle would continue to hinder, till it was taken out of the way. What this was, we cannot determine with absolute certainty at so great a distance of time: most probably it was somewhat relating to the higher powers, because the Apostle observes such caution: and if we may rely upon the concurrent testimonies of the Fathers, it was the Roman empire; and therefore the primitive Christians in the publick offices of the church prayed for its peace and welfare, as knowing that when the Roman empire should be dissolved and broken into pieces, the empire of 'the man of sin' would be raised on its ruins. How this revolution was effected we learn from history. As the emperour of Rome, or "he who letteth," was "taken out of the way," the bishop of Rome was advanced in his stead. In the same proportion as the power of the empire decreased, the authority of the church increased, the latter at the expense and ruin of the former: till at length the pope grew up above all, and 'the wicked one' was fully manifested and "revealed," or 'the lawless one,' as he may be called according to the literal rendering of the original, for the pope is declared again and again not to be bound by any law of God or man. Bp. Newton.

8. — whom the Lord shall consume &c.] The Apostle does not mean that 'the man of sin' should be consumed immediately after He was "revealed;" but to comfort the Thessalonians, no sooner does he mention the revelation of "that wicked one," than he foretells also his destruction, even before he describes his other qualifications; which should have been described first in order of time, but that the Apostle hastened to what was first and warmest in his thoughts and wishes. Bp. Newton.

—— shall consume with the spirit of his mouth, and shall destroy with the brightness of his coming:] If these two clauses relate to one and the same event, it is a figure of speech very usual in the sacred as in all Oriental writings. If they relate to two different events, the meaning manifestly is, that the Lord Jesus shall gradually consume him with the free preaching of his Gospel, and shall utterly destroy him at His second coming in the glory of His Father. The former began to take effect at the Reformation, and the latter will be accomplished in God's appointed time. 'The man of sin' is now upon the decline, and he will be totally abolished when Christ shall come to judgment. The kingdom of falshood and sin shall end, and the reign of truth and virtue shall succeed. Great is the truth, and will at last prevail. Bp. Newton.

9. — whose coming is after the working of Satan &c.] The Apostle was eager to foretell the destruction of the man of sin: for this purpose, having broken in upon his subject, he now returns to it again, and describes the other qualifications, by which this wicked one should advance and establish himself in the world. He should rise to credit and authority by the most diabolical methods, should pretend to supernatural powers, and boast of revelations, visions, and miracles, false in themselves, and applied to promote false doctrines: "whose coming is after the working of Satan, with all power, and signs, and lying wonders." He should likewise practise all other wicked arts of deceit; should be guilty of the most impious frauds and impositions upon mankind; but should prevail only among those, who are destitute of a sincere affection for the truth, whereby they might obtain eternal salvation, ver. 10. It does not require any particular proof, for it is too generally known, that the pretensions of the pope and the corruptions of the church of Rome are all supported and authorized by feigned visions and miracles, by frauds and impostures of every kind. Bellarmin reckons the glory of miracles as the eleventh note of the catholick church, but the Apostle assigns lying miracles as a distinguishing mark and character of 'the man of sin.' And certainly they can hardly "receive the love of the truth," but must have "pleasure in unrighteousness," who can believe such fabulous and ridiculous legends, who hold it a mortal sin but to doubt of any article of their religion, who deny the free exercise of private judgment, who take away the free use of the holy Scriptures, and so "shut up the kingdom of heaven against men, neither going in themselves, neither suffering them that are entering to go in." Bp. Newton.

11. And for this cause God shall send them strong delusion,] And for this wilful refusal of God's truth, it shall be just with Him to give them over unto strong delusions. Bp. Hall. "God shall send strong delusion," as He sent a lying spirit into the mouths of Ahab's prophets, 1 Kings xxii. 22, 23, by permitting the evil spirit to go forth for that end; or as He is said to "deceive His people," Jer. iv. 10, because He suffered them to be deceived by false prophets; and as He deceived the false prophets, by giving them up unto a spirit of delusion, Ezek. xiv. 9. This must be the true interpretation of all such passages as these. Dr. Whitby. See the notes on the passages here referred to.

The tyrannical power, described by Daniel in the chapters already quoted, and by St. Paul in this passage, and afterwards by St. John, is both by ancients and moderns generally denominated "Antichrist." The Fathers speak of "Antichrist" and of 'the man of sin' as one and the same person; and give much the same interpretation that hath been here given of the whole passage; only it is not to be supposed, that they, who wrote before the events, could be so very exact in the application of each particular, as those who have the advantage of writing after the events, and of comparing the prophecy and completion together. When the papal doctrines and the papal authority prevailed over all, it was natural to think and expect that the true notion of Antichrist would be stifled, and that the doctors of the church would endeavour to give another turn and interpretation to this passage. But no sooner did the reformation dawn, than this notion, which had been long suppressed, broke out again. As early as the year 1120 a treatise was published, identifying Antichrist, the whore of Babylon, the fourth beast of Daniel in its last state, and that man of sin, the son of perdition. The Waldenses and Albigenses propagated the same opinions in the same century. That the Pope was Antichrist was indeed the general doctrine of the reformers every where. Here in England it was advanced by Wickliff; and was learnedly established by that great and able champion of the reformation, Bishop Jewel, in his Apology and Defence, and more largely in his Exposition upon the two Epistles of St. Paul to the Thessalonians. It contributed not a little to promote the reformation; and wheresoever the one prevailed, the other prevailed also. The prophecy of 'the man of sin' thus interpreted is entirely consistent with itself; it coincides perfectly with Daniel; it is agreeable to the tradition of the primitive church; and it hath been exactly fulfilled in all particulars. Thus is it at once an illustrious proof of Divine revelation, and an excellent antidote to the poison of popery. Bp. Newton.

13. — God hath from the beginning chosen you &c.] See the notes on 1 Thess. i. 4.

15. — hold the traditions] Namely, the doctrines and precepts, which the Apostles and other inspired teachers delivered to the world as revelations from God. No doctrines merit the name of "traditions" in the Scripture sense of the word, but such as were taught by the Apostles of Christ, or by other spiritual men, who received them by immediate revelation from Him. And though the inspired teachers, to whom these doctrines were revealed, communicated them to the world first of all by word of mouth, they cannot now be known to be theirs, but by their holding a place in those writings, which are allowed to be the genuine productions of these inspired teachers. The traditions therefore, on which the church of Rome lays so great a stress, are of no manner of value. Dr. Macknight.

16, 17. Now our Lord Jesus Christ himself, — Comfort your hearts, &c.] That is, I pray the Lord Jesus Christ to do so. In the same manner, speaking of his thorn in the flesh, he says, "I besought the Lord," &c. namely, Christ. St. Paul's usual form of benediction was by invocation of the name of Christ; "Grace be to you, and peace, from God the Father, and from our Lord Jesus Christ." Sometimes the name of Christ stands in the first order, as in the passage before us, and in 2 Cor. xiii. 14, "The grace of the Lord Jesus Christ," &c. Bp. Horne. For "comforting the heart" nothing can do but God: and therefore we ought not to pray to any but God to "comfort our hearts:" our Lord Jesus Christ therefore is God. Leslie.

7. — we behaved not ourselves disorderly] That is, saith Theophylact, we were not idle: for God having ordered man to labour, and fitted him with members for that end, he, that will not do so, deserts the order in which God hath placed him: and so the Apostle expounds himself, ver. 11. Dr. Whitby.

9. — to make ourselves an ensample unto you to follow] Piety, when it is not guided and governed by prudence, may degenerate till at last it becomes wild extravagance. A contempt for this world and for all its concerns may be carried too far; and St. Paul seems to have feared lest some of the first Christians should run into this extreme, and neglect to provide for themselves and their families, through a fanatical notion, that a Christian could have no leisure for such occupations; and lest others, influenced by laziness or by worse motives, should imitate them in this supine negligence. St. Paul therefore, as a pious and prudent teacher, recommended industry to the Christian world, not only by precept, but by example. He himself on more than one account had a claim to maintenance from the publick. Yet he sometimes chose to wave this privilege. "I have used," says he, "none of these things, neither have I written these things that it should be so done unto me; for it were better for me to die, than that any man should make my glorying void." He chose rather to feed himself by his own toil and industry, by labouring night and day, because he would not eat any man's bread for nought. "I have coveted," says he, "no man's silver, or gold, or apparel. Yea, ye yourselves know, that these hands have ministered unto my necessities, and to them that were with me. I have showed you all things, how that so labouring ye ought to support the weak." Such a person might boldly and earnestly press the observance of a duty, which himself had so remarkably fulfilled; and indeed he lays a great stress upon it, and represents it as more important than some usually imagine it to be. If any one should neglect to provide for his own family, we should perhaps call him a careless, an indolent, an imprudent man: but St. Paul says, "If any provide not for his own, and especially for those of his own house, he hath denied the faith, and is worse than an infidel," 1 Tim. v. 8. Dr. Jortin.

10. — if any would not work, neither should he eat.] From this precept of the Gospel we learn, that all men without distinction ought to employ themselves in some business or other which is useful; and that no man is entitled to spend his life in idleness. From the lower classes it is required, that they employ themselves in agriculture, or in the mechanick arts, or in other services necessary to society. And from those who are in higher stations such exercises of the mind are required, as may advance the comfort and happiness of others. This passage of the word of God ought also to be regarded by those mendicants, who go about begging their bread, notwithstanding they are able, and have opportunity, to work for their own maintenance. In the Apostle's judgment such persons have no right to maintenance; and to give them alms is to encourage them in idleness and vice. Dr. Macknight, Burkitt.

The Apostle plainly tells us in this place, who are not objects of charity: 'if any man will not work, neither let him eat;" that is, if a man can work and will not, he ought to starve. Now, no man ought to starve, who ought to be maintained by charity; for such have a right to eat of charity: whence it follows, that such as can labour, but will not, have no right to charity, and consequently have no right to ask it. And therefore begging, for such as are able to labour, is an unlawful calling. It is indeed but a mere specious theft. Bp. Sherlock.

Either by agricultural, mechanical, or commercial pursuits; either by professional engagements in letters, arts, or arms; either by juridical discussions, or senatorial deliberations; we are all required, each in his proper line, to be zealous for our own credit and character, for our families, for our friends, our connexions, our country. Zeal, exerted in behalf of all these concerns, is part of religion: for true religion extends its influence through every department, and regulates every action, both of private and publick life. He that on all occasions hath the glory of God immediately in his view, is indeed the more pious man: but every one, who discharges his duty with active diligence and honest fidelity, is doing the will of God, and is so far religious. And as in other respects, so in this also, St. Paul sets us an example, labouring as he did with his own hands by night and by day. To the same purpose strongly does he admonish us, when he gives it in charge, that "if any will not work, neither should he eat." For although this precept in its literal sense cannot be applicable to persons in all circumstances, yet in its wider meaning it is so far of obligation, as that it enforces on all men the propriety of attention to the peculiar offices, which according to their respective functions and ranks they owe to society. Taken in this more enlarged acceptation, the precept is universally binding. For the relation in which each of us is placed towards those around him, and the various talents with which we are endowed for the executing of works, different indeed in themselves, but all tending ultimately

TO

INTRODUCTION.

TIMOTHY was a native of Lystra in Lycaonia: his father was a Gentile; but his mother, whose name was Eunice, was a Jewess, Acts xvi. 1, and educated her son with great care in her own religion, 2 Tim. iii. 15. In the beginning of this Epistle, St. Paul calls Timothy his "own son in the faith," chap. i. 2: from which expression it is inferred, that St. Paul was the person who converted him to the belief of the Gospel; and as, upon the Apostle's second arrival at Lystra, Timothy is mentioned as being then a disciple, and as having distinguished himself among the Christians of that neighbourhood, his conversion, as well as that of Eunice his mother, and Lois his grandmother, must have taken place when St. Paul first preached at Lystra in the year 46. Upon St. Paul's leaving Lystra, in the course of his second Apostolical journey, he was induced to take Timothy with him, on account of his excellent character, and the zeal which, young as he was, he had already shewn in the cause of Christianity; but before they set out, the Apostle caused him to be circumcised, not as a thing necessary to his salvation, but to avoid giving offence to the Jews, as he was a Jew by his mother's side, and circumcision under such circumstances was agreeable to the Jewish principles. Timothy was regularly appointed to the ministerial office by laying on of hands, not only by St. Paul himself, 2 Tim. i. 6, but also by the presbytery, 1 Tim. iv. 14. From this time Timothy constantly acted as a minister of the Gospel: he generally attended St. Paul, but was sometimes employed by him in other places: he was very diligent and useful; and is always mentioned with great esteem and affection by the Apostle, who joins his name with his own in the inscription of six of his Epistles; namely, the second to the Corinthians, Philippians, Colossians, first and second to the Thessalonians, and Philemon. He was bishop of Ephesus: and it has been said, that he suffered martyrdom in that city, some years after the death of St. Paul.

Concerning the date of this Epistle the learned are by no means agreed. It was most probably written soon after St. Paul's first imprisonment at Rome, and therefore after the period at which the Acts of the Apostles end, somewhere about the year 64.

The principal design of it was to give instructions to Timothy concerning the management of the church of Ephesus: and it was probably intended to be read publickly to the Ephesians, that they might know on what authority Timothy acted. After saluting him in an affectionate manner, and reminding him of the reason, for which he was left at Ephesus, the Apostle takes occasion from the frivolous disputes, which some Judaizing teachers had introduced among the Ephesians, to assert the practical nature of the Gospel, and to shew its superiority over the law: he returns thanks to God for his own appointment to the Apostleship, and recommends to Timothy fidelity in the discharge of his sacred office, chap. i.: he exhorts that prayers should be made for all men, and especially for magistrates; he gives directions for the conduct of women, and forbids their teaching in publick, chap. ii.: he describes the qualifications necessary for bishops and deacons, and speaks of the mysterious nature of the Gospel dispensation, chap. iii.: he foretells that there will be apostates from the truth, and false teachers in the latter times, and recommends to Timothy purity of manners and improvement of his spiritual gifts, chap. iv.: he gives him particular directions for his behaviour towards persons in different situations of life, and instructs him in several points of Christian discipline, chap. v.: he cautions him against false teachers, gives him several precepts, and solemnly charges him to be faithful to his trust, chap. vi. Bp. Tomline.

Before our Lord left His Apostles, He told them, that "as His Father had sent Him, even so sent He them," John xx. 21: which seems to import, that as He was sent into the world with this, among other powers, that He might send others in His name; so likewise He empowered them to do the same: and when they went planting churches, as they took some to be companions of labours with themselves, so they appointed others over the particular churches in which they fixed them: such were Epaphras or Epaphroditus at Colosse, Timothy at Ephesus, and Titus at Crete. To them the Apostles gave authority: otherwise it was a needless thing to write so many directions to them, in order to their conduct. They had the deposit of the faith, with which they were chiefly entrusted, 2 Tim. i. 13. Concerning the succession, in which that was to be continued, we have these words of St. Paul, "The things that thou hast heard of me among many witnesses, the same commit thou to faithful men, who shall be able to teach others also," 2 Tim. ii. 2. To them directions are given, concerning all the different parts of their worship, "supplications, prayers, intercessions, and giving of thanks," 1 Tim. ii. 1; and also the keeping up of the decency of worship, and the not suffering of women to teach, chap. ii. 12, like the women priests among the heathens, who were believed to be filled with a Bacchick fury. To them are directed all the qualifications of such as might be made either "bishops" or "deacons," chap. iii.; they were to examine them according to these, and either to receive or reject them. All this was directed to Timothy, that he might know how he ought to "behave himself in the house of God," chap. iii. 15. He had authority given him to "rebuke" and "entreat," to "honour" and to "censure." He was to order what widows might be received into the "number," and who should be refused. He was to "receive accusations against elders," or presbyters, according to directed methods; and was either to censure some, or to lay hands on others, as should agree with the rules that were set him, chap. v. 1, 3, 17, 19, 22. And in conclusion he is very solemnly charged to "keep that which was committed to his trust," chap. vi. 20. He is required "rightly to divide the word of truth;" to "preach the word;" to "be instant in season and out of season;" to "reprove, rebuke, and exhort;" and to "do the work of an Evangelist," and to "make full proof of his ministry," 2 Tim. ii. 15; iv. 2, 5. Some of the same things are charged upon Titus, whom St. Paul had left in Crete, to "set in order the things that are wanting, and ordain elders in every city," Tit. i. 5, 9, 13. Several of the characters by which he was to try them are also set down. He is charged to "rebuke gainsayers sharply," and to "speak the things that became sound doctrine." He is instructed concerning the doctrines, which he was to "teach," and those which he was to "avoid;" and also how to censure an heretick: he was to "admonish him twice," and, if that did not prevail, he was to "reject him," by some, publick censure, chap. iii. 10. These rules, given to Timothy and Titus, plainly import, that there was to be an authority in the church, and that no man was to assume this authority to himself: according to that maxim, which seems to be founded on the light of nature, as well as it is set down in Scripture, for a standing rule agreed to in all times and places, "No man taketh this honour unto himself, but he that is called of God, as was Aaron," Heb. v. 4. Bp. Burnet.

That Timothy was a bishop, and bishop of Ephesus, the metropolis or chief city of Asia, is fully attested by all antiquity; there are besides very plain evidences of the episcopal power and authority, wherewith he was invested, in this very Epistle of St. Paul written to him. Such is that in the first chapter, ver. 3, "As I besought thee to abide still at Ephesus,—that thou mightest charge some that they teach no other doctrine." He had therefore a power invested in him of calling to account the presbyters and teachers within the diocese of Ephesus, concerning their preaching and doctrine, which is certainly a branch of episcopal power. We read also in the same Epistle, that he was appointed as a judge of the presbyters of Ephesus, to hear and determine those cases that concerned them, chap. v. 19. He had also the power of ordination, which being added to the former makes up the complete episcopal power and authority: this may be plainly gathered from the caution given him by St. Paul to use that power aright; "Lay hands suddenly on no man," &c. chap. v. 22. Bp. Bull.

Chap. I. In this chapter the Apostle, 1st, orders Timothy to hinder certain Jewish doctors from corrupting the doctrine of Christ, by subtile, profane, and extravagant notions, and introducing disputes into the church. And because these doctors shewed great zeal for the law, he informs him, 2dly, what is the true use of the law. 3dly, This gives him occasion to speak of the goodness of God in calling him to the office of an Apostle, and, generally, of the mercy of God towards sinners. In the last place he exhorts Timothy to discharge the duties of his function with courage, and to oppose false teachers. Ostervald.

Ver. 1. — by the commandment] Or 'according to the appointment of God our Saviour,' who called me to this office "by His grace," Gal. i. 15. —— which is our hope;] Even He, on whom all our trust, and expectation, and hope of good is founded and built. Dr. Hammond.

2. Unto Timothy, my own son in the faith:] That is, whom I first converted and so begat to Christianity. Dr. Hammond, Pyle. This phrase, compared with 1 Cor. iv. 14, 15, seems plainly to import that Timothy was converted to the Christian faith by St. Paul, as also he seems to intimate when he saith, "He served with him in the Gospel, as a son with the father," Phil. ii. 22; and again calls him "his dearly beloved son," 2 Tim. i. 2. There appears nothing in the Scripture to the contrary of this opinion. Dr. Whitby.

3. — no other doctrine,] Than what is agreeable to the truth of the Gospel. Dr. Wells. That sound doctrine, which in all churches was delivered by us. Dr. Hammond.

4. Neither give heed to fables and endless genealogies, &c.] To idle Jewish fables; nor to those infinite pedigrees and genealogies which they stand upon, in drawing down the line of their descent from Abraham or from David, in a pretence of claiming kindred with Christ according to the flesh; which breed many frivolous questions and contentions, rather than tend to the edification of the church in the faith of Christ, which should be the end and drift of all our labours. Bp. Hall.

The "fables" here mentioned are called "Jewish fables," Tit. i. 14; because they were invented by the Jewish doctors, to recommend the institutions of Moses. Dr. Macknight.

The "genealogies" were tables of lineal descent, by which the Jews endeavoured to prove their right as priests and Levites, or their alliance to the house of David; all which were apparently vain in the circumstances in which the Jews then were, and in those to which every Christian knew they must quickly be reduced. Dr. Doddridge.

5. Now the end of the commandment is charity &c.] For that which the commandment of God, both in the law and in the Gospel, aims at, is charity; even that Christian charity, which floweth from a sincere heart and a good conscience and an unfeigned faith in that Christ, who hath loved us and shed abroad His love in our hearts. Bp. Hall.

6. — vain jangling;] Vain discourses of Talmudical fables and endless genealogies. Dr. Whitby.

7. Desiring to be teachers of the law; &c.] They set up for doctors and expounders of the Jewish law; but understand little of the true scope and ultimate design of the law, for which they are so zealous; nor have any certainty of the traditions, of which they talk so confidently. Pyle, Dr. Whitby.

8. But we know that the law is good, &c.] Lest any should imagine, from the foregoing reflection on the teachers of the law, that the Apostle undervalued the law itself, he here declares, that the law, rightly understood and preached, was very good, and served to excellent purposes, when used not in opposition, but in subserviency, to the Gospel. Burkitt.

—— if a man use it lawfully;] Or according to the proper scope of it; namely, not as a means of justification, but as a restraint from sin, Gal. iii. 19; and as a schoolmaster, to bring him to Christ, the end of the law, Gal. iii. 24; Rom. x. 4. Dr. Whitby.

9. Knowing this,] The word "knowing" is to be referred to "a man" in the preceding verse.

—— that the law is not made for a righteous man,] That is, for the coercion, restraint, punishment of the righteous and upright in their conversation; but of lawless and disobedient men, of godless and lewd persons, &c. Bp. Hall. The moral law of Moses does in no instance condemn a good Christian. Pyle.

From the following enumeration of offenders against the law, it appears that the Apostle is here speaking chiefly of the moral law contained in the Ten Commandments; for the sins here mentioned have respect to them. Dr. Whitby.

10. — to sound doctrine;] Or 'wholesome doctrine.' Dr. Wells.

11. According to the glorious gospel of the blessed God,] St. Paul calls the Gospel "glorious," because the glorious attributes and excellencies of God are more resplendent in the Gospel, than in the law, of God: as also because the Gospel brings more honour and glory to God than all the works of creation. Burkitt.

12. And I thank Christ Jesus our Lord,] We should here observe what humble and hearty returns St. Paul makes to Christ, for the high honour conferred upon him, in calling him to dispense this glorious Gospel, in calling him to it, in enabling him for it, and rendering him faithful and successful in it. Burkitt.

—— who hath enabled me,] By the assistance of the Spirit of power and wisdom; me, who of myself was insufficient for this work, 2 Cor. iii. 5, 6. Dr. Whitby.

—— for that he counted me faithful,] That is, one that would be faithful in the discharge of his duty, 1 Cor. iv. 2; vii. 25: namely, such an one, as by the consideration of so great a mercy and abundant grace, vouchsafed to one so unworthy, would patiently suffer for the Gospel, Acts. ix. 16; and labour more abundantly in the propagation of it, when thus assisted by the grace and Spirit of Christ, 1 Cor. xv. 10. Whence it is observed by St. Chrysostom and other Fathers here, that there was not only something of God, but also something of himself, for which he was chosen to this ministry; and that he so magnifies the grace of God, as not to invalidate man's free will. Dr. Whitby.

13. Who was before a blasphemer, and a persecutor, and injurious:] Blaspheming the name of Christ, persecuting the Christians, and using them most despitefully. Dr. Hammond. St. Paul had the greater reason to acknowledge the guilt of blasphemy, as he had not only himself spoken evil of Christ, but encouraged and even compelled others to do so, Acts xxvi. 11. Dr. Doddridge.

—— because I did it ignorantly in unbelief.] My unbelief proceeding from ignorance or a want of the right understanding of the Scriptures; and this my ignorance being not absolutely wilful, but owing in a good measure, if not chiefly, to the unhappy prejudices of my education, and so not excluding me from all mercy, though making me stand in need of more than ordinary mercy. Dr. Wells. St. Paul might have been an unbeliever by reason of those many prejudices, which the learned Jews and zealous asserters of their traditions laboured under. For to this St. Peter ascribes their crucifixion of our Lord, saying, "I wot that through ignorance ye did it," Acts iii. 17: and St. Paul says they did it, "not knowing Him," Acts xiii. 27; 1 Cor. ii. 8: and Christ Himself prays thus, "Father, forgive them, for they know not what they do," Luke xxiii. 34, giving the same reason of His prayer for their forgiveness, as St. Paul here doth of his own actual forgiveness. Dr. Whitby.

In the instance of St. Paul we see how much guilt a man, who does not take care to inform himself, may contract through ignorance, without going against his conscience. At the time St. Paul was doing things, which, after he became an Apostle, made him call himself the chief of sinners, he was "touching the law blameless," and thought that in persecuting the Christians he was doing God service. Dr. Macknight.

14. — with faith and love which is in Christ Jesus.] It is observable that St. Paul after his conversion glorifies God by excelling in the graces opposite to his former sins. He abounds in "faith," in opposition to his former unbelief; and in "love," in opposition to his former rage and cruelty. Burkitt.

15. This is a faithful saying, and worthy of all acceptation,] That is, a saying most worthy to be believed, and even to be embraced by all men with the firmest assent. Dr. Wells.

—— sinners; of whom I am chief.] He does not say, 'I was,' but "I am;" because, even when sin is pardoned, we ought to have the prospect of it still before our eyes, to keep us humble and sensible of the great grace of God towards us. Dr. Whitby.

16. — for a pattern to them which should hereafter believe on him &c.] The Apostle means, that as great a blasphemer and persecutor as he had been, he was received to mercy for a pattern and example to all such sinners, as should afterwards forsake their evil ways, and give themselves up sincerely to the obedience of the Gospel. Such a conspicuous example of Christ's clemency and grace towards so great a sinner, whom He not only pardoned, but preferred to the dignity of an Apostle, and sent forth to preach the Gospel to the Gentiles, would be a strong motive with the Gentiles to receive the Gospel with faith and obedience. There could be no reason to despair of mercy, when they saw such "a pattern," such an illustrious instance of it before their eyes. Burkitt.

17. Now unto the King eternal, &c.] St. Paul, being carried away with a delightful sense of God's great mercy towards him, concludes this digression with a fervent effusion of gratitude to God. Burkitt.

18. This charge I commit unto thee, son Timothy,] Namely, the charge of keeping the doctrine committed to him by St. Paul, as a faithful minister and soldier of Jesus Christ, against all opposition. Burkitt.

—— according to the prophecies which went before on thee,] That is, agreeable to the revelations which were made of thee, that, though young, thou shouldest be ordained a bishop in the church, chap. iv. 14. That the Apostles received frequent revelations, and never more distinctly and frequently than in this matter of designing bishops and governours of the church, may appear from many places. Thus concerning St. Paul and St. Barnabas the text is distinct, Acts xiii. 2; and so here of Timothy. And thus it is generally said of the bishops of Asia, that the Holy Ghost had set them over the flock, Acts xx. 28. The language of the early Fathers of the church corresponds with this statement. At the first preaching of the Gospel such revelations were necessary; because it was not possible for the Apostles, during the short stay which they made in a city, to discern by human means who of their new converts would be fit to be appointed governour of the others. But afterwards, when churches were settled, and men had continued in the faith so long as to give testimony of their sincerity and abilities to qualify them for that office, there was not that need of revelation, human means being in some measure sufficient to direct the choice. And accordingly by the qualifications, which St. Paul mentions to Timothy and Titus in their ordination of bishops in every church, it is evident that they appointed men upon observation and experience of their behaviour and abilities, and upon the testimonials of their brethren. Dr. Hammond.

—— that thou by them] That is, being excited and encouraged by them. Dr. Whitby.

—— mightest war a good warfare;] That is, perform the office of an evangelist well, 2 Tim. iv. 5; so as to be a good minister of Jesus Christ, 1 Tim. iv. 6. In the Old Testament the service of the Levite is described in this figurative language; see Numb. iv. 3, 23, 30, 35, 39, 43; viii. 24, 25. And thus, in the New Testament, the Christian minister is a soldier of Jesus Christ, 2 Tim. ii. 3; a warriour, ver. 4; he hath the weapons of his warfare, 2 Cor. x. 4; and ought to have his wages, because "no man goeth a warfare at his own charges," 1 Cor. ix. 7. Dr. Whitby.

19. — which some having put away concerning faith have made shipwreck:] "Which," namely a good conscience. Dr. Whitby. Falling into impure lives, they have afterwards fallen into foul errours in point of faith. Dr. Hammond. The Apostle exhorts his beloved convert, on the one hand to study and adhere firmly to the Christian faith, and on the other to adorn and confirm that faith by a conscientious practice: considering how much an inconsistent and impure life will endanger and corrupt the best principles. Pyle.

20. — Hymeneus and Alexander;] Probably this Alexander is the person mentioned Acts xix. 33; who might become worse and worse after St. Paul's departure from Ephesus, being emboldened by his absence; so that the Apostle might now determine to "deliver him up to Satan," to inflict upon him certain pains and evils, which might possibly reclaim him. Dr. Doddridge.

—— that they may learn not to blaspheme.] That they may be thereby drawn to repent of their heresy and blasphemy against God. Bp. Hall. It is to be remarked, that Hymeneus and Alexander "made shipwreck of the faith," not by renouncing Christianity, for "what have I to do," saith the Apostle, "to judge them that are without?" 1 Cor. v. 12; but by maintaining such doctrines as overthrew the faith; that is, by denying the resurrection of the body, as Hymeneus did, 2 Tim. ii. 18. Dr. Whitby.

Chap. II. The Apostle directs that prayer should be made in the church for all men, and particularly for kings and magistrates, though at that time they were heathens: and he founds this direction upon the will of God, who would have all men to be saved, for which purpose He sent His Son into the world, and caused the Gospel to be preached. Secondly, he says, that men ought to pray in a spirit of peace and purity; and that women should be present at the assemblies of the church in modest apparel, and continue in respect and silence. Ostervald.

Ver. 1. I exhort therefore, &c.] The Apostle proceeds to the particular directions which he had to give Timothy, for the due discharge of his office. Pyle. As if he had said, In the first place therefore I advise, that you have constant publick offices of devotion; consisting, first, of "supplications" for the averting of all hurtful things, sins, and dangers; secondly, of "prayers" for the obtaining of all good things which you want; thirdly, of "intercessions" for others; and, fourthly, of "thanksgivings" for mercies already received. Of these four sorts of devotion it is affirmed by St. Chrysostom, that they were all in his time used in the church: and so it appears by the liturgies. The word "supplications" refers to such petitions as those in the Litany, for deliverance from all the evils there named: the second, to the prayers for mercy and other wants: the third, to such as that wherein we pray "for the whole state of Christ's church," for kings, &c.: and the fourth, to the solemn "general thanksgiving" for all men, and to the hymns sung to the praise of God. Dr. Hammond.

The charge of the Apostle to Timothy, bishop of the church of Ephesus, requires him to take care, that prayers, such as are here enumerated, should be made in all churches and congregations under his inspection and jurisdiction. And how could he do this, but by providing by his authority, that there should be set forms of prayer, framed according to this rule given him by the Apostle, to be used in those churches? Undoubtedly the primitive catholick church understood this to be the meaning of the Apostle. Hence in all the churches of Christ over the world, however distant from each other, we find set forms of publick prayers, suited and conformable to this direction of the Apostle. And indeed, if we consult all the ancient liturgies extant at this day, we shall find that they were all framed and composed according to this rule. Bp. Bull.

It is very proper for private devotions to consist of the same parts: but since that did not fall so immediately under Timothy's care or cognizance, publick devotion is here primarily to be understood. Dr. Wells.

—— first of all,] That is, first, in priority not of time, but of dignity; in the same sense as our Saviour in the Gospel bids us seek "first the kingdom of God and His righteousness," Matt. vi. 33. Prayer is the principal and most noble part of God's worship, and to be preferred before preaching: nay indeed, to speak strictly and properly, preaching is no part of Divine worship; for every proper act of Divine worship must have God for its immediate object, and God's glory for its immediate end. But the immediate object of preaching are men, to whom it is directed, and the immediate end of it is the instruction of men: though it is true that, in the ultimate end of it, it tends to and terminates in the glory of God, as indeed all religious actions do, and all our other actions of moment should do. But prayer is immediately directed to God Himself, and it is an immediate glorification of Him, and a paying of Divine worship and honour to Him. In a word, by preaching we are taught how to worship God: but prayer is itself God's worship. Hence the place of God's worship is called by our Saviour, "the house of prayer," Matt. xxi. 13. It is not called a preaching house, though there must be preaching there too at due times and seasons; but a "house of prayer," because prayer is the principal worship of God, to which all religious houses are dedicated, and it is the constant and daily business to be performed in them. No wonder therefore that the Apostle charges Timothy to take a special care concerning the liturgy and publick prayers of the church, that they be duly and rightly performed: "I exhort therefore, that, first of all, supplications, prayers, intercessions, and giving of thanks, be made." Bp. Bull.

——for all men;] From the Gospel history it appears to have been commonly thought by the Jews, that the prayers of pious persons might procure blessings from God upon those for whom they were made. This opinion was entertained by those who brought their children to Christ; and He confirmed them in that opinion by complying so readily with their request. In the New Testament, Christians are several times exhorted to pray for each other; and mention is made of the usefulness and efficacy of such prayers. St. Paul frequently prays for the brethren, to whom he addresses his Epistles; and desires that they also would pray for him: and this practice is well adapted to kindle and cherish that mutual love and charity, which is the distinguishing character of Christianity. In the Old Testament we find Patriarchs, and Prophets, and holy men, offering up prayers for their children, for their friends, for their country; and what regard God shewed to their requests, appears in many places of Scripture, and in the examples of Abraham, of Moses, of Job, and of other persons eminent for their piety. In Ezekiel, God, to testify how greatly He was offended at His people, and how firmly resolved to punish them, declares that even though Noah, Daniel, and Job, lived amongst them, they should not be able by their intercession to save any besides themselves. So in Jeremiah it is said upon a like occasion, that, though even Moses and Samuel stood before God, to make supplication for the people, it should not avail; and the Prophet is forbidden to pray for them. Thus the greatness of their sin, and of the Divine displeasure, is described in a manner, which at the same time shews how ready God is to hear the intercession of the good, and for their sakes to shew favour even to those who deserve it not. Under the Mosaick dispensation, though present rewards were promised to obedience, yet the best men were not always distinguished from others by prosperity, nor had they constantly those temporal advantages which command the respect of the world. But, that virtue might be reverenced, God, by frequently granting the requests which good men offered up to Him for others, raised them to a much higher dignity than power and wealth could ever gain. This therefore is one of the considerable rewards of piety, that the righteous are represented in the Scriptures, not only as the servants, but as the friends of God; as able to procure blessings, not only for themselves, but for others also: and in this appears what God says to Eli, "Them that honour Me I will honour." Dr. Jortin.

2. For kings, and for all that are in authority;] Because, as temporal governours and magistrates, whether they be of the true religion or not, they are still the ministers of God for the good of the communities they govern. Pyle.

So the Jews prayed and offered sacrifices for the Persian kings, and the welfare of their government, Ezra vi. 10. Thus Jeremiah directed them to do in their captivity, Jer. xxix. 7: and the Jews in Babylon sent to those in Judea to pray for the life of the king of Babylon, Bar. i. 11. They acted in the same manner under the kings of Egypt and Syria; and lastly, when they came under the Roman government, this was their constant practice, till they commenced that rebellion, under which their city, country, religion, and nation were destroyed. And that the Christians, following their example, thus prayed continually for their kings, we learn from the earliest Christian writers, and from all the ancient liturgies. Dr. Whitby.

The princes, of whom the Apostle speaks, were infidels; and such they were, by the permission of God, to continue for three hundred years after the coming of our Saviour. The kings of the earth were not during this period to promote the belief of the Gospel any otherwise than by opposing it. When the rest of the world had come in, and owned our Saviour, then, and not till then, were the rulers of it to submit their sceptres to the sceptre of Christ. If then the tribute of "supplications and thanksgivings" were due in behalf of those heathen princes, is it not much more due in behalf of those who are Christians; who are ingrafted, as principal members, into that mystical body, of which Christ Jesus is the head; who, under Him, are the chief governours of His church here below, and guardians of all her sacred rights and privileges? They beseech and they praise God together with us in the same common assemblies; and we are therefore doubly obliged to beseech and to praise God for them. Bp. Atterbury.

3. For this is good and acceptable &c.] The argument of the Apostle is, that God under the Gospel approves of our praying for all men, and requires it at our hands, in proportion to the example which He hath given us in Himself, who earnestly desires the good of all mankind, and useth powerful means to bring them to reform their former wicked courses, and now to entertain the Gospel. Dr. Hammond.

4. Who will have all men to be saved, &c.] As appears by His publishing to all mankind, all nations and languages, the means of salvation; and by commanding His stewards and ministers to endeavour the conversion of all, and to pray for them amongst themselves. Bp. Fell.

5. For there is one God,] Who is the God of the Gentiles as well as of the Jews, Rom. iii. 29, 30; the Creator, Eph. iii. 9; the Father, Matt. vi. 9; the Lord, Acts xvii. 24; the Saviour of all men, chap. iv. 10. Dr. Whitby. The Apostle's argument runs thus, We ought to pray for all, because there is one God who is good to all; and one Mediator between God and mankind, who took upon Him the common nature of all men, and gave Himself a satisfactory and sufficient ransom for all, which was in due time testified and borne witness to by us His Apostles. We may learn hence, that the only way of friendly intercourse between God and man, is through a Mediator: that there is no other mediator but Jesus Christ, who is called "the man," not to exclude His Divine nature, but to declare emphatically that nature, in which He gave Himself a ransom for us; and that, since this one Mediator gave Himself a ransom for all, whoever perishes under the Gospel, perishes, not because no ransom was paid for him, but because he rejects and refuses the offer of salvation. Burkitt.

——one mediator between God and men,] Among the various species of idolatry one is, when God is worshipped in a way which He hath forbidden, and through false mediators. God commanded the Jews, not only to worship Him alone, but to pay Him publick worship after a certain prescribed manner, and in certain times and places: and they, who neglected and violated these rites and ceremonies, were looked upon as departers from God, and ranked along with idolaters. God also appointed a sort of mediator between Himself and the people. Moses performed this office, and then Aaron, and the high priests in succession. The people were not permitted to burn incense, to offer sacrifices, to bless the congregation, or to invade any part of the priesthood: and faults of this kind were severely and sometimes miraculously punished. These were types and figures and forerunners of that one great High Priest and Mediator, who was to be revealed; "who, when He had by Himself purged our sins, sat down on the right hand of the Majesty on high," where "He ever liveth to make intercession for us." There is to us Christians "one God, and one Mediator between God and men, the man Christ Jesus." Hence it follows, that the worship, which so many Christians pay to angels, to saints, to images, to bones and relicks, and to the blessed Virgin, whom they style our Lady, and the Mother of God, and the Queen of heaven, is really a false worship hardly distinguishable from idolatry. When it is said by way of excuse, that they worship these only as mediators, that alters the case very little; since to apply to a false mediator is as much a departure from Jesus Christ our only Advocate, as to worship a fictitious deity is withdrawing our faith and allegiance from the true God. St. Paul saith expressly, "Let no man beguile you of your reward in a voluntary humility and worshipping of angels, intruding into those things which he hath not seen, vainly puffed up by his fleshly mind, and not holding the Head," which is Christ. Thus he forewarned Christians: but the worshipping of angels and saints, as mediators, crept into the church about four hundred years afterwards; and hath continued ever since, in defiance of his admonitions, and against the whole tenour of the sacred writings. Dr. Jortin.

——the man Christ Jesus;] Not a mere man: for if He be only a man, He is at the same infinite distance from God as other men are: how then can He mediate with God? And if He be only man, He is one of those who stand in need to be mediated for Himself; how then can He mediate for men? And besides, how can He be a mediator, who is infinitely below one of the parties, and not at all above the other? How can such an one ever bring them together? But the Apostle doth not say, that He is only a man; he only saith, He is "the man Christ Jesus:" having in many other places declared in the name of God, that this Christ Jesus is the Son of God, of the same form and substance with the Father, and so truly God Himself. See Rom. ix. 5; Phil. ii. 5, 6: also John x. 30. There are many such expressions all over the Bible, which clearly and undeniably demonstrate, that Jesus Christ is the eternal Son of God, the only-begotten of the Father, and subsisting in the Divine nature; so that He Himself also is very God, the same in all His essential properties or perfections with the Father: and therefore when He is here called "the man Christ Jesus," it cannot be so understood as if He were not God; for that would be a plain contradiction to the rest of the Scriptures, and to this very place too, where He is said to be the "Mediator between God and men," which none can be unless he be God Himself. Bp. Beveridge.

6. Who gave himself a ransom for all,] Compare Matt. xx. 28. That is, He gave His life instead of ours, to expiate and atone for those lives, which we by sin had forfeited. Dr. Whitby. That there was a price paid for our redemption, the Scriptures are clear. "Ye are bought with a price," saith St. Paul, 1 Cor vi.; and he saith it over again in the 7th chapter. He that paid it calleth it "a ransom," Matt. xx. 28; that is as much as to say, a price of redemption; and His Apostle somewhat more in this passage, using a term which signifieth a just and satisfactory price, full as much as the thing can be worth. Yet this was not paid to Satan, in whose possession we were; for he was but an usurper, and his title naught. But it was paid to Almighty God, our Redeemer's Father, and our Lord; under whose heavy curse we lay, and whose just vengeance would not be appeased towards us for our grievous presumption, without a condign satisfaction. To Him there was a price paid by our Redeemer, the greatest that ever was paid for any purchase since the world began: even Himself, in whom are amassed and hidden all the treasures of the wisdom of God, and even the whole riches of His grace; treasures enough to redeem a whole world of sinners. Take it collectively or distributively, in Christ there is redemption plenty, and enough for all, if they will but accept it. Take all mankind singly one by one, "He gave Himself for me," saith St. Paul in one place: take them altogether in a body, "He gave Himself a ransom for all," in another. Bp. Sanderson.

"A ransom for all," so as to be in the place of all; or a commutative ransom, for so the original phrase emphatically signifies: so that I do not see how it was possible that Christ's dying in our stead could have been revealed more clearly to us by any words whatsoever, than it is by these. And they that strive to wrest these to any other sense, might do as much to any other words that could be used in any language whatsoever: and so would make all words signify nothing but what they themselves please. Yea, the sacred oracles of God Himself would be written in vain to such people, who take not the sense of them from the words themselves, wherein they are delivered to us, but from their own opinions and fancies. How they will answer such an abuse put upon God's word at the last day, I know not. Bp. Beveridge.

——for all,] These verses contain several convincing arguments, that God wills the salvation of all men in particular, and that Christ thus died for all. For, 1st, the Apostle here enjoins us to pray for all men, because "God will have all men to be saved." Now it is unquestionably the Christian's duty, and was the constant practice of the church, to pray for all men in particular; and therefore the reason here assigned for this duty must reach to all men in particular. 2dly, The Apostle reasons thus: "God will have all men to be saved," because He is the God of all, the common Father, Creator, Governour, and Preserver of all men. Now thus He is the God of all men in particular; and so this argument must shew, He would have all men in particular to be saved. 3dly, "He would have all men to be saved," saith the Apostle, "for there is one Mediator,—the man Jesus Christ," &c. Now if the argument from one God was, as we have proved, designed to shew that He was the God of all men in particular; the argument from this one Mediator must also prove Christ the Mediator of all men in particular. Dr. Whitby.

7. —(I speak the truth in Christ, and lie not;)] This oath or vehement affirmation was necessary, not on Timothy's account, put probably on account of the Jews at Ephesus or elsewhere, who asserted that the Gospel was not to be preached to the Gentiles, or only on the terms of their being circumcised, which the Apostle resolutely opposed. Dr. Whitby.

——in faith and verity.] Administering the Gospel faithfully and truly, without concealing or adding any thing. Dr. Hammond.

8. —that men pray every where,] That is, in every place appointed for publick worship. As the Apostle is speaking of publick prayer, his meaning appears to be, that the men, and not the women, were to lead the devotion of the assembly; especially as in ver. 12. he expressly forbids women to speak in the church. Dr. Macknight.

——lifting up holy hands,] The ceremony of washing was among the Jews constantly used before prayers. This significant rite the Apostle here applies to the thing signified by it; namely, cleanness of the heart and actions: and represents the latter as necessary to the offering up of any acceptable service unto God. Dr. Hammond.

——without wrath and doubting.] "Without doubting;" that is, so as not to doubt of the promises of God. Schleusner. The general meaning of the precept is, Let their prayers be holy, accompanied with faith and charity. To pray with doubting, is opposed to faith; to pray in wrath, is opposed to charity. Burkitt.

seems impossible to fix a certain rule for the attire of women of all states and conditions, at all times, and in all places. Different apparel is necessary to distinguish between the different qualities and ranks of persons. But from what St. Paul says here, and from what St. Peter says, 1 Pet. iii. 3, it seems evident, that all attire is forbidden which betrays immodesty, or raises a suspicion prejudicial to the character of the wearer: or which discovers pride or vanity of spirit, and is therefore not consistent with sobriety, much less with the profession of true godliness: or which, by the attention paid to the external adorning of the body, occasions neglect of the adorning of the mind. Such a precept as this ought not to be slighted, since it is so carefully inculcated by the two chief Apostles of the Jews and Gentiles, St. Peter and St. Paul; and the contrary is represented as a practice opposite to godliness. The precept is applicable at all times, but has especial regard to seasons of publick worship. Dr. Whitby, Burkitt.

12. But I suffer not a woman to teach,] That is, publickly. See 1 Cor. xiv. 34, 35; and the note there. They may privately instruct, as Priscilla did Apollos, Acts xviii. 26; and as a believing wife may instruct her unbelieving husband, when he requires a reason of her faith; but then she must not challenge any authority to do this, this being to usurp an authority not due to her. Dr. Whitby.

13. — then Eve.] Out of him, to denote her subordination to, and dependence upon him. Dr. Hammond.

14. And Adam was not deceived,] That is, first and immediately deceived; "but the woman being deceived, was" first "in the transgression." She was therefore guilty of her own and her husband's transgression; and accordingly, not only by the law of her creation, but as a punishment for her transgression, God has placed her in a state of subjection, and given authority over her to the man. Burkitt.

15. Notwithstanding she shall be saved in childbearing, &c.] Commentators are much divided about the meaning of this passage: the following paraphrase of Bp. Hall appears to give a good and consistent sense.

But though the woman hath, by her yielding to the suggestion of the serpent, brought upon man and herself so great sin and misery; and though I allow her not to take upon her publick offices; yet there is employment for her at home, wherein she may so demean herself as may be pleasing unto God: and in that very punishment, which God inflicted upon her, He hath given her just cause and means of comfort: for God shall make those her painful conceptions, and the care and anxiety which she undergoes in the nurture and education of her charge, good means to bring her to salvation: but the main condition and help to that her future glory, is the continuance (of that sex as well as of the other) in faith, charity, and holiness with sobriety. Bp. Hall.

The change of the number, as in this case, from "she" to "they," in words that comprehend all of the same kind, is very common. See, amongst numerous other instances, Ps. cxl. 8; Prov. ii. 12, 13: and of this epistle, chap. v. 4. Dr. Whitby.

Chap. III. St. Paul speaks in this chapter, 1st, of the importance of the office of a bishop and pastor; and of the qualities which ought to be possessed by those who are admitted into this office. 2dly, Of the office of deacons, whose business it was to distribute the alms of the church, and to assist the bishops in their office; and he shews likewise how deacons ought to be qualified. 3dly, To engage Timothy to admit none into any ecclesiastical employ, but those who were worthy of it, and to govern the church as he ought, the Apostle represents to him the dignity of the church of God, and the excellency of the doctrine taught therein. Ostervald.

Ver. 1. — If a man desire the office of a bishop,] That the words "bishop" and "presbyter" are sometimes in the New Testament used promiscuously to denote the same church officer, is evident from Titus i. 5, compared with ver. 7. Soon after the times of the writing of the New Testament, the use of the two words began to be distinguished by the church, and the name of bishops to be appropriated to the highest order of the clergy, distinguished hitherto by the name of Apostles; and the name of presbyters to be appropriated to the clergy of the second rank or order; as is evident from the writings of those who lived in the second century. Whether St. Paul intended here to describe the qualifications of a minister of the highest or of the second rank, seems to be a matter, concerning which there is no occasion for much dispute. For the two superiour offices of the clergy are the same in many respects: and consequently the qualifications requisite for each must be much the same. Dr. Wells.

—— a good work.] An honourable office. Pyle. That is, a work which is honourable in itself, and so requires such dispositions and qualifications in the person who desires it, as may render him worthy of that honour. Dr. Whitby.

2. A bishop then must be blameless,] A man of an inoffensive life. Bp. Hall. A person free from scandal, without any just ground of blame. Burkitt.

—— the husband of one wife,] One that is not tainted with the common blemish of polygamy; that is, of having more wives at once than one, or, after an unjust repudiation of one wife, marrying another. Bp. Hall.

Polygamy had been permitted to the Jews by Moses, Deut. xxi. 15, on account of the hardness of their hearts; and it was generally practised by the Eastern nations as a matter of indifference. It was therefore to be corrected mildly and gradually, by example, rather than by express precept. And seeing reformation must begin somewhere, it was certainly fit to begin with the ministers of religion, that through the influence of their example the evil might be remedied by disuse, without occasioning those domestick troubles and causeless divorces, which must necessarily have ensued, if, by an express injunction of the Apostles, husbands, immediately on their becoming Christians, had been obliged to put away all their wives except one. Accordingly the example of the clergy, and of such of the brethren as were not married at their conversion, or who were married only to one woman, supported by the precepts of the Gospel, which enjoined temperance in the use of sensual pleasure, had in the fourth century effectually rooted out polygamy from the church. Dr. Macknight.

are given in the New Testament, particularly in the epistles to Timothy and Titus, there is not a word of the celibacy of the clergy, but plain intimations to the contrary, that they were and might be married. That of being "the husband of one wife" is repeated in different places: mention is also made of the "wives" and "children" of the clergy, rules being given concerning them: and not a word is so much as insinuated, importing that this was only tolerated in the beginnings of Christianity, but that it was afterwards to cease. On the contrary, the "forbidding to marry" is given as a character of the apostasy of the latter times, 1 Tim. iv. 3. We find that Aquila, when he went about preaching the Gospel, was not only married to Priscilla, but that he carried her about with him: not to insist upon that privilege, which St. Paul thought he might have claimed, of carrying about with him "a sister, a wife, as well as other Apostles," 1 Cor. ix. 5. Thus the doctrine of our own, in common with other Protestant churches, seems to be fully cleared, that by no law of God are the clergy debarred from marriage. There is not one word in the whole Scriptures that does so much as hint at it; whereas there is a great deal to the contrary. Bp. Burnet.

—— sober,] Governing his passions and appetites. Burkitt.

—— given to hospitality,] Or the entertainment of strangers. Dr. Whitby. As there were then in the Eastern countries few houses of publick entertainment, hospitality was a virtue more peculiarly seasonable and necessary than among us; so far at least as it related to the accommodation of entire strangers on their travels. Dr. Doddridge.

6. Not a novice, &c.] Not one that is but newly planted or instructed in the faith, lest so great a dignity, so suddenly bestowed on him, may tempt him to pride and vanity, and so bring the same ruin on him which fell upon the devil; who was tempted in like manner by that glorious condition wherein he was created, and for his pride was cast out of heaven into the torments of hell, 2 Pet. ii. 4. Dr. Hammond.

7. — them which are without;] Namely, without the church; unbelieving Jews or Gentiles, with whom he formerly conversed. Burkitt.

—— the snare of the devil.] That is, saith Theodoret, lest, being tempted by Satan, he relapse into his former sins; or, lest being reproached by those, whom he is set over, for his former life, he be tempted by Satan to apostasy, chap. v. 15. Dr. Whitby.

8. Likewise must the deacons be grave,] Because the higher officers of the church were usually chosen out of the inferiour, therefore also the qualifications of them all are for the greatest part the same both for bishops and deacons, both in this epistle, and in the epistle to Titus. For the clergy were to be educated in that holy discipline. Bp. Fell.

9. Holding the mystery of the faith in a pure conscience.] Such as, being orthodox in point of faith, live pure and Christian lives according to the doctrine and directions thereof. Dr. Hammond. For when a good conscience is once put away, the loss of faith will follow, chap. i. 19. Dr. Whitby.

10. And let these also first be proved;] By an examination of the soundness of their faith, and the purity of their former lives. Dr. Whitby.

11. Even so must their wives be grave,] In the original it runs, 'Let the women:' by which are meant, either the deacons' wives, or the deaconesses, who were appointed to take care of the poor women, as the deacons were of the men. Of whichever it be understood, the qualifications are very excellent and becoming. Burkitt.

13. For they that have used the office of a deacon well &c.] For though the office of a deacon be an inferiour degree, yet it is a step to a higher; and they who behave themselves well in it, are fit to be preferred to the higher offices in the church; and do by this means receive an increase of courage and holy boldness in the profession of the Gospel of Christ. Dr. Hammond, Bp. Hall.

15. — how thou oughtest to behave thyself in the house of God, &c.] How thou oughtest to carry thyself in this great family of God, the church of the living God; which is, in respect of men, the pillar and ground of truth; so that it sustaineth and beareth up, by a faithful profession and maintenance thereof, the true religion of God. Bp. Hall.

Some difficulties have been raised respecting the precise meaning of the terms, "the pillar and ground of the truth." The most obvious application of them to the universal church, administered under an external and visible form of government, best accords with the context, and is liable to no solid objections. The words immediately follow a series of instructions to Timothy, how he in the office of a bishop, and others in the inferiour orders of the ministry, were to conduct themselves in the house of God, "which," adds the Apostle, "is the church of the living God, the pillar and ground of the truth." His design is evidently to give additional weight to those preceding instructions, by suggesting the high and important purpose for which the church was instituted: and thence to shew how necessary it was that they, who were ordained to the sacred office of her ministers, should "take heed unto themselves and unto the doctrine," chap. iv. 16. In no other way can the passage be so easily and consistently explained. Dr. Van Mildert.

16 And without controversy great is the mystery of godliness: God was manifest in the flesh, justified in the Spirit, seen of angels, preached unto the Gentiles, believed on in the world, received up into glory.

Anno DOMINI 65.

16. And without controversy great is the mystery of godliness: &c.] As if he had said, The sum whereof, namely, of the true religion, is that undoubtedly great and wonderful mystery of godliness; God manifested in the flesh, &c. Bp. Hall.

St. Paul, unfolding the mystery of godliness, hath here delivered six propositions together, and the subject of all and each of them is God. And this God, which is the subject of all these propositions, must be understood of Christ, because of Him each one is true, and all are so of none but Him. He was the Word, which was God, and was made flesh; and consequently "God manifested in the flesh." Upon Him the Spirit descended at His baptism, and after His ascension was poured upon His Apostles, ratifying His commission, and confirming the doctrine which they received from Him: wherefore He was "God justified in the Spirit." His nativity the angels celebrated; in the discharge of His office they ministered unto Him; at His resurrection and ascension they were present, always ready to confess and adore Him: He was therefore "God seen of angels." The Apostles preached unto all nations, and He whom they preached was Jesus Christ. The Father separated St. Paul from his mother's womb, and called him by His grace to reveal His Son unto him, that he might preach Him among the heathen: therefore He was "God preached unto the Gentiles." John the Baptist spake unto the people, that they should believe on Him which should come after Him; that is, on Christ Jesus. We have believed in Jesus Christ, saith St. Paul; who so taught the jailer trembling at his feet, "Believe on the Lord Jesus Christ, and thou shalt be saved." He therefore was "God believed on in the world." When he had been forty days on earth after His resurrection, He was taken visibly up into heaven, and sat down at the right hand of the Father: wherefore He was "God received up into glory." And thus all these six propositions, according to the plain and familiar language of the Scriptures, are infallibly true of Christ, and so of God, as He is taken by St. John, when he speaks those words, "the Word was God." Bp. Pearson.

The Word came down from heaven to earth for us men and for our salvation, to the end that as body and soul are one man, so God and man might be one Christ, who was to live and to die for us; to suffer, and to save; as man to suffer, and as God to save. He could not have suffered, unless He had been man; He could not have saved by suffering, unless He had been God, "God manifest in the flesh." By this amazing and most beneficial union, the law was kept, the ransom paid, sin done away, Satan overcome, death swallowed up, immortality brought to light, man redeemed, hell confounded, earth made to rejoice, and heaven peopled with glorified saints. Bp. Horne.

—— God was manifest in the flesh,] When the scheme of man's redemption was laid, it was not thought that an Apostle, a Prophet, a man like ourselves, no nor an Angel or Archangel, should be the instrument of it; but that the Word of God, the Son of God, nay God Himself, (as He is elsewhere called,) should take this momentous office upon Him; that Heaven should stoop to earth, and that the Divine Nature should condescend to leave the mansions of glory, enshrine itself in a fleshly tabernacle, should be made man, should dwell among us, and die for us. Bp. Hurd.

—— justified in the Spirit,] That is, by or through the Spirit, whose ministry was seen in directing the ancient Prophets to foretell the Redeemer's coming, in accomplishing the miraculous conception, in assisting at His baptism, in conducting Him through His temptation, in giving Him the power to cast out devils, which is expressly said to be "by the Spirit of God;" in raising Him from the dead, by which event He was declared "the Son of God with power according to the Spirit of holiness;" in descending on His disciples on the day of Pentecost; in bestowing diversities of miraculous gifts upon them for the confirmation of His doctrine, and the propagation of it through the world; and lastly, in sanctifying and illuminating the faithful of all times and places. Bp. Hurd.

—— seen of angels,] We have some grounds from analogy to conclude, that as there is a scale of beings below us, there is one above us; at least the conclusion has been pretty generally drawn, and the belief almost universal, of such a scale ascending from us to God, though the uppermost round of it still be at an infinite distance from His throne. But the direct, indeed the only solid proof of its existence, is the revealed word which speaks of angels and archangels, nay myriads of them, disposed in different ranks, and rising above each other with a wonderful harmony and proportion.

Such is the idea which Scripture gives of the invisible world. Now to raise our minds to some just apprehension of the great scheme of our redemption, it represents that world as being put in motion by that scheme, as attentive and earnest to look into it; and to exalt our conceptions of the Redeemer Himself, it speaks of that world as being in subjection to Him, of all its inhabitants, the highest in place and dignity, as serving in His retinue, and paying homage to His Person.

They accordingly ministered to Him in this capacity when they celebrated His birth in the fields of Bethlehem; when they took part with Him in His triumphs over the adversary in the desert; when they flew to strengthen Him in His last agonies; when they attended in their robes of state to grace His resurrection; and when they ranked themselves with all observance about Him as He went up to heaven.

Of angels then was He seen on all these, and doubtless on other occasions. But how was He seen? With love and wonder unspeakable, when they saw their Lord thus humbling Himself for the sake of man, when they contemplated this bright effulgence of the Deity, the express image of His Person, vailing all His glories in flesh. Bp. Hurd.

—— preached unto the Gentiles,] When the nations of the earth had so prodigiously corrupted themselves as to lose the memory of the true religion, and to give themselves over to the most abominable impieties, it pleased God to select one faithful family from the rest of a degenerate world, and in due time to advance it unto a numerous people, which He vouchsafed to take into a near relation to Himself, and for a singular policy to preserve distinct and separate from surrounding tribes of idolaters. Thenceforth the Jews considered themselves as the sole favourites of Heaven, (as they were indeed the sole worshippers of the true God,) and all the heathen as the outcasts of God's providence.

This notion in process of time became so rooted in them, that when Jesus now appeared in Judea, they were ready to engross all His favours to themselves, and thought it strange and incredible that any part of them should be conferred on the reprobate heathen: so that He Himself was obliged to proceed with much caution in opening the extent of His commission: and St. Paul every where speaks of the design to save the Gentiles as the profoundest mystery. Bp. Hurd.

—— believed on in the world,] "So mightily grew the word of God, and prevailed;" and it still prevails, not in all the world to that degree in which it one day will, and in some parts of it much below that degree in which it once flourished, but to a certain degree every where, notwithstanding what time, and superstition, and barbarism, have done to oppress it; and in all the learned and enlightened world universally, and in those with the greatest effect which are most enlightened: an evident proof that reason is congenial with faith, and that nothing but ignorance corrupted by vice can hold out against the cross of Jesus.

This power of the cross must be thought prodigious, since its pretensions are so high, and its doctrine so pure, that in a world overgrown with presumption and vice, it could never have made its way to so much consideration, if the hand of God had not been with it. Such is the mystery of Christ "believed on in the world." Bp. Hurd.

—— received up into glory.] This circumstance was proper to shut up so stupendous a scene. It opened with "God manifest in the flesh," degraded, eclipsed, obscured by this material vestment, yet emerging out of its dark shade through the countenance of the Spirit and by the ministry of angels, then shining out in the face of the Gentiles, and gradually ascending to His meridian height in the conversion of the whole world. Yet was this prize of glory to be won by a long and painful conflict, with danger, sufferings, and death, in regard to which last enemy the Apostle affirms that it was not possible for so divine a Person to be holden of it. It follows therefore naturally and properly, (to vindicate the Redeemer's honour, and to replace Him in that celestial state from which He had descended,) that in His own person He triumphed over hell and the grave, and went up visibly into heaven, there to sit down at the right hand of the Father, till, His great mediatorial scheme being accomplished, He Himself shall voluntarily quit the distinction of His name and place, and God shall be all in all. Bp. Hurd.

Chap. IV. The Apostle warns Timothy, that there would appear false teachers, who would condemn marriage and the use of certain meats. Secondly, he exhorts him to teach pure doctrine, and to adhere to true piety, the great advantage of which he represents to him. Thirdly, he recommends to him, so to behave as to procure respect to his ministry, notwithstanding his youth; and to apply himself diligently to all his duties. Ostervald.

Ver. 1. Now the Spirit &c.] The Apostle here describes more fully the particular nature and kind of the apostasy, concerning which he had given a particular caution in his second Epistle to the Thessalonians, chap. ii. 1—3. What follows is a very lively and apt description of that great apostasy in the Christian church, which began in the western part of it, and hath spread itself far and wide. Abp. Tillotson.

—— the Spirit speaketh expressly,] That is, precisely and clearly, not obscurely and involvedly, as He was wont to speak in the Prophets. Dr. Whitby. Or, in express words, in some place or other of holy writ: as is the case in the prophecy of Daniel, chap. xi. ver. 36—39. So that this is a prophecy not only of St. Paul, but of Daniel too; or rather of Daniel, confirmed and approved by St. Paul. Jos. Mede, Bp. Newton.

—— in the latter times] Wherein Antichrist shall reign and sway in the world. Bp. Hall. The latter times of the Christian dispensation, namely, the times of the little horn or of Antichrist, Dan. vii. Jos. Mede, Bp. Newton.

—— some shall depart] Or rather, 'shall apostatize from the faith.' The Apostle had predicted the same thing before to the Thessalonians, "The day of Christ shall not come, except there come a falling away," or rather 'the apostasy,' "first." In the original, the words are of the same import and derivation; they are literally 'apostasy' and 'apostatize:' and they should have been translated both alike, as the same thing was intended in both places. (See the note on 2 Thess. ii. 3.) By "some" in this passage is to be understood many; according to the sense which the word frequently bears in the learned languages, of which sense there are abundant instances in Scripture. Other prophecies likewise intimate, that there should be a great and general corruption and apostasy in the Christian church: and the event justifies the prediction. Bp. Newton.

Idolatry being represented in the Old Testament as apostasy from the law of Moses and the God of Israel, the like idolatry in the church of Rome may well be accounted an apostasy from the Christian faith. Dr. Whitby.

—— giving heed to seducing spirits,] That is, to false pretensions to inspiration, which cause men to err from the true faith of the Gospel. The Apostle means those gross frauds, by which the corrupt teachers in the dark ages were to enforce their erroneous doctrines and superstitious practices on the ignorant multitude, under the notion of revelations from God, or from angels, or from departed saints. In this sense the word "spirits" is used for pretenders to inspiration, 1 John iv. 1. Dr. Macknight.

—— and doctrines of devils;] Or, 'of demons,' that is, concerning demons. Thus "the doctrine of the Lord," Acts xiii. 12, is the doctrine concerning Him: and "the doctrine of baptisms," &c. Heb. vi. 2, is the doctrine relating to baptisms, &c. And by the same construction "doctrines of demons" are doctrines about or concerning demons. The word translated demons was used by the Greeks to denote a kind of beings of a middle nature between God and men. They gave the same name also to the souls of some departed men, who, they thought, were exalted to the state and honour of demons for their virtue. The former sort they called superiour demons, and supposed them to have the nature and office, which we ascribe to angels. The latter they termed inferiour demons. These were of the same character with the Romish saints. And both sorts were worshipped as mediators. When therefore the Spirit of God foretold, that in the latter days many would give heed to seducing spirits and to doctrines concerning demons, he foretold, that on the authority of feigned revelations many in the church would receive the doctrine concerning the worship of angels and saints; and called it the doctrine of demons, because it was in reality the same with the ancient heathenish worship of demons, as mediators between the gods and men. Bp. Newton, Dr. Macknight.

2. Speaking lies in hypocrisy;] Rather, 'through the hypocrisy of liars;' the Apostle proceeds to describe by what means and by what persons the great apostasy, consisting in the revival of the doctrines concerning demons, and in worshipping the dead, should be propagated and established. It was to prevail 'through the hypocrisy of liars, having their conscience seared with a hot iron.' And hath not the great idolatry of Christians, and the worship of the dead particularly, been diffused and advanced in the world by such instruments and agents? It is impossible to relate or enumerate all the various falsehoods and lies, which have been invented and propagated for this purpose: the fabulous books, forged under the names of Apostles, saints, and martyrs; the fabulous legends of their lives, actions, sufferings, and deaths; the fabulous miracles ascribed to their sepulchres, bones, and other relicks; the fabulous dreams and revelations, visions and apparitions of the dead to the living; and even the fabulous saints, who never existed but in the imagination of their worshippers. And all these stories the Romish clergy have imposed and obtruded upon mankind, it is difficult to say, whether with greater artifice, or cruelty; with greater confidence, or hypocrisy and pretended sanctity; a more hardened face, or a more hardened conscience. 'The history of the church,' saith Pascal, 'is the history of truth;' but, as written by bigoted Papists, it is rather the history of lies. So well doth this prophecy coincide and agree with the preceding one, 2 Thess. ii. 9, that "the coming of the man of sin should be after the working of Satan, with all power, and signs, and lying wonders, and with all deceivableness of unrighteousness. Bp. Newton.

3. Forbidding to marry,] The monks were the first, who brought celibacy into repute; as they were the first also, who revived and promoted the worship of demons. It is a thing universally known, that one of the primary and most essential laws and constitutions of all monks, whether solitary or associated, whether living in deserts or in convents, is the profession of a single life; to abstain from marriage themselves, and to discourage it as much as they can in others. It is equally certain, that the monks had the principal share in promoting and propagating the worship of the dead. Their legitimate descendants are the Romish clergy, who profess and recommend celibacy, as well as the worship of saints and angels. In the eleventh century, the celibacy of the clergy was fully decreed by pope Gregory the Seventh; and this hath been the universal law and practice of that church ever since. Thus have the worship of demons and the prohibition of marriage gone hand in hand together: and as they, who maintain the one, maintain the other, so it is no less remarkable, that they who disclaim the one, disclaim the other also. Bp. Newton.

—— and commanding to abstain from meats,] It is as much the law and constitution of all monks to abstain from meats as from marriage. Some never eat any flesh; others only of certain kinds and on certain days. Frequent fasts are the rule, the boast of their order: and their carnal humility is their spiritual pride. So lived the monks of the ancient church: so live, with less strictness, perhaps, but with greater ostentation, the monks and friars of the church of Rome: and they have been the principal propagators and defenders of the worship of the dead, both in former and in later times. The worship of the dead is indeed so monstrously absurd as well as impious, that there was hardly any possibility of its ever succeeding and prevailing in the world, but by hypocrisy and lies: but that these particular sorts of hypocrisy, celibacy under pretence of chastity, and abstinence under pretence of devotion, should be employed for this purpose, the Spirit of God alone could foresee and foretell. Bp. Newton.

4. — if it be received with thanksgiving:] The Apostle here approves and sanctifies the religious custom of blessing God at our meals, as our Saviour, when He was about to distribute the loaves and fishes, "looked up to heaven, and blessed, and brake," Matt. xiv. 19; xv. 36. What then can be said of those, who have their table spread with the most plentiful gifts of God, and yet constantly sit down and rise up again without suffering so much as one thought of the Giver to intrude upon them? Can they, who refuse even that, be reputed either to "believe," or to "know the truth?" Man is free to partake of all the good creatures of God; but thanksgiving is the necessary condition. Bp. Newton.

5. For it is sanctified by the word of God] Giving us commission to eat of all things, Gen. ix. 2, 3; or by the Gospel, taking off the difference betwixt things clean and unclean, Rom. xiv. 14. Dr. Whitby.

Unto us the word, that is to say, the Gospel of Christ, having not delivered any such difference of things, clean and unclean, as the law of Moses did unto the Jews, there is no cause but that we may use indifferently all things, as long as we do not, like brute beasts, take the benefit of them without a thankful acknowledgment of His liberality and goodness, by whose providence they are enjoyed. And therefore the Apostle gave warning beforehand to take heed of such as should enjoin to "abstain from meats, &c.:" the meaning of which is, that the Gospel, by not making many things unclean, as the law did, hath sanctified those things generally to all, which particularly each man unto himself must sanctify by a reverent and holy use. Hooker.

7. — refuse profane and old wives' fables,] 'Old women's.' Parkhurst. Such as the Jewish doctors tell, chap. i. 4, 6; Tit. i. 14; iii. 9. Dr. Whitby. Refuse both erroneous and heretical opinions, as also the fabulous dotages of vain and brainsick men. Bp. Hall.

—— exercise thyself rather unto godliness.] Make the substantial duties of Christianity your chief business. Pyle.

8. For bodily exercise profiteth little:] As for that bodily exercise of fasting and strict penitence, wherewith many please themselves, if it be considered in itself, surely it profiteth little, and many have used it to small purpose. But the exercises of true piety, whereby we work upon our hearts to draw them to the fear of God, to sound repentance, to a lively faith, and all other heavenly dispositions, are profitable to all ends and purposes; having the promises of God's gracious acceptation and reward, in respect of the blessings both of this life and of the life to come. Bp. Hall.

—— having promise of the life that now is,] The Gospel contains various promises of the good things of this life to the godly. See Matt. vi. 30, 33; Mark x. 29, 30. These promises however do not ascertain to every individual, who lives in a godly manner, health and wealth and reputation; but they assure us that piety and virtue have a natural tendency to promote our temporal welfare, and commonly do promote it. Or if, in particular instances, through cross accidents, it happens otherwise, the consciousness of a well spent life affords unspeakably more delight, than the enjoyment of prosperity affords to those, who being destitute of godliness have no hope of happiness in the world to come. Dr. Macknight.

The promises given to us by the Gospel are peace of mind and joy in the Holy Ghost, with a supply of the things absolutely needful for our subsistence. True it is, that all who call themselves Christians possess them not: but the question is, whether the fault be not in them; and whether, by their imprudent conduct and by many defects, they deprive not themselves of God's favour and support. These promises are made to those who are truly religious; and, if a person be such, his conscience will speak peace to him at all times, and his hopes and expectation of future happiness will enable him to bear with courage and constancy inconveniences and disappointments, under which a worldly and vicious mind would sink and despond. It is possible indeed, that he may be deprived even of necessaries, if he lives in times of great distress or of persecution: else it is very uncommon to find one, who through the course of his life has been pious, sober, just, merciful, civil, and industrious, so disappointed in all his undertakings, and so neglected by the world, as to want bread. Dr. Jortin.

Those precepts of the Gospel, which are the strictest of all, perhaps contribute the most of all to our happiness here, by striking at the root, from whence our faults and uneasinesses spring, and requiring of us that inward self-government, which is the only means of true self-enjoyment. There is also another exceeding great advantage of Christian virtue; that the Gospel affords such peculiar evidences and means of God's grace and assistance, in proportion as we need it, to do every thing to which He calls us; that, though we were not to add the consideration of His rewarding us hereafter, yet believers would undoubtedly be capable of going through the same difficulties with much greater spirit, comfort, and success, than other men. And accordingly our Saviour assures us, that "His yoke is easy, and His burden light," Matt. xi. 30. And St. Paul yet more distinctly asserts in this place, that "godliness," meaning certainly Christian godliness, "is profitable unto all things, having promise of the life that now is," as well as of "that which is to come." Abp. Secker.

1 Rules to be observed in reproving. 3 Of widows. 17 Of elders. 23 A precept for Timothy's health. 24 Some men's sins go before unto judgment, and some men's do follow after.

REBUKE not an elder, but intreat him as a father; and the younger men as brethren;

2 The elder women as mothers; the younger as sisters, with all purity.

3 Honour widows that are widows indeed.

10. — who is the Saviour of all men, &c.] That is, the Preserver of all men, but especially of all good men, when their temporal preservation conduces most to the advantages of His glory, and their good. Or, if it be understood of eternal salvation, we must understand it thus: that He publishes and proclaims, offers and tenders salvation to all men, although believers only are actually saved, because they only accept the offers and conditions of salvation. Burkitt.

Many full and clear testimonies of Scripture do shew, many reasons grounded on Scripture do prove, that our Lord Jesus is the Saviour of all men; or that the most signal of His saving performances do in their nature and their design respect all men, as meant for, as conducing and tending to, all men's salvation, yea, and as in their own nature (supposing men's due and possible concurrence with them) effectually productive of their salvation. This is an ancient catholick point of doctrine, which we profess to believe, when with the church we say in the Nicene Creed, "who for us men, and for our salvation came down from heaven;" and which, particularly our church in its Catechism, in the Ministration of Baptism, and in the Communion, doth most evidently and expressly declare itself to embrace. Dr. Isaac Barrow.

12. Let no man despise thy youth;] Though thou art a young man in years, yet let the gravity of thy life supply the want of the years that are wont to be required of thy office. Dr. Hammond.

—— in word, in conversation,] In gravity of speech, in propriety of behaviour. Dr. Macknight. The word rendered "conversation" signifies behaviour, manner of life, general conduct. Parkhurst, Schleusner.

—— in spirit,] In an undaunted courage and fortitude. Bp. Hall. In fervency of spirit. Dr. Whitby. In that disposition of mind, which Christianity requires and produces. Schleusner.

13. — give attendance to reading, &c.] Be diligent in performing thy office in the several parts of it: expounding the Scriptures; confirming believers, and admonishing them of any fault or danger; and instructing the ignorant or unbelievers. Dr. Hammond. Besides reading the Jewish Scriptures to the brethren in their assemblies for worship, after the example of the synagogue, Timothy was here directed to read these Scriptures in private likewise for his own improvement, ver. 15; that he might be able to confute the Jews and Judaizers, who founded their errours on misinterpretations of the Scriptures. Thus understood, the direction, as the ancient commentators observe, is an useful lesson to the ministers of the Gospel in all ages. For if a teacher, who possessed the spiritual gifts, was commanded to read the Scriptures for improving himself in the knowledge of the doctrines of religion, how much more necessary is that help to those teachers, who must derive all their knowledge of the Gospel from the Scriptures; and who cannot, without much study, be supposed to know the customs, manners, and opinions, alluded to in these writings? Drs. Macknight and Whitby.

14. Neglect not the gift that is in thee,] That is, neglect not to stir it up. See the note on 2 Tim. i. 6. Dr. Whitby.

—— which was given thee by prophecy,] According to the revelation from the Spirit concerning thee, chap. i. 18. Dr. Hammond. See the note there.

—— with the laying on of the hands of the presbytery.] The Apostles were often called by the name of presbyters; and so the presbyters here mentioned may probably have been Apostles. Or, as we are sure that St. Paul was one of them, and that he ascribes the whole of Timothy's ordination to his own laying on of hands, 2 Tim. i. 6; it may be that one or more of such as were mere presbyters, might lay on their hands in concurrence with him, to testify their consent and approbation; as is the custom at this day in the ordination of a presbyter, and as hath been sometimes done at the consecration of a bishop. Wheatly.

The ceremony of imposition of hands in ordination is confirmed from the practice of the Apostles and Apostolical men, thus ordaining deacons, Acts vi. 6; pastors or teachers of the word, Acts xiii. 3; elders, whether bishops or presbyters, in every city, Acts xiv. 23. This practice they derived from the Jews, who are said to have received it from the time of Joshua, Deut. xxxiv. 9. Dr. Whitby. See the notes on the above passages in the Acts.

16. — continue in them:] In the careful observation of these rules, which I have given thee. Bp. Hall. In the exercises mentioned ver. 12, 13. Dr. Whitby.

—— and them that hear thee.] It is by an attentive observation of the injunctions here given by the Apostle to Timothy, that their successors in the ministry of the Gospel can do their utmost to save the souls committed to them. If they do so, God will pronounce them pure from the blood of all men; and if their people perish, their blood will be upon their own heads. Burkitt.

Chap. V. The Apostle gives Timothy directions for censuring and reproving elders and young men; and for his behaviour towards aged and young women: also for the publick charity to widows, which of them are fit, and which not fit, to receive it. He directs that good ministers should be liberally maintained; and that no accusation against a presbyter should be proceeded on, without due caution and full evidence; but that such, as were notoriously guilty, should be severely and openly reproved. He strictly charges Timothy to be impartial in his government, and to be tenderly cautious whom he ordains to the ministry: adding some private advice relating to his health. Pyle, Osterwald.

Ver. 1. Rebuke not an elder,] With severity or harsh language. In the judgment of the ancients "an elder" here signifies, not a priest, but a grave ancient man, such being in all ages and nations styled fathers: and this appears not only from the opposition to "the younger men" in this verse, and from the following verse concerning aged and young women, but also from Tit. ii. 2. Drs. Whitby and Wells.

3. Honour widows that are widows indeed.] Let such widows, as are destitute of friends to relieve them, be liberally and respectfully maintained out of the publick charities of the church. Pyle. That provision for their wants is included under the term "honour," appears from ver. 4 and 8. Thus not to give parents what is needful for them is to transgress the commandment, which requires us to "honour our father and our mother," Mark vii. 10—12. Dr. Whitby.

4. — nephews,] Rather, 'descendants, grandchildren.' At the time our translation was made, the word "nephews" signified grandchildren, or descendants however distant; but is now no longer commonly used in either of these senses. Parkhurst.

—— let them learn first to shew piety at home,] That is, to relieve their own relations, before they shew kindness to strangers, or before the church be burdened with them. The original word is very emphatical: let them exercise religion and godliness towards their own house, implying that to extend our charity to our nearest relations is a duty in the first place; and to perform it with cheerfulness is an act of religion and godliness: and that it is in vain to pretend to religion, if we see a relation in want, and are able but unwilling to relieve him. Burkitt.

Indeed nature, as well as Christianity, enjoins it so strongly, that the whole world cries out shame, where it is neglected. And the same reason, which requires parents to be assisted in their necessities, requires children also to attend upon them, and minister to them, with vigilant assiduity and tender affection, in their infirmities; and to consult on every occasion their desires, their peace, their ease. And they should consider both what they contribute to their support, and every other instance of regard which they show them, not as an alms given to an inferiour, but as a tribute of duty paid to a superiour. For which reason perhaps it may be, that relieving them is mentioned in Scripture under the notion of "honouring" them. Abp. Secker.

5. Now she that is a widow indeed, &c.] The Apostle seems to be specifying here the two qualifications, which rendered a widow a proper object of the church's charity: she must be one destitute of relations to relieve her, and likewise remarkable for the steadiness of her Christian principles, and the constancy of her devotions. Pyle.

6. — is dead while she liveth.] "Dead" to God; and so is not to be respected as a vital member of the church, or to be nourished by her. Dr. Whitby.

7. — that they may be blameless.] Namely, the persons who may be concerned. Dr. Wells.

8. But if any provide not for his own,] That is, for his own kindred, "and especially for those of his own house," as parents or children, he liveth in a manner so contrary to the Christian faith, that he in effect "denies" it, "and is worse than an infidel," who ordinarily takes care for his parents, and makes provision for his poor relations. The old heathens had this among them as an universal principle of nature, to honour the gods, and provide for their parents; affirming that no man can do any thing more acceptable to the gods, than by heaping favours upon his parents; and that nothing can be a greater evidence of atheism and impiety, than to neglect and despise them. Burkitt, Dr. Whitby.

St. Paul confirms the dictates of reason by the authority of revelation, when he declares, that none have a right to be supported by others, except such as are incapable of providing for themselves, and destitute of those relatives, from whom nature dictates they should obtain relief. Such are his directions in describing the rules, by which the distribution of Christian beneficence should be regulated. How remote is this from the language of fanaticism! It may farther be observed, that the singular and unparalleled liberality of the first Christians undoubtedly placed the Apostles in a trying and suspicious situation; and the manner, in which they acted, indicates prudence and discretion, as strongly as it displays piety and zeal, Acts vi. 1. Dr. Graves. See the notes there.

—— hath denied the faith,] To disobey the precepts of the Gospel, is to deny or renounce the faith of the Gospel. So the Apostle taught. Wherefore "the faith" of the Gospel includes obedience to its precepts. Dr. Macknight.

9. Let not a widow be taken into the number &c.] The Apostle now comes to speak of such widows, as were not only to be maintained by the church, (for they were doubtless to receive alms if poor, without these qualifications,) but were also to be admitted into the number of deaconesses; whose office it was to instruct the younger women, to attend those who were sick and in labour, and to assist at the baptism of females. Dr. Whitby.

The selection and reserve, which St. Paul here recommends to the governours of the church of Ephesus, in bestowing relief upon the poor, are worthy of remark, because they refute a calumny which has been insinuated, that the liberality of the first Christians was an artifice to catch converts; or one of the temptations however, by which the idle and mendicant were drawn into this society. In another place he says, "If any man or woman that believeth have widows, let them relieve them," &c. see ver. 16. And to the same effect, or rather more to our present purpose, the Apostle writes in his Second Epistle to the Thessalonians, "Even when we were with you, this we commanded you, that if any would not work, neither should he eat," that is, at the publick expense: "for we hear that there are some which walk among you disorderly, working not at all, but are busybodies: now them that are such, we command and exhort, by our Lord Jesus Christ, that with quietness they work, and eat their own bread." Could a designing or dissolute poor take advantage of bounty regulated with so much caution? or could the mind, which dictated these sober and prudent directions, be influenced in its recommendations of publick charity by any other than the properest motives of beneficence? Archdeacon Paley.

—— having been the wife of one man,] That is, one who had not divorced herself from one, and married another husband. That such divorces were then common on the wives' side, both among Jews and Gentiles, we learn from various ancient authors. Dr. Whitby.

10. —if she have washed the saints' feet,] Thus condescending to the meanest offices of kindness. Burkitt. See note on Gen. xviii. 7.

11. —to wax wanton against Christ,] That is, to grow weary of Him and His service in the church. Drs. Hammond and Whitby.

16. — have widows,] Any helpless widow of his own family. Dr. Hammond.

17. Let the elders that rule well &c.] The Apostle next proceeds to give Timothy directions concerning "elders;" not old men in years, but elders in office. Burkitt.

18. — The labourer is worthy of his reward.] This, as well as what goes before, is affirmed by the Apostle to be said in "Scripture;" yet it is no where written in the Jewish Scriptures; it is found only in Matt. x. 10: and Luke x. 7. The Apostle therefore must have read either St Matthew's or St. Luke's Gospel, before he wrote this Epistle. And since he quotes this as Scripture, and represents it of equal authority with the writings of Moses, it is a proof, not only of the early publication of these writings, but of their authenticity as Divinely inspired writings. Dr. Macknight.

19. — but before two or three witnesses.] Literally, 'Upon:' that is, unless it be testified by two or three at the least. Dr. Hammond. Because it is the interest of the church of Christ, that the reputation of its ministers be supported: and because prejudiced persons will be ready to accuse without reason. Burkitt.

21. — the Lord Jesus Christ, and the elect angels,] He joins the angels with Jesus Christ, saith Theodoret, not as equal in honour, but as servants to Him, and those who are to attend Him at the day of judgment. Dr. Whitby. Because they in the future judgment shall be present as witnesses with their Lord. Bp. Bull.

22. Lay hands suddenly] Or, rashly, "on no man," to ordain and authorize him to the holy function of the ministry: (see Dr. Whitby's second note on chap. iv. 14:) neither do thou admit of any unworthy man: nor by this means through thy partiality make thyself a partaker of other men's sins; but keep thyself holy and untainted. Bp. Hall.

24, 25. Some men's sins &c.] These two verses are explanatory of the caution contained in ver. 22. Pyle.

24. — are open beforehand,] That is, are discernible before any witnesses come to appear against them. Dr. Whitby. They are so open and manifest, that it is easy to pronounce a certain and correct judgment upon them; and they, as it were, draw us on and impel us to pronounce judgment on them. Schleusner.

—— and some men they follow after.] That is, in some men their evil dispositions appear after. Dr. Whitby. "After;" namely, in point of time. That is, they are more obscure, and are learned and discovered only in the course of time and after long acquaintance. Schleusner.

25. — and they that are otherwise] That is, not manifest beforehand, "cannot be hid" long, but will come to thy knowledge or inquiry. Dr. Wells. The Apostle's similitude is complete and elegant; that neither the secret vices of some, nor the hidden virtues of others, shall be long and always concealed. Pyle.

Chap. VI. The Apostle shews that Christianity exempts none of its professors from their natural and civil obligations: not servants or slaves from paying due service and fidelity even to heathen masters, much less to Christian ones. He points out the reasonableness of being contented in every condition, where a competency is to be had; and the danger of an immoderate love of riches: teaches that rich men are obliged to courtesy and charity: and renews his charge to Timothy. Pyle.

Ver. 1. Let as many servants as are under the yoke] Namely, of bondage to the heathens. Dr. Whitby. The Apostle here particularly directs Timothy to instruct Christian servants in the performance of the duty of obedience, which they owe to their masters, whether infidels or Christians. Hence it appears, that the

6. But godliness with contentment is great gain.] Namely, with that contentment which attends godliness. This the Apostle well explains by the being satisfied with the state we are in, Phil. iv. 11; and with the things we have at present, with food and raiment, ver. 8; that is, with those things which are needful for this present life, Matt. vi. 31, 32: in opposition to anxiety, distrust, and murmuring. And it is never separable from true piety; but is the natural result of that love and value which the good man hath for God and the things of God; that trust which he hath in God; and that entire resignation of his will, which he practises in all affairs, to the conduct of Divine Providence. Dr. Whitby.

9. But they that will be rich &c.] That is, they on whom the love of money so prevails, that they are resolved they will be rich, if by any means they can compass wealth, are in the ready way to yield to any lust, which will gratify their greedy humours. Even the heathens, agreeably to the Apostle here, thought covetousness to comprehend all vices. It also causeth men to make shipwreck of faith and a good conscience, and whatsoever else is sacred; when they cannot be held without the loss of that wealth, which the covetous so much love and admire. Dr. Whitby.

11. — O man of God,] In the Old Testament this title is frequently given to the Prophets, who revealed the mind and will of God to the people. (See the note on 1 Kings xiii. 1.) By giving it to Timothy, the Apostle intimates to him his duty, to contemn the world, and flee the eager pursuit of riches. Burkitt.

13. — who quickeneth all things,] And therefore is able to raise from the dead them who suffer for Him. Dr. Whitby.

14. — until the appearing of our Lord Jesus Christ:] The meaning of the Apostle's exhortation is, that Timothy, by keeping this commandment without spot, was to hand it down pure to his successors in the ministry, and thereby to contribute his part towards preserving it in the world, till Christ's second coming. Dr. Macknight.

15. — King of kings, and Lord of lords;] This title the great emperours of the world took to themselves: see Dan. ii. 37; Jer. xxvii. 6; Ezra vii. 12. stronger warnings; and instead of authorizing the ministers of God's word to wink at their faults, requires that they admonish them with singular earnestness to perform their duties: the only prerogative in relation to this matter that can be allowed them. But as in general the least offensive, and therefore most efficacious, way of admonishing is by publick instruction, the clergy usually confine themselves to that: and the upper part of mankind ought to attend upon it more constantly, and hearken to it more seriously, in proportion as they are less likely to be told their faults and their dangers, in private, to good purpose: and should "suffer the word of exhortation" to be given with greater plainness and freedom to them all in common, the greater objections there are against taking any considerable liberties with each of them singly. Abp. Secker.

—— but in the living God, &c.] The sense is, Let them from the bottom of their hearts acknowledge God to be the author and giver of all that they possess. How much soever their heads contrived, or their hands laboured, or their parents and friends were kind to them, yet it is the Providence of the Almighty to which they owe all. The same Divine foresight and contrivance, that feeds the fowls of the air, and clothes the flowers of the field, doth also "give them richly all things to enjoy:" and therefore upon that Providence are they entirely to depend, as much exercising faith in God, and reposing confidence in Him, as if they had no visible provisions made for them: and as heartily returning thanks to their great Benefactor for every blessing they have, seem it never so much their own already, as a hungry man, that knows not where to get a meal, would to him that should give him a plentiful entertainment. In a word, those that have all things in the world must as devoutly look up to God, both in gratefully ascribing to Him every enjoyment either past or present, and in a full trust and reliance upon Him for what is to come, as those that live from hand to mouth: since it is the same Divine providence that feeds and maintains both the poor and the rich, and of His infinite goodness gives to all that fear Him, even to the poor as well as the rich, all things to enjoy; and though to the one more plentifully, yet to the other perhaps with as much content, though not in so great abundance. Abp. Sharp.

18. — rich in good works, ready to distribute, willing to communicate;] If these phrases have different significations, they may be, as Abp. Sharp explains them; Let them endeavour in the general to do good, not only now and then, in some scanty proportion, but frequently, constantly, and abundantly; not only with their time, labour, and interest, but by distributing of their substance too; and this as freely as if it were a common stock, to which all had a right. Yet these expressions clearly shew, that there was not a community of goods amongst Christians in general; for in that case there could have been no room for the exhortation, and the distinction on which it is founded. Dr. Doddridge.

20. — oppositions of science falsely so called:] That is, such foolish and absurd doctrines as are opposed to the truth of the Scripture by persons, whether Jews or Gentiles, who falsely esteem themselves to have more knowledge than we in religious matters. Dr. Wells. Though it is not certain that the name of Gnosticks, or the knowing men, was so early as the Apostle's days used to denominate a distinct sect, which it was in aftertimes; yet it is highly probable that they, who opposed the Apostle, made extraordinary pretences to knowledge; and this text seems sufficient to prove it. Dr. Doddridge.

21. — Grace be with thee.] This Epistle being chiefly designed for Timothy's own use, no salutations were sent to any of the brethren at Ephesus. Dr. Macknight.

The first to Timothy was written from Laodicea,] Yet from what the Apostle says, chap. i. 3, the reader is naturally led to conclude, that he wrote the letter upon his arrival in Macedonia. Archdeacon Paley. (See the note from Bp. Tomline at the end of the First Epistle to the Corinthians.) Dr. Paley remarks, that "six of the subscriptions to St. Paul's Epistles seem to be erroneous:" and he believes them "to have been conjectures founded sometimes upon loose traditions, but more generally upon a consideration of some particular text, without sufficiently comparing it with other parts of the Epistle, with different Epistles, or with the history." The erroneous subscriptions are to 1 Cor.; Gal.; 1 Thess.; 2 Thess.; 1 Tim.; and Titus. Each separate errour is not noticed in its place: but the reader may correct them all, except this to 1 Tim. by comparing the particular subscription with the Introduction prefixed to the Epistle.

THE SECOND EPISTLE OF PAUL THE APOSTLE

TO

INTRODUCTION.

THAT this Epistle was written while St. Paul was under confinement at Rome, appears from the two following passages: "Be not thou therefore ashamed of the testimony of our Lord, nor of me His prisoner:" "The Lord give mercy unto the house of Onesiphorus, for he oft refreshed me, and was not ashamed of my chain; but when he was in Rome, he sought me out very diligently, and found me." And if we have done rightly in dating the first Epistle to Timothy after St. Paul's first imprisonment at Rome, it will follow that this second Epistle must have been written during his second imprisonment in that city, and probably in the year 65; not long before his death. It is by no means certain where Timothy was when this Epistle was written to him. It seems most probable that he was somewhere in Asia Minor, since St. Paul desires him to bring the cloak with him which he had left at Troas, chap. iv. 13; and also at the end of the first chapter, he speaks of several persons whose residence was in Asia. Many have thought that he was at Ephesus; but others have rejected that opinion, because Troas does not lie in the way from Ephesus to Rome, whither he was directed to go as quickly as he could.

St. Paul, after his usual salutation, assures Timothy of his most affectionate remembrance; he speaks of his own apostleship, and of his sufferings; exhorts Timothy to be steadfast in the true faith; to be constant and diligent in the discharge of his ministerial office; to avoid foolish and unlearned questions; and to practise and inculcate the great duties of the Gospel, chap. ii.: he describes the apostasy and general wickedness of the last days, and highly commends the holy Scriptures, chap. iii.: he again solemnly exhorts Timothy to diligence; speaks of his own danger, and of his hope of future reward; and concludes with several private directions, and with salutations. Bp. Tomline.

1 Paul's love to Timothy, and the unfeigned faith which was in Timothy himself, his mother, and grandmother. 6 He is exhorted to stir up the gift of God which was in him, 8 to be steadfast, and patient in persecution, 13 and to persist in the form and truth of that doctrine which he had learned of him. 15 Phygellus and Hermogenes, and such like, are noted, and Onesiphorus is highly commended.

Chap. I. The title and salutation. The Apostle expresses his great affection to Timothy, with fresh encouragements to the diligent and resolute discharge of his office. He instructs him that Gentiles as well as Jews are to be received into the Christian covenant; the Apostle himself having been specially commissioned to preach to the former, for which he was again persecuted and imprisoned by the malice of the latter. He reminds Timothy, how the Asian Christians generally forsook him and his cause, during his imprisonment; except Onesiphorus and his family, whom he mentions and prays for with great respect. Pyle.

Ver. 1. — according to the promise of life] Especially commissioned by the express revelation of God, to declare the Gospel privileges and promises of eternal life both to Gentiles and to Jews. Pyle.

3. — whom I serve from my forefathers] Namely, in that true religion which I received from my forefathers, being in substance the same which I now profess. Bp. Hall.

5. — and thy mother Eunice;] Converted to the faith before thee, Acts xvi. 1. Dr. Whitby. It is a most desirable and blessed thing, when there is a succession of believers in a family; and to see faith transmitted down to posterity, when grandmother, mother, and grandchild, all walk in the truth. Burkitt. The pains, which these two worthy persons took to impress the mind of their son in his childhood with sentiments of piety and virtue, is a fit example for the imitation of all mothers; who, if they take the same pains with their children, may hope that by the blessing of God their care will be followed with the same happy effects. Dr. Macknight.

mother Eunice; and I am persuaded that in thee also.

6 Wherefore I put thee in remembrance that thou stir up the gift of God, which is in thee by the putting on of my hands.

7 For God hath not given us the spirit of fear; but of power, and of love, and of a sound mind.

8 Be not thou therefore ashamed of the testimony of our Lord, nor of me his prisoner: but be thou partaker of the afflictions of the gospel according to the power of God;

9 Who hath saved us, and called us with an holy calling, not according to our works, but according to his own purpose and grace, which was given us in Christ Jesus before the world began; Anno DOMINI 66.

10 But is now made manifest by the appearing of our Saviour Jesus Christ, who hath abolished death, and hath brought life and immortality to light through the gospel:

11 Whereunto I am appointed a preacher, and an apostle, and a teacher of the Gentiles.

12 For the which cause I also suffer these things: nevertheless I am not ashamed: for I know whom I have || believed, and am persuaded that he is able to keep that which I have committed unto him against that day.

|| Or, trusted.

6.—thou stir up the gift of God, which is in thee] Quickening the gifts and graces, which were given thee by the imposition of my hands; and not suffering them to go out for want of use and excitation. Bp. Hall. Philo saith, that 'where there is any spark of true probity, being ventilated, it will shine, and break forth into a flame.' And this is also true as well of spiritual gifts as graces; even the gifts of miracles, of healing, and of casting out devils, were strengthened and increased by prayer and by faith, Matt. xvii. 20, 21: and the internal gifts of wisdom and knowledge by reading and meditating on the word; the illumination of the Holy Spirit coming then upon gifted persons, when they were so employed, 1 Cor. xiv. 23—26; 1 Tim. iv. 13—15. How they may be extinguished, see Eph. iv. 30; 1 Thess. v. 19. Dr. Whitby.

7. For God hath not given us &c.] Exercise thy gifts boldly and cheerfully: for God hath given us His Spirit to enable us and to bear us out in these holy services; which Spirit of His is not a spirit of fear and cowardice, but a Spirit of power and resolution, a Spirit of fervent love to His church, a Spirit of sincerity both of judgment and affection. Bp. Hall.

8.—according to the power of God;] By that strength which God gives thee. Dr. Hammond.

9. Who hath saved us,] That is, put us into a state of salvation; and in order thereto has "called us with a holy calling," namely, to Christianity. Dr. Wells. See the note on 1 Cor. xv. 2.

——not according to our works, &c.] Not for any merit of our works, but for His own mercy's sake, upon His own good purpose and grace, which was decreed to be given us, in and by Christ Jesus, before the world began. Bp. Hall.

The redemption of mankind was not an after thought, a new design, formed upon the transgression and fall of our first parents. That event was foreseen, and provision made accordingly. For upon the very best authority we are informed, that Christ was "the Lamb slain from the foundation of the world;" that is, for it cannot be otherwise understood, slain in effect, in the Divine purpose and counsel. It is likewise said here, that "grace was given us in Christ Jesus before the world began;" see also Tit. i. 2. The words intimate, that before the creation of the world something had passed in our favour above: that the plan of our future redemption was then laid: that some agreement, some covenant, relative to it, had been entered into: "grace was given us," not in our proper persons, for as yet we were not; we had no being; but in the person of Him, who was afterwards to become our representative, our Saviour, "in Christ Jesus." Now the plan must have been laid, the covenant entered into, by the parties who have since been graciously pleased to concern themselves in its execution. Who these are, we cannot be ignorant. It was the Son of God, who took our nature upon Him, and in that nature made a full, perfect, and sufficient oblation, satisfaction, and atonement, for the sins of the world. It was the Father, who accepted such oblation, satisfaction, and atonement; and in consequence forgave those sins. It was the Holy Spirit, who came forth from the Father and the Son, through the preaching of the word, and the administration of the sacraments, by His enlightening, healing, and comforting grace, to apply to the hearts of men, for all the purposes of pardon, sanctification, and salvation, the merits and benefits of that oblation, satisfaction, and atonement. Bp. Horne.

10.—who hath abolished death, and hath brought life and immortality to light] Who now, by dying for our sins, has rescued all true believers from the final power of death; and by His life and doctrine, has freed them from all the uncertainties they laboured under concerning the future state; and given them a full assurance of an eternal and happy life, upon their repentance and sincere obedience to His commands. Pyle.

The original word, rendered "brought to light," signifies to enlighten, illustrate, or clear up any thing. And the meaning of this passage is, that our Lord enlightened the doctrine of life and immortality, not by giving the first or only notice of it, but by clearing up the doubts and difficulties under which it laboured, and giving a better evidence for the truth and certainty of it, than nature or any revelation had before given. He illustrated and made plain this great doctrine of religion; He dispelled the doubts and uncertainties in which it was involved; and He gave evident proof and demonstration to the world of the certainty of a future life and immortality. Bp. Sherlock. "Life and immortality" is put by an usual Hebraism for immortal life. Abp. Tillotson.

Before our Saviour's days, length of time, and folly, and wickedness, had every where obscured and darkened this great truth by fabulous additions and absurd alterations: which hindered the good influence of it on some persons, and discredited the belief of it with others. And had there been none of these obstacles thrown in their way; though reason and conscience teach the doctrine of a future state; yet by the generality of men reason is little exercised, and conscience little consulted, in relation to unwelcome truths. And though the Old Testament gave some farther intimations of it; yet these were neither very clear and explicit, nor known by the greatest part of the world. No wonder then, if their conclusions, concerning a matter so much out of sight, were often doubtful and often false: and thus they were misled in a subject of the greatest importance to them of all others. It is therefore one inestimable benefit of the Christian revelation, that our blessed Lord hath thoroughly removed the preceding uncertainties and errours, and "brought life and immortality to" perfect "light through the Gospel:" not only confirming by Divine authority whatever had been rationally taught before; but adding, by the same authority, several interesting particulars, which human faculties could not discover. Abp. Secker.

12.—for I know whom I have believed, &c.] For I well know what a powerful and merciful God and Saviour it is, whom I have relied and cast myself upon: and I am fully persuaded, that He is infinitely able, against all the powers of hell, to keep and safe guard that my precious soul, which I have committed to His care and custody; and to bring it forth glorious, at that great day of His appearing; and to perfect that salvation of mine, which He so graciously hath undertaken. Bp. Hall.

13. Hold fast the form of sound words,] By "sound words," we are to understand the doctrine of the Gospel: by a "form of sound words," the truths and doctrines of the Gospel methodically disposed and digested; to "hold it fast," is not to swerve from it in the course of our ministry, but pertinaciously to adhere to it; not parting with it ourselves, nor suffering it to be adulterated and corrupted by others. This "form of sound words," some take to be the articles of our Creed, in the words wherein we now have them, probably the same in sense if not in words. This is called ver. 14, "that good thing which was committed" to Timothy to keep; meaning that summary of Christian doctrine, which was committed to his care and keeping. Burkitt.

As all the doctrines of Scripture, though equally true, are not of equal importance; the more necessary articles have been, from the beginning of Christianity, collected into one body, called in Scripture, "the form of sound words;" "the words of faith," 1 Tim. iv. 6; "the principles of the doctrine of Christ," Heb. vi. 1: but in our common way of speaking at present, 'the Creed,' from the Latin word credo, which signifies I believe. The ancient churches had many such creeds: some longer, others shorter; differing on several heads in phrase, but agreeing in method and sense; of which that called the Apostles' Creed is one. And it deserves this name, not so much from any certainty, or great likelihood, that the Apostles drew it up in these very expressions; though some pretty early, and many since, have imagined they did; as because it contains the chief apostolick doctrines, and was used by a church, which, before it grew corrupt, was justly respected as one of the chief apostolick settlements; I mean, the Roman. Abp. Secker.

—— in faith and love which is in Christ Jesus.] With a firm faith and true Christian love. Dr. Whitby.

14. That good thing which was committed unto thee keep] St. Paul more than once calleth upon Timothy to "keep that which was committed to his trust." He meaneth it in respect of the Christian faith, which he was bound to keep entire as it was delivered to him, at his peril, and as he would answer it another day. Bp. Sanderson.

15. — all they which are in Asia &c.] Or 'of Asia.' St. Paul probably alludes to the behaviour of the Asiatick Christians at Rome, chap. iv. 16; of which Timothy might have been informed by travellers. But Dr. Whitby refers this to those of Ephesus, who had deserted the Apostle, giving ear, as he supposes, to the seduction of Cerinthus and the Ebionites, by whom he had been represented as a despiser of the Mosaick law. Dr. Doddridge. All they of Asia, that were at first with me here at Rome, and are now in Asia. Dr. Wells.

—— Phygellus and Hermogenes.] Of these corrupt teachers we know nothing. From their being mentioned particularly, it may be presumed that they opposed the Apostle's doctrines with great virulence, and had spoken calumniously of him. Dr. Macknight.

18. — in that day:] Namely, of the last and general retribution, when He shall come to reward every man according to his works. Bp. Hall. Offices of kindness done to St. Paul, especially when in distress, made a deep impression on him, and filled him with a gratitude, of which the present prayer for the welfare of Onesiphorus and of his family is a beautiful example. Dr. Macknight.

Chap. II. Timothy is still encouraged by the Apostle's own example of faith, hope, and patience. The good effects of a Christian's sufferings, and the danger of denying Christ in times of persecution. Warnings against the immoderate zeal, the frivolous and violent disputes of the Jewish zealots about their traditions. The meek and gentle dispositions of a good Christian bishop, or church governour. Pyle.

Ver. 4. No man that warreth &c.] The legionary soldiers among the Romans were not suffered to engage in agriculture, merchandise, mechanical employment, or any business which might divert them from their profession. The Apostle, by applying the Roman law respecting soldiers to the ministers of the Gospel, hath established a scripture canon, whereby all who undertake the office of the ministry are prohibited from following such secular businesses, as engross their attention, and require much time to execute. Dr. Macknight.

5. And if a man also strive] In the Olympick or the like games "for mastery, he is not crowned except he strive lawfully," or according to the rules of the said games. And therefore, if thou wouldst obtain a crown of glory, thou must suffer afflictions, if God calls thee thereto. Dr. Wells. Thou must fulfil thy ministry in the manner prescribed by Christ. Dr. Macknight.

6. The husbandman that laboureth must be first partaker of the fruits.] Rather, 'the husbandman must first labour before he partakes of the fruits.' This consideration is to the like purpose as the foregoing. Dr. Wells. It was entirely to the Apostle's purpose to remind Timothy, that the labour of the husbandman must precede the harvest: but whether he was to be the first that should receive these fruits, was not the point in question. We must therefore acquiesce in this transposition of the words, and the like is necessary in several other places. Dr. Doddridge, Pyle.

8. Remember that Jesus Christ of the seed of David was raised from the dead] The Apostle, having exhorted Timothy to patience and constancy under sufferings, here directs him to insist upon the incarnation and resurrection of our Lord Jesus Christ. Remember that Jesus Christ was the promised Messiah, of the seed of David, not of Joseph. Timothy is here called upon to assert the incarnation of Christ; there being some hereticks, who very early denied the truth of His human nature, as the Marcionites and Manichees; whilst there were others who denied the reality of His divine nature, particularly Ebion and Cerinthus. Secondly, he calls upon Timothy to preach and press the doctrine of Christ's resurrection also; both because upon that depended the great evidence of His divinity, His resurrection by His own power declaring Him to be God, Rom. i. 4; and also because upon that depends the consolation and salvation of all believers. Burkitt.

9. — but the word of God is not bound.] Notwithstanding the restraint laid upon me, the Gospel hath been freely preached; and my imprisonment hath been the means of divulging it in this city. Dr. Hammond.

This short sentence is a beautiful display of the Apostle's character. The evils which he was suffering for the Gospel, though great, he reckoned as nothing, because of the joy which he felt from his persuasion, that the honour of Christ and the happiness of mankind would be promoted by his sufferings; and because he knew that all the opposition which infidels were making to the Gospel, would not hinder it from being preached and believed. They have bound me in chains, said he, and may put me to death: but the word of God they cannot bind. Not only the strength of the Apostle's reasoning here, but the energy of his expression is admirable. Dr. Macknight.

10. — for the elect's sakes,] That is, for the sake of the Christians, who are "a chosen generation," 1 Pet. ii. 9; chosen to know the will of God and the way to salvation; and who may be confirmed in the faith by the example of my patient sufferings, and continuing in it may obtain that salvation to which they are called. Drs. Whitby and Wells.

11. It is a faithful saying: &c.] There is not a more certain truth, nor any that deserves more to be considered and depended on by Christians, than this; namely, that our suffering, as Christ suffered, in testimony and defence of the truth, shall certainly be rewarded with a participation of His glory. Dr. Hammond.

13. If we believe not,] If we be unfaithful and forsake Him, yet He will be true to His word; He will not forsake His own cause, but make good His threatenings: His own veracity stands firm, and is as much engaged to execute the threatening, as to fulfil the promise. Burkitt.

15. — rightly dividing the word of truth.] No doubt the Latin Vulgate has given in general the true sense of this expression, by rendering it 'rightly handling the word of truth.' But it is not easy to determine whence in particular the metaphorical word is taken; and commentators differ much in their opinions upon the subject. Parkhurst. Whatever metaphorical signification we assign to the word, its application in this passage will be nearly the same. It denotes a judicious distribution or arrangement of the subject matter of holy writ; such an analysis of its component parts, as may enable the reader to judge of their respective purposes, and their connexion with the general design. Dr. Van Mildert.

17. — Hymeneus and Philetus;] Because Hymeneus had spoken disrespectfully of Christ, the Apostle found it necessary to deliver him to Satan, 1 Tim. i. 20. Philetus is mentioned no where else in Scripture. Dr. Macknight.

18. — saying that the resurrection is past already;] They affirmed, that the only resurrection promised by Christ was a spiritual resurrection from ignorance and errour by believing the Gospel: and that that resurrection having already taken place, no other is to be expected. This doctrine the Judaizers probably founded on Christ's words, John v. 24, 25; where a spiritual resurrection is spoken of; but they overlooked the other parts of His discourse, ver. 28, 29, in which He expressly promised the resurrection of the body. Dr. Macknight.

They might be the more easily mistaken on this account, that the Apostles, imitating the language already in use concerning the Jewish proselytes, expressed the change which Christianity made in the tempers and condition of men, by the phrases of "dying to sin, being buried with Christ in baptism, and rising again to newness of life." The ignorant or prejudiced might hastily conclude from hence, that no other rising again was intended to be taught: and that therefore "the resurrection was past already," as we are told by the Apostle that some affirmed. Abp. Secker.

19. Nevertheless the foundation of God standeth sure, having this seal,] Or inscription. The seals of the Mahometans, particularly of the Turks and Arabs, have no image nor figure, but only an inscription: so the Persians, as Hanway relates, 'in their rings wear agates, which generally serve for a seal, on which is frequently engraved their name, and some verse from the Koran.' And it is highly probable that the Jewish seals were of the like kind; see Exod. xxviii. 11, 36; which very naturally accounts for St. Paul's using the word, which properly signifies "a seal," for an inscription. 'The expression,' says Doddridge on this passage, 'is here used with peculiar propriety, in allusion to the custom of engraving upon some stones, laid in the foundations of buildings, the names of the persons by whom, and the purposes for which, the structure is raised. And nothing can have a greater tendency to encourage the hope, and at the same time to engage the obedience, of Christians, than this double inscription.' Parkhurst. See Zech. iii. 9.

The purport of the two inscriptions is as follows: that of the first, that God is sure, to all those who are faithful to Him, to reward them both in body and soul to all eternity, which is sufficiently destructive of the doctrine that there is no future state: that of the second, that every Christian, by undertaking the faith of Christ, obliges himself to a strict life, quite contrary to the vicious practices of the heretical teachers. Dr. Hammond.

It was a common answer of the ancient martyrs, I am a Christian, and with us no evil is done. The very name was thought to speak something of emendation; and whosoever put it on, became the better man. Except such reformation accompany our profession, there is no advantage in the appellation; nor can we be honoured by that title whilst we dishonour Him that gives it. Bp. Pearson.

It is the honour and prerogative of the Christian religion, that it alone alloweth of no wickedness: but, as God Himself is holy, so He requireth an holy worship and holy worshippers. He exacteth the mortification of all evil lusts, and the sanctification of the whole man, body, soul, and spirit, and that in each of these throughout. Every one, that nameth himself from the name of Christ, doth by the very taking of that blessed name upon him, and daring to style himself Christian, virtually bind himself to "depart from iniquity;" nor so only, but to endeavour also, after the example of Him, whose name otherwise he unworthily usurpeth, to be just, merciful, temperate, humble, meek, patient, charitable; to get the habits, and to exercise the acts, of these and all other holy graces and virtues. Bp. Sanderson.

20. But in a great house there are not only vessels of gold &c.] In like manner in the church of Christ there will be a number of orthodox, and also of heterodox persons; of hypocrites, as well as of sincere Christians. The Apostle advises Timothy therefore, not to be scandalized at them; but to purge himself from them, to keep himself pure from heresy and impiety: hereby he would manifest himself to be a vessel unto honour, "sanctified and meet for the Master's use;" that is, for the service and glory of God; and disposed for every good work. Burkitt.

22. — them that call on the Lord out of a pure heart.] All sincere Christians. Pyle. See the note on 1 Cor. i. 2.

23. — foolish and unlearned questions] These foolish questions, which the Judaizers are so fond of, and which were never proposed by the Apostles. Dr. Macknight. "Unlearned questions;" questions that belong not to Christianity, the Christian institution or instruction. Questions about things never taught by Christ, never required of any Christian to believe at his baptism. Pyle. Such questions as tend to no edification. Bp. Hall.

24. And the servant of the Lord must not strive; &c.] In this and the following verse the Apostle seems to have had Christ's example as a teacher in his eye, proposing it as a model to all who are employed in teaching. The virtues here mentioned our Lord generally exercised in His instructions. Yet on some occasions He departed from His usual mildness, and with great severity reproved notorious sinners, such as the scribes and Pharisees. In the same manner the Prophets and Apostles used strong speech in checking obstinate offenders; whilst those, who shewed any candour and honesty in their opposition to the Gospel, they instructed with the greatest meekness, according to the rule mentioned in the 25th verse. Dr. Macknight.

"The servant of the Lord must not strive; but be gentle unto all men, and patient:" so gentle and patient, that he must study to win those that oppose themselves; not by reviling, but by instructing them: and that, not in a loud and lofty strain, unless when there is left no other remedy; but first, and if that will serve the turn, only, in love and with meekness. God's holy word we must stand for indeed, if it be opposed, to the utmost of our strength: neither may we betray any part thereof by our silence or softness, for any man's pleasure or displeasure, where we may help it, and where the defence of it appeareth to be prudentially necessary. Yet even in that case ought we so to maintain the truth of God, as not to despise the persons of men. We are to follow the truth "in love," Eph. iv. 15; which is then best done, when, holding us close to the truth, we are ready yet in love to our brethren to do them all the rights, and to perform unto them all those respects, which, without confirming them in their errours, may any way fall due unto them. Bp. Sanderson.

Chap. III. St. Paul foretells in the first place, that great corruption would creep into the church by means of false teachers and persons who would corrupt the doctrine and practice of Christianity. Secondly, he exhorts Timothy to shun such people, whose destruction he foretells; to imitate his conduct and patience under afflictions; and chiefly to adhere to the doctrine contained in the Holy Scriptures, the divine authority and usefulness of which he confirms. Ostervald.

Ver. 1. — in the last days] Even in the days of Christianity. Dr. Wells. All the times from Christ's first coming in the flesh to His second coming to judgment: in the beginning of which times several sorts of persons, indeed several sects and parties of men arose, to whom the following characters belonged. And it were well if the church of Rome in these latter days could clear herself from these characters which are found upon her, as the marks and badges of an apostate church. Burkitt.

This part of the chapter is generally, and I think justly, considered as a prediction of the apostasy from the true faith and practice of the Gospel, which early began to take place in the Christian church, but which was not carried to its height, till the Roman empire in the west was overturned by the incursions of the barbarous northern nations. Of that apostasy St. Paul had prophesied twice before; namely, 2 Thess. ii. 3—12; and 1 Tim. iv. 1—5. In the first of these passages, the blasphemous claims of the corrupters of Christianity in latter ages, their feigned miracles, and other base arts by which they were to establish their usurped authority in the church, are described. In the second passage, the impious doctrines and superstitious practices which by virtue of that authority they were to introduce, are particularly set forth. But in this Epistle, the influence of the ungodly doctrines and superstitious practices of the promoters of the apostasy, in corrupting the morals both of the teachers and of the people, are foretold. These three prophecies taken together, exhibit such a striking portrait of the characters, pretensions, and practices of the promoters of the apostasy, that no intelligent reader, who is acquainted with the history of the church, can doubt that the erroneous doctrines and superstitious practices which were early introduced, and which, under mistaken notions of sanctity, were supported by persons of the greatest reputation, are in these prophecies foretold to end in that monstrous fabrick of spiritual tyranny, which the bishops of Rome, assisted by their clergy, erected; and in that universal corruption of manners which it occasioned. As little can he doubt, that the predictions of these evils recorded in Scripture were designed by the Spirit of God to convince the faithful in aftertimes who were to be witnesses of the apostasy, that it had happened by the permission of God, who often makes the wickedness of men instrumental in accomplishing His greatest purposes. Dr. Macknight.

2. — men shall be lovers of their own selves,] The vices mentioned in this and the two following verses have always existed in the world. But being spoken of here as characteristical of the latter days, it implies, that, besides being common in those days, they would be openly avowed and defended. Accordingly it is well known that in the dark ages the clergy defended all the enormities mentioned by the Apostle, encouraged the people by their false doctrine to commit them, and went before them in the practice of these enormities. Dr. Macknight.

3. Without natural affection, trucebreakers,] Breaking through the most natural and essential obligations, and violating all truth and faith with such as are not of their party. Pyle.

4. — lovers of pleasures more than lovers of God;] Passages of Scripture like this are not designed to drive persons into unnatural rigours and austerities: but they are designed to restrain them from that habit and study of self-indulgence, which, being attended perhaps with the commission of no flagrant sins, looks to be an allowable way of consuming time, but indeed brings poor wretches, often by quick degrees, to entire forgetfulness of God and themselves, and extinguishes all attention to what deserves it most. This lethargy of the mind is the great danger of a state of prosperity and affluence: which therefore as many as are placed in that state should continually watch against, as being totally contrary to the spirit of religion: and remember, that whosoever so "liveth in pleasure," as to live to it, "is dead while he liveth," 1 Tim. v. 6; dead to all the purposes of Christianity here, and all the hopes of felicity hereafter. Abp. Secker.

5. Having a form of godliness, but denying the power thereof:] Making an outward and formal profession of godliness in words, but in their deeds denying the power thereof; so living, as if godliness were but a mere name and a matter of fashion, without all force and efficacy. Bp. Hall. "A form of godliness" is a vain empty shew of piety and religion, which discovers itself in external devotion, in a profession of the Christian faith, in an outward appearance of mortification, in a great zeal for some particular party or private opinion. Burkitt.

6. For of this sort are they which creep into houses, &c.] This, with the two subsequent verses, is thought by some to be a prophetical description of the practices of the Romish monks and friars in the dark ages, who by hypocritical pretensions to extraordinary sanctity, and by auricular confession and other dangerous practices, deluded and corrupted their female votaries. But practices similar to these began very early in the church, and were by a gradual progress, at length, under the Romish hierarchy, formed into a regular system of deceit. We may therefore suppose, that as in the prophecies which foretell the political state of the world, so in the prophecies concerning the apostasy in which its religious state is represented, the general course of things, through a succession of ages, is foretold, rather than the state of things in any particular age. This I think will be allowed, when it is considered, that not the rise only, but the progress and downfall of the apostasy is foretold in these prophecies. So that their subject being a series of things, which were to happen throughout a long course of years, and which were gradually to produce a widely extended and confirmed state of corruption in the church, there is no reason for limiting their fulfilment to any particular period. Dr. Macknight.

8. — Jannes and Jambres] These names are not to be met with in the Old Testament, but are here taken out of other records of the Jews, as divers other things mentioned in the New Testament: see Acts vii. 22, 23, 25: they are questionless the names of Pharaoh's chief magicians, spoken of in Exod. vii. Dr. Hammond. It is remarkable that the former of these is mentioned together with Moses by Pliny, and both of them by Numenius the philosopher, quoted in Eusebius, as celebrated magicians. Dr. Doddridge.

—— so do these also resist the truth:] Resist the truth in the manner Jannes and Jambres resisted Moses, namely, by false miracles. In the early ages the heretical teachers were much addicted to the study of magick. Clement of Alexandria tells us, that some of the Gnosticks pretended to have the secret books of Zoroaster. We know likewise that in later times the monks and friars were great pretenders to miracles. Hence they are called, ver. 13, by a term properly signifying 'magicians.' The Apostle therefore, in prophesying of the heretical teachers, who were to arise in the church in aftertimes, with great propriety compared them, both in their character and punishment, to Pharaoh's magicians. Dr. Macknight.

—— reprobate concerning the faith.] See the note on Rom. i. 28. Men unsound in faith; who in respect of their faith are precisely what bad money or metal is with respect to its quality; unable to stand the proof, and therefore rejected as base and worthless. Here is no intimation of any decree of God, by which the greater part of mankind, born in all the different ages of the world, and living under different dispensations, are consigned to eternal and inevitable misery; but it is a prophetick description of the character of persons, who will "in the last days" resist the truth of the Gospel, and reject the faith of Christ. Bp. Tomline.

14. —knowing of whom thou hast learned them;] Namely, of me, an authorized and inspired Apostle of Jesus Christ. Burkitt.

15. —hast known the holy scriptures,] The Apostle calls the writings of the Old Testament "holy" or sacred, because of their Divine inspiration, mentioned in the next verse. Timothy's mother and grandmother, being Jewish women of great piety, had trained him up from his childhood in the knowledge and belief of the writings of Moses and the Prophets. And their care in thus instructing him, being commended by the Apostle, it shews us that little children ought to be made acquainted with the Scriptures as early as possible; and that they may derive much benefit, even from that imperfect knowledge of the Scriptures, and of the principles of religion, which they are capable of attaining in their tenderest years. See note on chap. i. 5. Dr. Macknight.

The main drift of the whole New Testament is that which St. John setteth down as the purpose of his own history: "These (things) are written, that ye might believe that Jesus is the Christ, the Son of God, and that believing ye might have life through His name," John xx. 31. The drift of the Old is that which the Apostle here mentioneth to Timothy, "The Holy Scriptures are able to make thee wise unto salvation." So that the general end both of Old and New is one: the difference between them consisting in this, that the Old did make wise by teaching salvation through Christ that should come; the New, by teaching that Christ the Saviour is come; and that Jesus, whom the Jews did crucify, and whom God did raise from the dead, is He. When the Apostle therefore affirmeth unto Timothy, that the Old was able to make him wise unto salvation, it was not his meaning that the Old alone can do this unto us which live since the publication of the New. For he speaketh with presupposal of the doctrine of Christ, known also unto Timothy: and therefore first it is said, "Continue thou in the things which thou hast learned, and hast been assured of, knowing of whom thou hast learned them." Again, those Scriptures he granteth were able to make him wise to salvation, but he addeth, "through faith which is in Christ." Wherefore without the doctrine of the New Testament, teaching that Christ hath wrought the redemption of the world, which redemption the Old did foreshew He should work, it is not the former alone which can perform so much as the Apostle doth avouch, who presupposeth this, when he magnifieth that so highly. Hooker.

16. All scripture is given by inspiration of God, &c.] The Scriptures of the Old Testament must be the Scriptures here intended, they only being the Scriptures, which Timothy had known from a child, that is, before the Scriptures of the New Testament were written. Dr. Whitby.

The word, here translated "Scripture," always in the Gospels and Epistles denotes that collection of writings, which the Church acknowledged for its rule of life and manners. When the Apostle sent this Epistle to Timothy, several parts of the New Testament were not published, and scarce any had spread very far: so that he must by "Scripture" mean chiefly, if not solely, the Old Testament. But the books of the New, from their first appearance, obtained the same title every where. St. Peter gives it by the plainest implication to what St. Paul wrote, 2 Pet. iii. 16; and doubtless what he, and the rest of the twelve, wrote, equally deserved it. Inspiration is any particular influence of God on the mind: whence we pray in the Communion Service, that He would "cleanse our hearts by the inspiration of His Holy Spirit." But in the case before us, it must signify such influence, as will be effectual for the purpose of writing such books. And of this there may be various degrees requisite, and therefore granted, according to the variety of circumstances. Moving a person inwardly to undertake the work is one degree. Superintending him during the execution of it, so as to preserve him from any considerable mistake or omission, is another. Preserving him from all, even the least, is a higher still. Enabling him to express himself in a manner loftier, clearer, more convincing, or more affecting, than he could have done otherwise, is yet a further step. Suggesting to him also the matter which he shall deliver goes beyond the former, especially if he was unacquainted with it till then. And putting into his mouth the very words he shall use, is the completest guidance that can be. We say not, that God hath done all these things in every part of Scripture; but so many in each as were needful. Abp. Secker.

17. That the man of God] Or teacher of it, "may be perfect;" that is, wanting in nothing which he ought to practise or believe himself, or to teach others, for the edification of a Christian into a "perfect man in Christ Jesus," and for making him "throughly furnished to every good work." Dr. Whitby.

The Apostle here commends the Jewish Scriptures for their Divine inspiration, and their usefulness towards illustrating the Gospel revelation; so that a Christian minister, who rightly understands them, is thereby well fitted for every part of his work. Our Lord also on various occasions bore testimony to the Jewish Scriptures, and to their connexion with the Gospel, Luke xxiv. 27: "And beginning at Moses and all the Prophets, He expounded unto them in all the Scriptures the things concerning Himself." Also He commanded His disciples to "search the Scriptures," because "they testified of Him," John v. 39: see ver. 46. What then are we to think of those teachers, who are at so much pains to disjoin the Christian revelation from the Jewish, as if the latter were not of Divine original, and had no connexion with the Gospel; and instead of illustrating and confirming the Gospel, were rather an encumbrance to it? In this encomium of the Jewish Scriptures the duties of a Christian minister are declared to be, 1st, To teach the people the true doctrine of the Gospel. 2dly, To confute all errours contrary to true doctrine. 3dly, To correct, by proper admonitions, reproofs, and censures, those who openly transgress the precepts of the Gospel. 4thly, To direct and encourage all to follow a righteous course of life. Lastly, In this encomium of the Jewish Scriptures, the Apostle contradicted the Judaizers, who affirmed that the law was contrary to the Gospel. Dr. Macknight.

Chap. IV. The Apostle continues to exhort Timothy with great earnestness to discharge all the duties of his office. That he may the more effectually engage him thereto, he tells him his death was drawing near, for which he expresses great joy, and a firm hope of the glory of heaven.
